The following very interesting incident of Indian life was written by governor Cass, our present minister to France, while on one of those numerous missions to the aboriginal tribes, in which his integrity, sagacity and deep knowledge of the Indian character achieved so many beneficial results for the United States, as well as for the outcast children of the forest themselves, by the amicable relations which he established, and the treaties which he made between them and our government; and is published now by his kind permission. It was the practice of governor Cass, while on these expeditions, to record minutely all interesting occurrences, and the facts respecting the history, habits and character of the Indian tribes, which practical acquaintance brought under the knowledge of a sagacious and inquiring mind. By such a man, what valuable materials for an authentic history of that remarkable and perishing race will not these documents present! We hope, from time to time, to have the high gratification of presenting further extracts to the public:

"An incident occurred, during a recent tour to the north west, so rare in itself, and which so clearly shows the facility with which communications may be opened between savage nations without the intervention of letters, that I have thought it would be interesting to communicate to you.

"The Chippewas and Sioux are hereditary enemies, and Charlevoix says that they were at war when the French first reached the Mississippi. I endeavored, when among them, to learn the cause which first excited them to war, and the time when it commenced, but they can give no rational account of either. An intelligent Chippeway chief informed me that the disputed boundary between them was a subject of little importance, and the question respecting it could be easily adjusted. He appeared to think they fought because their fathers fought before them.

"This war has been waged with various success, and in its prosecution instances of courage and self-devotion have occurred, within a few years, which would not have disgraced the pages of Grecian or of Roman history. Some years since, mutually weary of hostilities, the chiefs of both nations met and agreed upon a truce. But the Sioux, disregarding the solemn compact which they had formed, and actuated by some sudden impulse, attacked the Chippewas, and murdered a number of them. The old Chippeway chief, who descended the Mississippi with us, was present upon this occasion, and his life was saved by the intrepidity and generous self-devotion of a Sioux chief. This man entreated, remonstrated and threatened. He urged his countrymen, by every motive to abstain from any violation of their faith; and when he found his remonstrances useless, he attached himself to the Chippeway chief, and avowed his determination of saving or perishing with him. Awed by his intrepidity, the Sioux finally agreed that he should ransom the Chippeway, and he accordingly applied to this object all the property which he owned. He then accompanied the Chippeway on his journey, until he considered him safe from any parties of the Sioux who might be disposed to follow him.

"The Sioux are much more numerous than the Chippeways, and would have overpowered them long since, had the operations of the former been simultaneous; but they are divided into so many different bands, and are scattered over such an extensive country, that their efforts have no regular combination.

"Believing it equally inconsistent with humanity and sound policy that these border contests should be suffered to continue, satisfied that government would approve of any plan of pacification which might be adopted, and feeling that the Indians have a full portion of moral and physical evils, without adding to them the calamities of a war, which had no definite object, and no probable termination, on our arrival at Sandy lake, I proposed to the Chippeway chiefs that a deputation should accompany us to the mouth of St. Peter's, with a view to establish a permanent peace between them and the Sioux. The Chippeways readily acceded to this proposition, and ten of their principal men descended the Mississippi with us.

"The computed distance from Sandy lake to the St. Peter's is six hundred miles; and a considerable proportion of the country has been the theatre of hostile enterprises. The Mississippi here traverses the immense plains which extend to the Missouri, and which present to the eye a spectacle at once interesting and fatiguing. Scarcely the slightest variation in the surface occurs, and they are entirely destitute of timber. In this debatable land, the game is very abundant. Buffaloes, elks and deer range unharmed and unconscious of harm. The mutual hostilities of the Chippeways and Sioux render it dangerous for either, unless in strong parties, to visit this portion of the country. The consequence has been a great increase of all the animals whose flesh is used for food, or whose fur is valuable for market. We found herds of buffaloes quietly feeding upon the plains. There is little difficulty in approaching sufficiently near to kill them. With an eagerness which is natural to all hunters, and with an improvidence which always attends these excursions, the animal is frequently killed without any necessity, and no other part is then preserved but the tongue.

"There is something extremely novel and interesting in this pursuit. The immense plain, extending as far as the eye can reach, is spotted here and there with droves of buffaloes. The distance and the absence of known objects render it difficult to estimate the size or the number of these animals. The hunters approach cautiously, keeping to the leeward, lest the buffaloes, whose scent is very acute, should observe them. The moment the gun is fired, the buffaloes scatter and scour the field in every direction. Unwieldy as they appear they move with celerity. It is difficult to divert them from their course, and the attempt is always hazardous. One of our party barely escaped with his life from this act of temerity. The hunters, who are stationed upon different parts of the plain, fire as the animals pass them. The repeated discharge of guns in every direction, the shouts of those who are engaged in the pursuit, and the sight of the buffaloes at full speed on every side, give an animation to the scene, which is rarely equalled.

"The droves which we saw were comparatively small. Some of the party, whom we found at St. Peter's, and who had arrived at that place by land from the Council Bluffs, estimated one of the droves which they saw to contain two thousand buffaloes.

"As we neared this part of the country, we found our Chippeway friends cautious and observing. The flag of the United States was flying upon all our canoes, and, thanks to the character which our country acquired by the events of the last war, I found, in our progress through the whole Indian country, after we had once left the great line of communication, that this flag was a passport, which rendered our journey safe. We consequently felt assured that no wandering party of the Sioux would attack even their enemies while under our protection. But the Chippeways could not appreciate the influence which the American flag would have upon other nations, nor is it probable that they estimated with much accuracy the motives which induced us to assume the character of an umpire.—

The Chippeways landed occasionally to examine whether any of the Sioux had recently visited that quarter. In one of these excursions, a Chippeway found in a conspicuous place a piece of birch bark, made flat by being fastened between two sticks at each end, and about eighteen inches long by fifteen broad. This bark contained the answer of the Sioux nation to the proposition which had been made by the Chippeways for a termination of hostilities. So sanguinary has been the contest between these tribes, that no personal communication could take place. Neither the sanctity of the office, nor the importance of the message, could protect the ambassadors of either party from the vengeance of the other. Some time preceding, the Chippeways, anxious for the restoration of peace, had sent a number of their young men into these plains with a similar piece of bark, upon which they had represented their desire.

"This bark had been left hanging to a tree, in an exposed situation, and had been found and taken away by a party of the Sioux.

"The propositions had been examined and discussed in the Sioux villages, and the bark which we found contained their answer. The Chippeway who had prepared the bark for his tribe was with us; and, on our arrival at St. Peter's, finding that it was lost, I requested him to make another. He did so, and produced what, I have no doubt, was a perfect fac simile. The Chippeways explained to us, with great facility, the intention of the Sioux, and apparently with as much readiness as if some common character had been established between them.

"The junction of the St. Peter's with the Mississippi, where a principal part of the Sioux reside, was represented, and also the American fort, with a sentinel on duty, and the flag flying. The principal Sioux chief is named the Six, alluding, I believe, to the bands or villages under his influence. To show that he was not present at the deliberation upon the subject of peace, he was represented upon a smaller piece of bark, which was attached to the other. To identify him, he was drawn with six heads and a large medal. Another Sioux chief stood in the foreground, holding the pipe of peace in his right hand, and his weapons in his left. Even we could not misunderstand that, like our own eagle with the olive branch and arrows, he was desirous of peace, but prepared for war.

"The Sioux party contained fifty-nine warriors, and this number was indicated by fifty-nine guns, which were drawn upon one corner of the bark.—The only subject which occasioned any difficulty in the interpretation of the Chippeways, was owing to an incident, of which they were ignorant.

"The encampment of our troops had been removed from the low grounds upon the St. Peter's to a high hill upon the Mississippi: two forts were therefore drawn upon the bark, and the solution of this enigma could not be discovered until our arrival at St. Peter's. The effect of the discovery of this bark upon the minds of the Chippeways was visible and immediate. Their doubts and apprehensions appeared to be removed, and during the residue of the journey, their conduct and feelings were completely changed.

"The Chippeway bark was drawn in the same general manner, and Sandy lake, the principle place of their residence, was represented with much accuracy. To remove any doubt respecting, a view was given of the old north west establishment, situated upon its shore, and now in the possession of the American Fur company. No proportion was preserved in their attempt at delineation. One mile of the Mississippi, including the mouth of the St. Peter's, occupied as much space as the whole distance to Sandy lake, nor was there any thing to show that one part was nearer to the spectator than another; yet the object of each party was completely obtained. Speaking languages radically different from each other—for the Sioux constitute one of three general divisions, into which the early French writers have arranged the aborigines of our country, while the Chippeways are a branch of what they call the Algonquins—and without any conventional character established between them, these savages had thus opened a communication upon the most important subject which could occupy their attention. Propositions leading to a peace were made and accepted, and the simplicity of the mode could only be equalled by the distinctness of the representations, and by the ease with which they were understood.

"An incident like this, of rare occurrence at this day, and throwing some light upon the mode of communication before the invention of letters, excited in us all, as may be expected, the greatest interest. It is only necessary to add, that on our arrival at St. Peter's, we found that colonel Leavenworth had been as attentive and indefatigable upon this subject, as upon every other which fell within the sphere of his command.

"During the preceding winter he had visited a tribe of the Chippeways upon this Pacific mission, and had, with the aid of the agent, Mr. Taliaferro, prepared the minds of both tribes for a permanent peace. The Sioux and Chippeways met in council, at which we all attended, and smoked the pipe of peace together. They then, as they say in their figurative language, buried the tomahawk, so deep that it could never be dug up again, and our Chippeway friends departed well satisfied with the result of their mission.

"We discovered a remarkable coincidence, as well in the sound as in the application, between a word in the Sioux language and one in our own. The circumstance is so singular, that I deem it worthy of notice. The Sioux call the falls of St. Anthony, Ha-ha, and the pronunciation is in every respect similar to the same word in the English language. I could not learn that this word was used for any other purpose; and I believe it is confined in its application to that place alone.

"The traveller, in ascending the Mississippi, turns a projecting point, and these falls suddenly appear before him at a short distance. Every man, savage or civilized, must be struck with the magnificent spectacle which immediately opens to his view. There is an assemblage of objects, which, added to the solitary grandeur of the scene, to the height of the cataract, and to the eternal roar of its waters, inspire the spectator with awe and admiration.

"In his anecdotes of painting, it is stated by Horace Walpole, that "on the invention of fosses for boundaries, the common people call them Ha! Ha! to express their surprise at finding a sudden and unperceived check to their walk." I believe the word is yet used in this manner in England.

"It is certainly not a little remarkable that the same word should be thus applied by one of the most civilized and by one of the most barbarous people, to objects which, although not the same, were yet calculated to excite the admiration of the observer.

"Nothing can show more clearly how fallacious are those deductions of comparative etymology which are founded upon a few words, carefully gleaned, here and there, from languages having no common origin, and which are used by people who have neither connexion nor intercourse. The common descent of two nations can never be traced by the accidental consonance of a few syllables or words, and the attempt must lead us into the regions of fancy.

"The Sioux language is probably one of the most barren which is spoken by any of our aboriginal tribes. Col. Leavenworth, who made considerable proficiency in it, calculated, I believe, that the number of words did not exceed one thousand. They use more gestures in their conversation than any Indians I have seen, and this is a necessary result of the poverty of their language."

POLITICS OF THE DAY—MR. FORWARD'S LETTER.

At a meeting of the democratic citizens of Alleghany county, held at the Washington Coffee House, in Pittsburgh, on Saturday evening the 16th instant, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas it is at all times proper that the people should be fully apprised of the political sentiments of those whom they are called upon to elevate by their suffrages to places of high trust—that they should know whether, in the event of success crowning their efforts, they are to find in their candidates men faithful to those interests and willing to carry out those principles which they revere. And whereas, at the present crisis in the politics of this state, when corruption has taken possession of the government, it is most peculiarly incumbent upon the friends of liberty to be jealously awake on the opinions of those whom they support for office—to vote for no man who does not fearlessly and openly advocate the measures and sustain the principles and men of the democracy of the country. And whereas, since the nominations of our candidates for election to the state convention to amend the constitution, questions have arisen and are now agitating the public mind which were not at the time of those nominations thought of by the people, and upon which question it is right and proper that the sentiments of our candidates should be known—questions, among others, embracing how far that convention may have the power to protect the liberties of the people from the control of an irresponsible moneyed power—

Therefore resolved—1st That be a committee to address the gentlemen on the democratic ticket for the convention with a view to ascertain their sentiments in reference to the men and leading measures of the democratic party.

2d. Resolved, That the several candidates be, in particular, requested to express their opinions upon the following questions—

First. Will you vote the electoral ticket pledged to support Martin Van Buren and Richard M. Johnson?

Second. Will the convention about to assemble to amend the constitution of the state, possess the power to annul the charter of the bank of the United States?

Third. If the convention have the power to annul the charter of the bank of the United States, will it be, in your opinion, expedient to annul it, and will you vote in favor of doing so?

3d. Resolved, That when this meeting adjourns, it will adjourn to meet in this place on Thursday evening the 20th instant, at which time the committee appointed under the provisions of the first resolution shall make report.

In pursuance of the above resolutions, the following correspondence took place between the committee appointed under the first resolution and Mr. Forward:

Pittsburgh, Oct. 18, 1836.

Waller Forward, esq. SIR: The undersigned, a committee appointed in compliance with the requisition of the first of the foregoing resolutions, respectfully request your views in answer to the questions embraced within the second resolution; and also your views in answer to the contemplated reform in the executive, judicial and legislative departments of the government, which last inquiry is suggested by the first resolution as pointing to the leading measures of the democratic party.

The committee hope to be in possession of your answer so as to be able to make report to the meeting to be held agreeably to the last of the foregoing resolutions. Respectfully, your fellow citizens, Pittsburgh, October, 20, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I received your note of the 18th inst. conveying the preamble and resolutions adopted by a meeting held on the Saturday preceding.—My constant engagements in the district court of the United States, during the last two days, have prevented my attention to the subject of those resolutions, except in the weary interval of its recess. My reply is therefore written in haste, and without the precision and method which further time would have enabled me to give to it.

The democratic delegates thought proper while I was absent in a neighboring county, to place me on their ticket as a candidate for the convention.—I had no previous notice of their kind intentions towards me—the nomination was unsolicited and unconditional. It had been dictated, as I supposed by a single reference to the subject of constitutional reform—the only subject that can rightfully occupy the deliberations of a convention. In accepting it, I had no idea that as soon as the October election should be over, I would be required to subscribe to opinions, and to give pledges in regard to questions which the preamble to the resolutions admits to have been indifferent at the time of my nomination.

I am very distinctly informed in said preamble, that at the date of the nomination, the questions propounded by you "were not thought of by the people," but that they "have arisen since that time, and are now agitating the public mind." This is assigned as the reason for the call made upon me at this late period. Professing the highest consideration for those who attended the meeting, and for each of you, gentlemen, personally, I must be allowed to say, that both they and you have fallen into a small mistake. The high claims of Messrs. Van Buren and Johnson to the presidency and vice presidency, are no new matters. The extraordinary merits of those gentlemen, and the necessity of their election to save the country from ruin, were quite as loudly and strenuously asserted before the nomination as afterwards; and you well know, gentlemen, that for several weeks prior to the October elections, this new question, as it is called, of annulling the bank by the convention, was not only "thought of by the people," but made a subject of vehement party declamation.

I am therefore constrained most respectfully to say to you that the reasons for changing the grounds of my nomination, and attaching new conditions to my continuance upon the ticket, are to my mind very unsatisfactory. I think it highly probable that the importance and the equity of these new conditions are not yet discovered by the delegates from the country, by whom I was nominated, and that they may yet be inclined to hesitate and ponder the matter very seriously, before they exclude a candidate from their favor, because he denies the power of the convention to annul charters, and destroy private property. I am confident that at the time I was nominated, the reform of the constitution was not considered a party matter. I have never regarded it in that light, and no consideration shall ever induce me to enter the convention as a party man.

Before the passage of the act of assembly for calling a convention, our public meetings upon that subject were attended by all parties—the committees were selected from all parties. At the several conferences held by the committee last appointed, and of which I was a member, the impropriety and danger of converting the reform of the constitution into a party question, were frequently mentioned and unanimously admitted. I have acted upon these principles ever since, and will continue to act upon them, until persuaded by better reasons than any I have yet heard, to take a different course.

Constitutions are designed to secure the rights and liberties of individuals by fundamental laws—by laws which shall curb the power of triumphant majorities. We all know, and are sometimes made to feel that dominant parties are generally willing to make the most of their power, and that one object to be gained by amending the constitution is to restrict their capacity and means of corruption and tyranny.

I have no doubt that these were the sentiments of the gentlemen by whom I was nominated, and that they will hear with surprise, that the reform of our constitution is to be made subservient to the fortunes of presidential candidates. Their surprise will increase, when they find party politics completely superceding and excluding every question of constitutional reform, from a large public meeting assembled with reference to that very matter; and that in the preamble and resolutions of that meeting, the subject of reform is not even mentioned.

The questions submitted to me by the meeting, refer to the vote which I intend to give at the election of electors in November, and to my opinions as to the power and duty of the convention to annul the charter of the bank of the United States.—The latter will be first attended to. Charters obtained by imposition and fraud, may be annulled upon proof of the fact. If the charter in question were thus obtained, it can and ought to be repealed, and were a general law passed constituting a tribunal for the trial of cases of this sort, the question of fraud might be heard and determined without delay. I will add that the charge of corruption having been made and reiterated, I think a rigorous inquiry should be had as early as possible; and if the fact be established, let the bank be crushed at once.

The act of assembly creating the bank has guarded against the abuse of its privileges by expressly reserving to the legislature and the supreme court, the power to cause examinations to be made of its books and papers, to put its officers under oath; and if it shall be found upon a trial by jury, that the charter has been violated, to declare it void. Thus far there is no need of the extraordinary powers of a convention. The agency of that body is only needed when charters have been honestly obtained, and are to be destroyed without a trial by the resistless force of its own mere will: and the question propounded to me is simply this, whether in virtue of this, its sovereign will, it can crush and annihilate the bank of the United States, although the charter may have been fairly procured, and the bank itself honestly administered.

I answer that it cannot: First, because the people who in October, 1835, voted for the calling of a convention, expressly limited its powers. The language of their votes were as follows:—"For a convention to submit its proceedings to a vote of the people." It is obvious that annulling a charter cannot be an amendment of the constitution; and if it were, it would be liable to be nullified by the people themselves.

Secondly, assuming that the convention will be clothed with all the authority, rights, powers and privileges that the people can impart, still it cannot annul charters. Every body knows, and even partisans do not deny that a charter is a contract between the government and individuals, and has all the essential attributes of any other contract. It is also admitted that the state of Pennsylvania has full power to grant charters, and that in the absence of a reservation of a power for that purpose, neither the legislature nor the courts can repeal them, unless obtained by fraud, or forfeited by mal-practice.—No one will dispute that bank stock, canal stock and bridge stock are private property, in the same sense and for the same ends, namely, profit and income, as notes, bonds, mortgages, furniture, houses, or lands.

It is conceded that the annulling of charters is the destruction of contracts, and the annihilation of vested rights of property. The question, therefore, in its plain and naked terms, is just this, can a majority of the people invest a body of delegates with the power to annul contracts, and destroy vested private rights? I take the negative side of this question, for the following reasons:

Because there are just twenty-five states of the union pledged to the defence of every man, woman and child in Pennsylvania against the exercise of such a power; and though we may cut ourselves loose from them by a sweeping act of nullification, yet the government of the union, which for this purpose holds the power of those states, will take special care, as in the case of South Carolina, that our audacious usurpation and tyranny be seasonably put down. Be pleased, gentlemen, to read the following section of the ninth article of the constitution of the United States: "No state shall enter into any treaty, alliance or confederation, grant letters of marque or reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold or silver coin a tender in payment of debts, pass any bills of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts." The prohibition contained in this clause of the federal constitution is explicit and direct, and admits of but one evasion, namely, that Pennsylvania, when represented in the convention, will cease to be a "state," a condition to which I admit she would be degraded by a body of delegates declared by the people themselves to be absolutely lawless.

The clause prohibiting state governments from passing laws impairing contracts has been enforced by the supreme court of the United States, in every instance where the validity of such laws has been brought in question; and unless the judges of that court shall become the profligate instruments of faction, the same rule will be observed in future. In a contest before that court, the question will be whether the obligation of a contract has been impaired, and the state of Pennsylvania can only succeed by shewing that her grant of the charter in consideration of several millions of dollars, either paid or to be paid by the stockholders of the bank, was not a contract with those stockholders. Her position may be readily conceived by those who are apprised that the supreme court has repeatedly decided that charters are contracts, and therefore secure against violation by state governments. Parties before that court are upon a footing of equality; and the fact that a state legislature which is supposed to represent the wisdom and intelligence of the people has made an imprudent bargain will furnish no ground of relief. The answer to such a plea would be that states, like individuals, must submit to the consequences of their own bargains, and, like individuals, content themselves with the resolution to look more sharply in future.

Violent parties, in their zeal for victory, are too apt to countenance false principles and false reasoning. It cannot be the interest of an American citizen, a freeman, that the exorbitant and savage power of breaking lawful contracts and destroying private rights, without compensation, should anywhere exist. It is his interest that such a power be sternly denied, and the attempt to exercise it universally repelled: For the fate of others to-day may be his fate to-morrow; and the property of the citizen can never be safe so long as party conflicts are permitted to involve the right to enjoy it. My opinion is that the stockholders of the bank gave too little for their charter, and that in the term of its duration it should have had no advantage over the other state banks. But I know that the act granting the charter is constitutional, and that, unless procured by fraud, the people, of whom I am one, are bound by it. Why should it be otherwise? Can any one give a reason why the force of a contract should depend upon the numbers that may constitute one of the parties to it—why the stronger party should be allowed to say one thing and mean another—should be permitted to keep or break its stipulations according as a majority may decide?—

An individual claiming this privilege would be set down as a knave. The obligation of a contract is a moral obligation, and therefore just as binding upon governments and communities, represented by governments, as upon individuals. A contrary doctrine substitutes force in the place of right, and, however disguised, is an attack upon liberty.

But is it not presumptuous to deny the right of a majority of the people to nullify their contract?—Is not their power sovereign and unlimited? These questions are answered by another—do you deny the competency of the people to make a contract? If you do not; then I ask, upon what reason of natural justice or common honesty they should be at liberty to break it, when made. A bond signed by five thousand or five millions would be no less binding than if executed by one. Payment might be withheld because no earthly tribunal could enforce it; but the perfidy and injustice would be none the less flagrant.

The legislature which granted the bank charter was clothed with limited powers; but to the extent of those powers, it represented the people and could bind them. It is for this reason, that the charter is constitutional. In other words, the power to grant it, was delegated by the people. It is therefore their own act—just as much so as if done by a convention or themselves. If a man were to come into court to annul the sale of his goods made under a power of attorney, given for that purpose, upon the ground that the power, although quite sufficient to transfer the goods, did not extend to lands—he would be treated as insane. But it seems that when the people confer an authority to bind them in one matter, they make void private rights acquired under it, for the strange reason, that their sovereign power in reference to other matters, had been withheld.

I should be pleased to hear some one define what is meant by the expression "sovereign power." Is it a power of confounding moral distinctions—of transmuting wrong into right—of annihilating truth and justice? I understand those who contend for the power of the convention to annul charters—to speak of its rightful power, and not of the mere sway of the strongest. True, it is said that the people may abolish their government; in this instance, however, they neither propose nor intend to do it. But if they did, and the government were actually abolished, the right of property would not be the mercy of the convention. The same declaration of rights, which proclaims that all power is inherent in the people, and that they may alter or abolish their government, asserts that "all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of acquiring, possessing and protecting property." These rights are antecedent to all political government, and are no more subject to the will of a convention, than the right of breathing the air or beholding the sun.

It is to be recollected that it is not the solitary power of destroying the bank of the United States, that is ascribed to the convention, but a power to destroy all charters annihilate all vested rights. If there be any exception, let the friends of absolute power point it out, and let them fix the limits that shall circumscribe the omnipotence of the convention. No such limit can be assigned. The power to annul charters, is the power to annul patents for lands; and if either the one or the other can be done by the convention, they may expel us from our houses and rob us of our goods. It happens that it is now made a party question whether the bank of the United States shall be allowed to exist. We may find it next year made a party question whether the people shall be prevented from crossing our bridges without paying toll, or whether public lands sold for a tenth part of their value, should not revert to the state. The attempt to distinguish between the kinds of property that may be seized, or to soothe us with the hope that ours may be spared by popular favor, will not have the effect of quieting our fears. I dare say the convention would be satisfied with the destruction of the bank, but if the rights of one class of citizens can be invaded with impunity, the rights of all others are in jeopardy.

In regard to this odious bank, I have not, and never had a particle of interest in it, other than that which belongs to every citizen, I never owned a dollar's worth of its stock, nor received or solicited its accommodation. If its charter was obtained by foul means, I shall be as willing as any one of you to see it annulled. But when I am called on to admit that innocent stockholders in that institution can be deprived of their vested rights by the mere will of a convention, my repugnance is invincible. I cannot be accessory to any such measure. I deny the right of any majority, however overwhelming, to touch their property, without making them a just compensation. Even the threat of so great an outrage, appears to me, to be a ground for general alarm.

You request me to state whether I will vote for the electors nominated by the friends of Martin Van Buren and Richard M. Johnson. I do not see what bearing my opinion of those gentlemen can have upon the question of amending the constitution, but I have no desire that it should be concealed. There are circumstances which are obvious to you all, that would impel me to support Martin Van Buren, if such support could be consistently rendered. But finding his name connected with principles which appear to me to militate against the public good, and to weaken the security of private property, I shall vote against him.

My opinions upon the subject of constitutional reform mentioned in your letter, must be already known to the most of you. I would take from the governor, all power of appointment. Justices of the peace should be elected by the people and hold their offices for a term of years. The people should also elect their prothonotary, register, recorder and other county officers. State officers and the judges of the supreme court and inferior courts might be elected by a vote of both houses of the legislature. Whether the tenure of the office of the inferior judges, should be changed is a question of some difficulty, but I incline to the change, and as at present advised would vote for the term of ten years. I am for limiting the eligibility of the executive to the term of three years, so that no governor could be tempted from the strict line of his duty by the hope of re-election.

The evils of excessive banking, and improvident granting of charters, call for restrictions. Let the convention provide that no bank charters be granted, unless notice of the intended application be given six months prior to the session of the legislature, and not then unless a majority of two-thirds of both houses be in favor of the measure.

I am, with great respect, gentlemen, yours, &c.

COL. DODGE'S EXPEDITION TO THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

From the Natchez (Miss.) Free Trader.

We have now lying on our table a report of the secretary of war, transmitting to the senate a detailed account of col. Dodge's expedition to the Rocky Mountains, during the summer of 1835; accompanying which are two elegant maps of the entire region of country occupied by the various tribes of Indians west of the Mississippi.

Col. Dodge, with his company of dragoons, departed from fort Leavenworth on the 29th of May, 1835, travelling a north westerly course till he struck the river Platte, and then following the course of that river to its source in the Rocky Mountains. From thence they pursued a south easterly direction in a line parallel with the mountains, until they arrived at Pike's Peak, with its snow-clad summit towering to the skies. Near the foot of this mountain they discovered a boiling spring of mineral water, possessing properties similar to those of Saratoga, New York. From this place it is but two days' ride to the waters of the Rio del Norte, but three to Taos, one of the Mexican provinces.

After a short encampment, they took their line of march for the Arkansas, and, arriving at which, they followed its course until they intersected the Great Wagon road from St. Louis to Santa Fe; pursuing this, they arrived at Fort Leavenworth on the 16th of September, after an absence of scarcely four months, having performed a journey of one thousand six hundred miles, through a wilderness heretofore unexplored, save by the savages who inhabit it. And what is most remarkable, the expedition, passing through the midst of warring tribes of Indians, was completed with the loss of only one man, who died of a severe sickness but two or three days before their return.

Col. Dodge has visited and held personal interviews with all the Indian tribes in the country through which they passed. He states that they all received him in the most friendly manner, expressed sentiments of the highest respect for the whites, and declared their determination to be at peace with their "great father," the president.

This is certainly an extraordinary expedition. A small party of 117 men have made the tour of an almost interminable wilderness, inhabited by an unknown number of savages, made overtures of peace with them all, and returned to their homes with the loss of a single man. Such success exceeds by far the most sanguine expectations.

Gen. Gaines, in a letter addressed to gen. Jones, of Washington city, advises the presentation of a sword to col. Dodge, a brace of pistols to each of his commissioned officers, and a month's extra pay to each of the non-commissioned officers and soldiers. Such a mark of approbation will scarcely be withheld from the brave performers of such distinguished service.

One of the maps accompanying this report of the secretary of war shows the lands assigned to the emigrating Indians, with their boundaries and the numbers of each tribe, according to the following statistics:

FOREIGN CHRONICLE.

Doctor William Henry, who, as a chemist, has obtained so distinguished a name in the scientific world, recently committed suicide in the chapel of his own residence at Peindlebury, during a severe fit of nervous irritation.

Henry's chemistry is the most clear and satisfactory compend of that interesting science now used; and while his death is a great loss to his profession, its cause is a source of condolence to society.

Miss Martineau, the celebrated writer on political economy, is now on a visit to London. It is said she has a book in press in which she will attempt to discuss the question of slavery in the U. States.

The privilege of free export into England of the produce of the vine of Guernsey has been granted.—It is estimated that 60 pipes are annually produced of the flavor of good sherry.

The new steamer Unicorn, on the line between Liverpool and Glasgow, has two engines of 130 horse power each. Her interior arrangements are said to be very superior and her cost is estimated at £37,000.

Steamers in the Mediterranean. A French company have ten splendid steamers prepared in the port of Marseilles, each 500 tons, and magnificently fitted up in the English mode, to ply regularly in two lines, one from Marseilles to Constantinople, and the other from Athens to Constantinople. They will intersect each other at the little island of Syra, and exchange passengers and despatches. Between Marseilles and Constantinople they will touch at Leghorn, Civita Vecchia, Naples, Messina, Malta, Syra and Smyrna.

The sale of liquors on Sabbath days at fairs in Ireland has been forbidden by the vice-regent of that country. Would it not be better to prevent the fairs on that day and cut off the evil at the root?

The dowry which the king of Naples is to receive on his marriage with Louis Philippe's daughter, Clementine, will amount, it is said, to six millions of francs.

Queen Christina of Spain, more anxious to provide against, than to suffer the consequences of her contingent dethronement, has prudently remitted to her bankers at Paris, 2,800,000 francs; this is independent of 800,000 francs invested at Amsterdam and a greater amount than both, placed in London.

One of the greatest curiosities near Paris is the royal tombs in the little abbey church of St. Denis.—There are already 51 tombs of kings and royal personages completely restored in the vaults; 25 are still wanting to complete the series from Clovis to Henry IV. From the latter king to Louis XVI., the tombs have still to be done. This restoration is confided to M. Blouet.

Among many ladies who have been balloted for and admitted as members of the London Horticultural society, was lady Cavendish. At the same meeting was exhibited a melon weighing 20 lbs.; a box of figs from a tree 40 years old; a dish of apples preserved in saw dust since last autumn; a new species of the Mecuna flower, producing more than 50 spikes over 20 inches long and extending over an area of 300 square feet of glass; a melon raised on the plan adopted in Cashmere.

Two Persians are said to have lately visited England to purchase a machine for spinning cotton, to be introduced into their country. Machinery is the very thing for those eastern climes where manual labor is considered such a punishment.

The Barham, one of the finest frigates in the British service, sent to convey colonel Considine to Constantinople, passed the Dardanelles prepared for action, determined to resist any attempt to impede her progress.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

Mr. Hackett, our national comedian, having, at the persuasion of his friends, visited Dublin, (on his second professional trip to Europe) to ascertain the validity of his claim to a title and estate of which it was supposed he was possessed, applied to the garter king at arms and was apprised that the claims were undoubted, and that his progenitors, who were barons in their own right, emigrated to Holland nearly a century and a half since, to fight in the wars of the states general. After this interview, Mr. Hackett proceeded to the Hague and met with the individual he was in search of: this was baron Von Hackett, upon whose demise Mr. H. claims his succession. The baron has no family, and in all probability the representative of colonel Nimrod Wildfire will, in due course of time, be metamorphosed from a whipper of wild cats into a Dutch baron.

At the last term of the court of sessions in New York, twelve young men of respectable appearance and some of them respectably allied, were convicted of aggravated felonies and subjected to various terms of imprisonment from 2 to 12 years. A comb factory has been recently established at Pittsburgh, by Mr. David Abby, which is no less indicative of the general improvement of the west than the various other mechanical establishments in that city. The store is represented as a perfect picture gallery, and the factory even now produces, annually, articles to the amount of from $8,000 to $10,000.

The gravity with which the accommodations attendant upon our future narrow habitations at the Laurel Hill cemetery, in Philadelphia, are spoken of in one of the papers of that city, is truly exemplary and consoling.

"The first interment took place at the Laurel Hill cemetery yesterday morning. It is but a year since the company was formed, for accommodating this community with a beautiful rural burying ground; and we understand that in two weeks from this time the subscribers will choose their lots and commence their improvements."

Rapid travelling. Some short time since, a gentleman breakfasted at Fall river, came to Providence, proceeded by rail road to Boston, there transacted his business; took the cars back to Providence, thence went by steamboat to New York, where he took breakfast and proceeded for Philadelphia, where he arrived in season to dine: thus, in the short space of 34 hours, travelling about 380 miles.

From the sales of these fish the worthy minister received about five hundred dollars, upon which he brought up a numerous family, educating them his husband fitted one of his sons for Harvard college.

The town of Rochester, N. Y. is probably the greatest flour manufactory in the world. The flour mills are masses of stone edifices, some of them eight stories high and 300 feet in length; 20,000 bushels of wheat are required daily to keep them in operation; 5,000 barrels of flour can be daily put up for market, and it is calculated that during the year ending the 1st August last 600,000 barrels of flour have been sent to market, worth about four millions of dollars.

Since 1803 there have been built at Medford, Mass. about 100 ships, 70 brigs and 25 smaller craft. The town now stands probably at the head of the science of naval architecture in America.

The following is a description of the chandelier now being put up in the St. Charles theatre, New Orleans. Its weight is 2 tons, 1 qr. and 19 lbs.; and it is composed of 23 cwt. of brass, 9 cwt. of iron, and 9 cwt. of out glass—the last being in 23,600 pieces. It is emblematic of the United States, containing in the top border a compartment of 26 eagles and stars, surmounted by a gilded cornice of fleur de lis. In diameter below it is 12 feet; and from the topmost ornament to the bottom it is also 12. It will be lighted with gas by 176 burners; yet instead of a blaze, the effect will be that of a soft moonlight."

It was manufactured in London, and cost $10,000.

WAR IN FLORIDA. We publish some interesting details of the progress of the fall campaign against the Florida Indians—from which it will be seen, that the operations of gen. Call have been checked by the want of provisions! at the moment when an opportunity presented itself of prosecuting the war successfully. We are not sufficiently advised of all the particulars relative to this omission to say on whom censure should rest—but there has evidently been criminal neglect somewhere, that must increase the public indignation against the "bungling" management that has caused the loss of so many valuable lives, and the wasteful expenditure of large sums of money. In the battles which have been fought, there has been exhibited as much personal bravery as ever characterized our officers and soldiers; but though personal bravery may overcome obstacles interposed by nature, it cannot always conquer the more formidable ones caused by neglect and inefficiency. The reputation of the army has not suffered, but the country is mortified and ashamed that, while boasting of our means to redress wrongs which may be committed by foreign nations, we do not chastise the ruthless savage who inflicts the most horrid barbarities within our territory. If the war had originated with a foreign nation on a question of boundary, would we not well merit the taunts of our opponents at the lack of zeal which has been manifested?—originating in private cruelty and vengeance, should we be surprised that the savage foe has met indifference with defiance?

Since the above was in type we learn from the Intelligencer of Thursday last, that an officer of general Call's army passed through Washington on Tuesday last, on his way to Philadelphia, for the purpose of obtaining supplies for the Florida army, of which it was nearly destitute! He stated that, amongst the other untoward circumstances attending general Call's advance to the Wythlacoochee, was the loss of six hundred horses!!!

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 3d, 1836.—In compliance with the resolution of the senate of the first of July last, directing that, "during the ensuing recess of congress, the secretary of the treasury cause to be published, at the commencement of each month, a statement of the amount of money in the treasury subject to draft, and also the amount standing to the credit of disbursing officers," the undersigned hereby gives public notice that "the amount of money in the treasury subject to draft," as shown by the running account of the treasurer, was, on the 31st ult. $42,617,801.33-100; and "the amount standing to the credit of disbursing officers," as shown by the latest returns received, was $4,823,119.94-00. Of the amount of money in the treasury subject to draft, the sum of $601,400.78-100 belongs to special trusts, and is not applicable to the public service. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the treasury.

BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN TENNESSEE AND MISSISSIPPI. The committee of the legislature, at present in session, to whom the message of the governor touching this subject was submitted, has reported the following resolutions:

Resolved by the general assembly of the state of Tennessee, That the executive of this state forthwith open a correspondence with the executive of the state of Mississippi, for the purpose of ascertaining officially whether the line run by the late commissioners on the part of the two states, has ever been ratified by any act or declaration of the constituted authorities of that state; and that the executive, if the same has not been ratified, be requested to bring the subject matter to the consideration of the legislature of that state, at the earliest date with a request, on the part of this state, that the line ascertained by the commissioners be ratified; and thereby put an end to all future doubt and controversy.

Resolved, further, That the executive of this state report to this legislature such information as he may acquire in relation thereto, if the same is procured before the adjournment of this body, and, if not, to the next session of the legislature.

Mr. Martin has introduced into the house of representatives a bill to appropriate a part of the surplus revenue to the survey of a central rail road through the state.

INDIANA IMPROVEMENTS. A grand festival took place at Brookville, Indiana, on the 18th ult. to mark the commencement of the White Water canal. Upwards of 4,000 persons, it is estimated, were present, among whom were some of the most distinguished citizens of the state. The work, or a great portion of it, was put under contract the next day at Lawrenceburg.

NEW YORK AMERICAN INSTITUTE. The recent fair of the New York American Institute offered one of the most triumphant evidences of the success of American industry and ingenuity, that has yet been witnessed, and called forth admiration and applause from many thousand spectators, who felt the true American feeling when gazing upon the countless variety of useful and beautiful articles manufactured by their countrymen. Our limits will not permit us to notice the articles in detail; but the following from the New York "Star" will afford our readers some idea of their variety and value, and the rich fruits of that system which was successfully built up by a few individuals, in despite of the most powerful opposition that was ever encountered. They have been forgotten in the general prosperity which has resulted from their labors—but the proud consciousness that they have consummated the independence of their country and advanced the comfort and happiness of the people, is too rich a reward to be marred by reflections upon the heartlessness of individuals, who were sycophantic in their adulations, when their interests were in jeopardy.

"Prolonged as our account of the abundant and extraordinary products of ingenuity this year exhibited by the institute is, we must be indulged in a few reflections which irresistibly press themselves upon our mind in wandering through the labyrinth of the saloon, where the articles were gorgeously spread out to the gaze of the thronging crowds who were daily and nightly attracted to this spot. There never has been before so great a display of elegant and useful objects, and of course never such pressing multitudes of people curious to behold them. These exhibitions may now be said to have attained a permanent foothold in the public estimation, as it is clearly perceived that the competition which has been excited by the opportunity it gives all kinds of trades to make their industry and genius known, and to have their reputation stamped with the premiums of approbation awarded, has extended throughout every part of our country. It is established now beyond a doubt that our population of some 15 millions possesses sufficient enterprise and mental capacity to do what any other nation has accomplished, if not much more, in all the useful arts, if not also in the ornamental. And that therefore we can supply ourselves with the products of our own domestic industry without servilely depending on foreign aid. It is true that many who enter into the lists in these exhibitions are foreigners who have settled in our country; but the very success they meet with, the liberality with which they are treated, and the encouragement given to them, alike in every respect to that bestowed on native born citizens, is proof positive that if much of the highly finished work presented is not literally by American hands, it is fostered by American protection, and ever finds a ready market for what it offers—which shows also that there is a fixed resolution in our countrymen always to give the preference to that which is of domestic production. This is an immense point gained, and we hope the beneficent and noble example of the New York institute will widely spread over our country, and that general fairs to last much longer than these exhibitions do, will be established in every important city and town—a plan in which we may wisely copy a custom for ages adopted throughout Europe.

"In cloth and cotton fabrics, especially the latter, in silk manufacture, hardware, cutlery, and instruments of every description, in harness, and especially in all kinds of beautiful and convenient carriages, in silver and plated ware, in many kinds of jewelry, (excluding watches which still come from abroad), and every thing pertaining to the hat manufacture, shoe making, book binding, not to say printing, (and excepting from this remark paper making), in pottery, machinery of every kind, so far as respects ingenuity of combination, but not finish of workmanship, in which latter we fall short of England, as we do also, in articles of finery, fall behind the French, and hope to do so for a time, such as ornamental lace work, clocks, confectionery, embroidery, perfumery, painting and sculpture, in every species of useful agricultural implement, and utensils employed in agriculture and in the ordinary arts and uses of life, the Americans, with the exceptions stated, may now console themselves with the reflection that they have attained a perfection which can never retrograde, but must go onward, until, in the nature of things, and under the impulse of the wholesale stimulus of free laws and the protection and encouragement ever ready to be bestowed on talent and genius, we arrive at a position far surpassing what any other people have achieved. It is unnecessary to point to our immense commerce and the superior style of our ship building, to our rail road engineering and canals, to show what gigantic steps we have accomplished beyond the old world. All these grand natural improvements have necessarily and properly absorbed our minds more than the minor ambition to excel in some particular mechanic art or manufacture; but the day is fast approaching when every gap or chasm in productive industry in each specific branch will also, as our population becomes more dense and settled, and less migratory, be filled up and expanded out to the full measure of the dimensions which we are so fully capable of giving it, and when nothing will be left to render us the most independent, enterprising and happy people on the earth."

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. The republication of the following exhibit of the days in the present month, &c. when the presidential election is held in the respective states will be useful to our readers. In all the states, with the exception of South Carolina, whose electors are chosen by the legislature, the election is by general ticket; and by law the electors must be chosen within thirty-four days of the first of December, on which day they must meet in the respective capitols and give their votes for president and vice president. In Ohio and Pennsylvania the election was held on Friday last. In thirteen other states it is held on the 10th inst. Michigan having rejected the terms upon which it was agreed to admit her into the union, will not give her vote—and at the last dates Arkansas had not fixed upon a day for the election.

The above is the total, supposing Michigan to come in, and choose her electors in time for their assembling to give the vote of the state on the first Wednesday of December, which is the 7th day. If she should not do so, then the whole number of electors will be 291—of which, 146 will be necessary to a choice of president and vice president, by the people. Failing in this, the decision is carried to the house of representatives of the United States, where, voting by states, the choice is made from the three highest candidates.

FRANCE. We learn by an arrival at New York, which brought London papers to 23d of September, that general Bernard, formerly in the service of the United States, has been placed at the head of the war department. The other vacancies were filled as follows: M. Martin (du Nord), minister of agriculture, commerce and public works. M. Franck Carre, procureur general, in lieu of M. Martin. M. Herbert, deputy advocate general to the court of Cassation, in lieu of M. Carre; and a series of consequential minor removes. The division of the war department into two distinct branches, which has been effectively acted upon for some time, is confirmed. Lieutenant general Schramm has charge of the personnel and the military operations, with a seat at the board of council. M. Martineau de Chesnes has charge of the accounts and administration of the funds appropriated to the war department.

The projets de loi relative to customs duties are in future separated from the commercial department, and the financial minister is to bring them before the chamber. The minister of finances (M. Duchatel) is directed to take charge of the commercial portfolio until M. Martin's (du Nord) convalescence.

FROM TEXAS. New Orleans, Oct. 20. Through the politeness of a friend just arrived from Texas, we have been furnished with the Telegraph of the 8th instant, containing the proceedings of the first congress, and the message of president Burnet. The proceedings of congress are not as yet of much importance. The army at present consists of about 1,500 strong. The planters have returned to their plantations, and are actively engaged in the duties of the cultivation of the soil. The fiscal affairs of the nation are looking up; money is said to be plenty in the country, though the public treasury has been nearly empty for some time.

GREECE. It affords us great pleasure to learn that the schools at Athens have continued to flourish free from any molestation, and maintain the confidence and regard of the people, as well as of the government. While we rejoice also, at the restoration of those at the island of Syra from their temporary derangement, of which we have published Mrs. Robertson's interesting account, we trust that the first cause for the tumult, which had been directed against them, assigned in the following article which we transcribe from one of our morning papers, is without foundation.

"It appears that some troubles have taken place at Syra, in Greece, where an American school is established. We translate the following:—The circumstances which have occurred proceeded from two causes. On the one hand the teachers of the school had ventured to make some improper allusion to the religious opinions of their pupils; and on the other hand, some zealous fanatics have for a long time past in secret endeavored to irritate the public mind against the American schools. This is what has produced at Syra one of the most enlightened cities of Greece, such deplorable scenes. Judicial investigations are on foot."

RIOT AT THE INDIAN PAYMENT. We learn from the Logansport Telegraph that something very much like a riot happened at the Indian payment, near Logansport, on the 25th September. Some individuals, not exactly relishing the manner in which the commissioners (Messrs. G. W. Ewing and Cyrus Taber) appropriated about $4,000 dollars to satisfy their own claims, laid hands on the cash, and forbid the further "distribution of the surplus revenue," under the pains and penalties of the Lynch code. To use the language of the Telegraph, "a general rush was made towards the council house—some were for taking the money and distributing it among the Indians, saying that they would pay their own debts—others wished to have new commissioners appointed, as those appointed were too much interested; whilst others were for appointing commissioners to investigate the claims, with instructions to pay none but those that were proven to be just." From the last clause, it would appear that "instructions" were necessary to preserve the rights of the Indians—to prevent the payment of unjust claims! Messengers were despatched to Logansport and Peru for troops, and, in less than 24 hours, martial music, and all the "pomp and circumstance of war," was heard and seen in the vicinity of the treaty ground. The troops, on learning the true nature of the difficulty, refused to take any part, unless under the direct command of colonel Pepper, the Indian agent. This being done, the money was turned to a new commission, consisting of the venerable judge Polke and Messrs. E. V. Chicot, R. B. Stevenson and D. D. Pratt, who are to investigate the claims against the Indians, and pay out accordingly. This commission was in session at the last accounts from the "seat of war," but hopes were entertained that the new commissioners would put every thing straight between the unfortunate Indians and the honest speculators who deal so mercifully by them!

JOURNAL OF THE FRANKLIN INSTITUTE, AND MECHANIC'S REGISTER, FOR SEPTEMBER. We have more than once recorded our high opinion of the merits of this excellent magazine. The present number fully sustains the character of the work. A most amusing part of this publication is the space devoted to notices of new patents. It appears that the number issued in February was fifty-eight.—We extract the following interesting comparative table of speed, originally taken from the Physical and Chemical Journal of Science and the Arts of Husbandry in France.

TWENTY-FIVE LIVES LOST IN THE ST. LAWRENCE. During the late gale there was a great deal of damage done to the rafts that were passing down the St. Lawrence to Quebec. Lake St. Peter's is some fifty miles below Montreal, and its navigation very dangerous in bad weather. In addition to the loss of property, twenty-five persons have been drowned.

One raft of red and white pine, belonging to Messrs. Poupard and Raymond, totally wrecked, from which twelve men were lost, among whom were two brothers of Mr. Raymond. Another raft, the property of Messrs. Rogers & Thompson, of Perth, was found scattered upon the beach, and all of the crew, thirteen in number, have perished.—Eight of the latter crew were found upon the shore in an awful state of mutilation, amongst whom was the pilot Jeremiah Campbell, one of the oldest and most experienced pilots on the river.

*We believe this calculation to be incorrect. A stone cast with the strength of a man's arm will outstrip a hare.

GREAT FIRE IN NEWARK. It is with extreme regret that we have to announce a very destructive fire in Newark, New Jersey, which has destroyed property estimated at two hundred thousand dollars, about one-half of which, we understand, was insured. Of this sum, $25,000 is insured in the Mutual; $10,000 in the New Jersey, and $2,000 in the Mechanics' company of Newark; about $10,000 in the Hartford company, and about 30,000 dollars in the N. York and Philadelphia companies.

The fire commenced about 20 minutes past 8 on Friday afternoon, the 28th ult. in Ward's chandlery store, on the south side of Market street near the corner of Broad street, and owing to the difficulty of procuring a sufficient supply of water, it spread with fearful rapidity, east and west of Ward's premises, and by 8 o'clock in the evening two-thirds of the block, including all the buildings in Broad street, between Market and Mechanic street, about twenty buildings on Market street, and nearly as many more on the north side of Mechanic street, were razed to the ground—as were also about a dozen small wooden buildings, principally occupied by poor families, on the south side of the last mentioned street.

A gentleman named Morehouse, it is said, had suffered his policies of insurance to a large amount to expire without renewing them, two days before the catastrophe. Another warning, but which, like the many that have preceded it, it will be too frequently disregarded.

Lieut. Gedney of the U. S. surveying schooner New Jersey, and lieut. Dayton Williamson, who both went from Elizabethtown, to render all the aid in their power, were very instrumental, by blowing up buildings, in checking the flames. Want of water was the great complaint at this fire.

THE WILLIAM GIBBONS. According to a statement given to the editor of the Elizabeth City Herald, and published in that paper, the conduct of the crew of the Wm. Gibbons to the passengers was worse than that which might have been expected of highway robbers. The passengers were not, it seems, permitted to take their baggage on shore when they left the boat; but "some of the crew, the fireman particularly, got drunk, armed themselves with knives, and went to work, cutting open the trunks and other baggage, which they robbed of money, jewelry, clothing, and every thing else valuable, and then sank the trunks in the bottom of the boat. Even the dressing and other boxes belonging to the ladies did not escape them; which were also broken open and rifled of their contents. Such was the destitute condition of some of the passengers (says the Herald) on their arrival here, that they were obliged to make a loan to defray their expenses to Charleston; while these pirates (for they are no better) are gone off with their plunder."

One of the lady passengers begged these ruffians to let her have even a cloak bag, which contained some clothing for her infant, but it was refused! It is supposed that their plunder in money, jewelry and clothing amounted to at least 4,000 or $5,000.

STEAMBOAT INCIDENT. While the steamboat Providence was on her passage from Providence to New York, on Wednesday last, during a most violent storm, and with upwards of two hundred passengers on board, an incident of thrilling interest occurred, which is thus related in the Boston Gazette:

One of the upper state rooms was occupied by Miss Clifton, the actress, and her servant; the next one, by Mr. Coster, of New York; and another gentleman; and the farther one, at the stern of the boat, by two respectable young ladies belonging to Abington, in this state. Whilst the gale was at its highest pitch, the chamber-maid was sent by Mr. Coster to the room of Miss Clifton on some errand, but, mistaking her room, she knocked at the door of the one occupied by the ladies just referred to, one of whom, Miss Hobart, laboring under the severe effects of sea sickness, and frightened by the roaring of the elements, and still more alarmed by being saluted at such a time by an unknown voice, sprang from her berth in her night clothes, and instead of flying to the door, which opened into the saloon, attempted to escape from the window, which is only one foot square! On getting out, she found a projection of about two inches only to stand on—beneath and around her were the raging billows of the sound. If she had released her hold, the billows would have forned her winding sheet; but, fortunately, she became sensible of the danger of her situation, and cried piteously for help, when one of the gentlemen in the next room fled to the rescue of the sufferer, while the other held her by the hand from his berth, and fortunately she was rescued from her perilous situation, taken over the railing, and again conducted to her room. An incident better calculated to call all the sympathies and anxieties of human nature into action could not have occurred.

WONDERFUL ESCAPE FROM DEATH. The story that I am about to relate, is one which has excited a great deal of feeling in the vicinity where it happened, and is well worth a conspicuous place in your paper. The facts as handed to me are these: On Friday the 30th day of September last, near the close of the day, a little lad about eight years old, by the name of George Parks, started in pursuit of the cows. He made his way along the path through a piece of woods of about half a mile in length. On reaching the opposite side of the woods, he found his cattle and started towards home. The drove consisted of a very gentle old cow and a number of young cattle. His mother told him previous to his starting, to keep near to the old cow, as she would conduct him on a straight course home. This he was careful to obey; but shortly after he had entered the woods on his way home, walking by the side of the old cow, he heard a crackling in the bushes, and on looking round what should he see but a large bear making towards him with all the speed and fury that those ferocious animals are possessed of. At this critical period, strange as it may seem, the boy possessed presence of mind enough to make use of his alternative—which was to jump astride of the cow's back, and leaning forward he caught her by the horns, and in this perilous situation rode through the woods. The bear seemed to envy him his elevated situation, and vain would have pulled him down. The cattle ran and roared—the boy screamed—but all did not terrify the bear; ever and anon she would come along side of our gallant rider, growling and snarling and striking with her paws—and would have torn him in pieces, but for the other cattle, who would as often attack her in the rear, and as she would turn to give them battle, the cow would gain on her some rods. She would then leave the young cattle, and come with all speed after the boy, which seemed to be her whole aim. Several times she rose upon her hind legs to take him, and as often the cattle would give her battle; and thus they followed through the woods, until the bear's cubs came up, and the young cattle turned upon them. The old bear took their part, and the cow and her rider had arrived at the door of the farm house, ere the old bear could again renew the attack. The boy was almost senseless with fright, and it was not until some time after he had alighted from the cow, that he was enabled to report to his mother the why and wherefore. It is thought the boy will hereafter prefer that some one else should drive the cows to yard.

Bedford, (Ms.) October 2d, 1836.

HYPERBOREAN COLD. Captain Back, in his narrative of the arctic expedition in search of captain Ross, gives some very curious illustrations of the severity of cold endured by himself and his companions. Sulphuric ether, in a tightly stopped bottle, became opaque in fifteen minutes, and deposited a thick sediment, and the upper surface of the sides of the bottle was coated with ice. Mercury 62 degrees below zero. Being removed to the house and placed within four and a half feet of a brisk fire, the ether was forty-two minutes in recovering its transparency. Temperature of the room 32 degrees above zero.

Nitric ether lost its transparency in two hours.

A drachm and a half of sulphuric ether being placed in a bottle, and exposed to the cold out of the house until it became thick, the stopper was withdrawn and a match applied, when the ether ignited with a sharp explosion.

Pyroligneous acid froze in less than half an hour. Mercury 57 degrees below zero. Rectified spirit, diluted with an equal quantity of water, froze in the same time. Rum became thick in a few minutes. Two parts of pure spirit, diluted with one of water, froze solid in three hours; mercury 63 degrees below zero. A surface of mercury, in a saucer, became solid in two hours.

In a small room, a fire of eight large sticks of dry wood could only raise the temperature to 12 degrees below zero, and ink and paint froze in this room. Captain Back placed his table as near the fire as he could bear the heat, yet his camel's hair pencil was frozen to a stiff point, and he had to give up his drawing. Cases and boxes of seasoned fir split so as to be useless. The skin of the hands and face cracked into unsightly and painful gashes, which then were obliged to be filled with grease.—On one occasion captain B. washed his face and head, standing within three feet of the fire, and his hair actually became stiff with ice before he could dry it.

NEW AND ORIGINAL MODE OF VENTILATION. Dr. Reid, of Edinburgh, was lately examined before the British house of commons as to a certain plan of ventilation which he had suggested for the new house of parliament. He first astonished the new committee by telling them "I must make all your windows and doors air tight." "What," said they, "do you mean to destroy us, in the mode of the Black Hole at Calcutta?" "No," said the doctor, "I'll place you upon a seive, your floor shall be a seive; and I'll make for you an exact temperance of air in an apartment below, and attract it upwards through the seive." "Then you will give us all our deaths by colds in the feet." "No; the air shall warm you if you are cold, and cool you if you are hot; it shall come up warm in winter, and cold in summer." "Well, but how will you do this? How is the air to get out?" "I will erect a tall chimney." They started at the idea of a chimney, and seemed to think it a great nuisance. "Oh, but I'll ornament it, it shall be a tower, if you please; and in that tower or chimney I will place a furnace, which, by its rarifying power, will attract the air upwards, so that all the air which comes from the lungs of our legislators shall go up the chimney."—(laughter.) "But we shall have drafts." "No; it shall go so insensibly and regularly that no draft will be created; and the air your neighbor has breathed, however much you love him, shall never be breathed by yourself." Well, the committee recommended this plan of ventilation to the consideration of the architect, Mr. Barry, who gave it as one part of his plan that the new houses should be ventilated as recommended by Dr. Reid.

QUICK WORK. We were yesterday an eye witness to a specimen of despatch, which, had it not fallen under our own inspection, we should have been sceptical in believing. It was the operation, at the fair of the American institute, of reducing wheat, in straw, to baked bread, in ten minutes.—The process was as follows:—Twelve bundles of straw were placed in a machine in the garden, which came out threshed in a minute and a half; the winnowing was effected in a minute, the grinding and bolting occupied a minute and a half; the dough was kneaded and the cakes formed in two minutes. The whole contents of the twelve bundles were placed in a kitchen range, and came out thoroughly baked in four minutes—making, in the whole, ten minutes. The cakes were distributed around, and they only wanted the aid of a cooler, and a few pounds of Goshen butter to have been swallowed in another minute, without the aid of mastication.

MEXICAN MISSION TO SPAIN. By a letter from Tampico received by a commercial house in this city, and which has been politely communicated to us, it appears that Messrs. Mora, Parres and Villa Urtia, were to embark by the packet of September for Havana; the object of their voyage is attributed solely to diplomatic relations on the part of their government with Spain. They are to proceed to Madrid to terminate the negotiations of a reciprocal commerce, according to the basis established by the decree of the 27th of August last, which declares a suspension of hostilities with the mother country, and the opening of the Mexican ports to her merchantmen.

A NAVAL MEDICAL BOARD OF EXAMINATION is now in session at Gadsby's hotel, Washington, composed of Drs. Thomas Harris, president, Samuel Jackson, Thos. Williamson, M. Morgan and A. Adee. Such assistant surgeons of the navy as have commissions dated before January 1st, 1833, and who have served two years at sea, have permission to be examined before the present board.

NEW PROCESS IN SMELTING IRON. At the late meeting of the British association in Bristol, Mr. Mushat exhibited some specimens of malleable iron, which he prepared by a peculiar process, and gave an exposition of his views in relation to the theory of smelting as usually conducted. The iron, when first reduced in the upper part of the furnace, is in the malleable state, but in its progress downwards is, in virtue of exposure to a higher temperature, and the redundancy of charcoal it encounters, converted first into steel, and finally into pig iron. This new process consists in submitting the ore to the action alone which it experiences in the upper part of the furnace—that is, in restraining the heat and furnishing but a limited supply of the carbon; and, operating by such method, and without the use of lime, he stated that he was able to obtain at once, and by a single progress, iron soft enough to be forged into nails.

NAPOLEON. "When Napoleon for the second time quitted France, it was asserted that he ought to have buried himself under the ruins of his last battle. Lord Byron in his satirical ode against Napoleon, says:

"To die a prince—or live a slave

Thy choice is most ignobly brave."

This was an incorrect estimate of the hope still kindling in a soul accustomed to dominion and thirsting after the future. Lord Byron imagined that the dictator of kings had abdicated his fame with his sword, that he was about to die away in utter oblivion: lord Byron should have known that the destiny of Napoleon was a muse, like all other great destinies; this muse knew how to change an abortive catastrophe into a sudden turn of fortune, which would have revived and imparted fresh youth to its hero. The solitude of Napoleon in his exile and in his tomb, has thrown another kind of spell over a brilliant memory. Alexander did not die in sight of Greece; he disappeared amid the pomp of distant Babylon; Bonaparte did not close his eyes in the presence of France; he passed away in the gorgeous horizons of the torrid zone. The man who had shown himself in such powerful reality vanished like a dream; his life which belonged to history, co-operated in the poetry of his death.—He now sleeps forever, like a hermit or a paria, beneath a willow, in a narrow valley surrounded by steep rocks, at the extremity of a lonely path.—The depth of the silence which presses upon him can only be compared to the vastness of the tumult which had surrounded him. Nations are absent, their throng has retired. The bird of the tropics, harnessed to the car of the sun, as Buffon magnificently expresses it, speeding his flight downwards from the planet of light, rests alone for a moment over ashes, the weight of which has shaken the equilibrium of the globe. Bonaparte crossed the ocean to repair to his final exile, regardless of that beautiful sky which delighted Columbus, Vasco de Gama and Camoens, stretched upon the ship's stern, he perceived not that unknown constellations were sparkling over his head; his powerful glance for the first time encountered their rays. What to him were stars which he had never seen from his bivouacs, and which had never shone over his empire? Nevertheless, not one of them has failed to fulfil his destiny; one half of the firmament spread its light over the cradle: the other half was reserved to illuminate his tomb." [Chateaubriand.]

ARTIFICIAL CRYSTALS. Dr. Buckland, the naturalist, holding in his hand a blacking pot, value one penny, in which was a little water, clay, zinc and copper, lately presented himself to the British association at Bristol, England, and informed them that by these humble means his friend, Mr. Fox, had succeeded in imitating one of the most recalcitrant and wonderful processes of nature—her mode of making metallic veins. He observed, also, that there was a gentleman now at his right hand, whose name he had never heard till the day previous—a man unconnected with any society, but possessing the true spirit of a philosopher—who made no less than twenty-four minerals, and even crystalline quartz. Dr. Buckland said he knew not how he had made them, but pronounced them to be discoveries of the highest order; they were not made with a blacking-pot and clay, but the apparatus was equally humble; a bucket of water and a brickbat had sufficed to produce the wonderful effects which he would detail to them. Mr. Cross, of Broomfield, Somerset, then came forward and said that, though no geologist, and little of a mineralogist, he had devoted much of his time to electricity, and had lately been occupied in improvements in the voltaic power, by which he had succeeded in keeping it in full force for twelve months by water alone, rejecting acids entirely. He then proceeded to state that he had obtained water from a finely crystallized cave at Holway, and, by the action of the voltaic battery, had succeeded in producing from that water, in the course of ten days, numerous rhomboidal crystals, resembling those of the cave. In order to ascertain if light had any influence in the process, he tried it again in a dark cellar, and produced similar crystals in six days, with one-fourth of the voltaic power. He had repeated the experiments a hundred times, and always with the same results. He was fully convinced that it was even possible to make diamonds, and that at no distant period every kind of mineral would be formed by the ingenuity of man. By a variation of his experiments, he had obtained gray and blue carbonate of copper, phosphorus of soda, and twenty or thirty other specimens. He added, that, if any members of the association would favor him with a visit at his house, they would be received with hospitality, though in a wild and savage region on the Quantock hills, and he should be proud to repeat his experiments in their presence. N. Y. E. Post.

ECONOMY IN EXPENDITURE. The following remarks of Mr. Dewey, need to be often reflected upon by those inhabitants of our towns and cities who are straining every nerve, and sacrificing all that makes existence desirable, for the sake of money to lavish on the pitiful vanity of display. These reflections occur to the traveller on his passage in a steamboat from Paris to London.

"I observed that a considerable number of passengers carried a comfortable picnic box or basket with them, and spread their own table. With some, doubtless this provision proceeded from a fastidious taste that feared some poisonous dirt would be found in the common fare of a steamboat. But with many, I presume it arose from a habit, which presents a marked difference between the people of England and of America.—I mean the habit of economy. In America we are ashamed of economy. It is this feeling which would forbid among us such a practice as that referred to, and not only this, but a great many more and better practices. In England, economy stands out prominently; it presides over the arrangements of a family; it is openly professed, and fears no reproach. A man is not ashamed to say of a certain indulgence, that he cannot afford it. A gentleman says to you, 'I drive a pony chaise this year; I have put down my horse and gig, because I cannot pay the tax.' A man whose income and expenses, and style of living far exceed almost any thing to be found among us, still says of something quite beyond him, which his wealthier neighbor does, 'We are not rich enough for that.' One of the most distinguished men in England said to me, when speaking of wines at his table—'The wine I should prefer is claret, but I cannot afford it, and so I drink my own gooseberry.' I have heard that many families carry the principles so far, that they determine exactly how many dinners they can give in a year, and to how many guests—nay more, and how many dishes they can put upon the table, when they do entertain.

This frankness on the subject of economy is among us a thing almost unheard of. Not that we are more wealthy, but, as I conceive, less wise. The competition of domestic life among us is too keen to admit of any such confessions of internal weakness. We practise economy by stealth. Nor is that the worst of it: for one consequence of this habit of feeling is, that we practise too little. When a stranger looks upon the strife of business in our villages and cities, he imagines that he sees a very covetous people, but a nearer observation would show him that much of this eager, and absorbing, and almost slavish occupation, is necessary to sustain the heavy drains of domestic expenditure. This extravagance at home, chains many a man to the counter and countingroom. And this extravagance is of his own choosing, because he knows no other way of distinguishing himself, but by the style of living. Would he but conceive that he might better elevate himself in society, by having a well read library, by improving his mind and conversation, by cultivating some graceful and comparatively cheap accomplishment, he might live a wiser man, and die richer. Who would hesitate to choose between such a family, and one whose house was filled with gorgeous furniture, where the wife and daughters are dressed in the gayest of the fashion, and the husband and father banishes himself the livelong day, and half the night, from that pleasant mansion, to toil and drudge in the dusty warehouse? He sleeps in a very grand house, he lives in a countingroom!"

DREADFUL FIRE AND EXPLOSION AT SEA.—By an arrival at New York, we learn that the brig Ariel from that port, bound to Carthage, with 600 barrels of flour and half a ton of gunpowder on board, took fire at midnight on the 31st of August. The captain, crew and nine passengers were aroused from their sleep by the dreadful cry of "ship on fire!" They escaped, mostly in their night clothes, by means of the longboat. In about twenty minutes, and when they were not more than half a mile from the brig, she blew up with a terrific explosion, which seemed to shake and rend the very elements. They landed on the island of St. Domingo, on the 4th of September, and arrived in New York on Thursday the 27th ult. The Ariel and her cargo were insured in the sum of $30,000.

SPANISH CONSTITUTION OF 1812.

The following are extracts of the most interesting parts of the Spanish constitution of 1812:—
OF THE CORTES.

"1. The cortes shall be assembled every year in the capital of the kingdom, in the building appointed for their use.

"2. When they shall judge it convenient to transfer their sittings to another place they can do so, provided the place is not distant from the capital more than a dozen leagues, and that two-thirds of the deputies present approve of that change.

"3. The session of the cortes every year shall continue at least three months consecutively, to commence the 1st of March.

"4. The cortes may prolong their session at most for one month further, in two cases only. First, upon the demand of the king; second, if the prolongation be deemed necessary by two-thirds of the deputies.

"5. The deputies shall be wholly renewed every two years.

"6. If war, or occupation of any part of the territory of the monarchy by the enemy, shall prevent all, or several, of the deputies of one or many provinces presenting themselves at the proper time, those absent shall be replaced by the deputies coming from the respective provinces who shall draw lots among each other until the whole number be completed.

"7. When the deputies arrive in the capital they will present themselves to the permanent deputation of the cortes, who will place their names and the places for which they are elected in a registry kept for the purpose.

"8. Preparatory juntas will be formed on the 1st and 20th of February, for regulating the admission of deputies.

"9. On the 25th of February in each year, the last preparatory junta shall be held, in which all the deputies shall take, with their hands on the book of the gospel, the following oath:—"Do you swear to defend and preserve the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman religion, and not to admit any other into the kingdom?"—"I do." "Do you swear to regard religiously the constitution of the Spanish monarchy sanctioned by the general and extraordinary cortes of the kingdom in 1812?"—"I swear." "Do you swear that you will well and faithfully acquit yourself of the charge which the nation has confided in you, having always in view the good of the nation?"—"I do."

"10. After which, a president and vice president shall be chosen by ballot.

"11. The same day a deputation of 22 members shall be elected to communicate to the king that the cortes have constituted, and the king will declare if he will assist at the opening, which is to take place on the 1st of March.

"12. If the king be absent from the capital, the communication shall be made to him by writing.

"13. When the king assists in person at the opening of the cortes, the president will inform him of the day appointed, which shall not on any account be changed.

"14. The king shall enter without guards into the hall of the cortes. He shall only be accompanied by two persons, appointed for the purpose, at his entrance and exit.

"15. The king will pronounce a discourse, in which he will propose to the cortes what he thinks necessary, to which the president will reply. In case the king cannot attend in person he may send his speech in writing.

"16. The cortes cannot deliberate in presence of the king.

"17. The cortes cannot deliberate when the minister comes to make propositions on behalf of the crown.

"18. The sittings of the cortes shall be public, except in particular cases.

"19. The deputies shall be inviolable for their opinions; and they cannot be taken nor summoned in any case, at any time, or by any authority. In criminal cases they cannot be tried by any other tribunal but that of the cortes. During the sitting of the cortes, and a month after the dissolution, they cannot be taken nor summoned for debt.

"20. The deputies cannot, during the time of their election, accept for themselves, or solicit for others, any place under the crown; nor can they, for a year after their term of election expires, accept any decoration by order of the king."

WAR IN FLORIDA.

From the Florida Herald—extra, Oct. 21.

We are pleased to learn that gov. Call has conferred upon major Pierce the appointment of quartermaster general. We feel satisfied that the office could not be in better hands. He proceeds immediately in the Dolphin, to Savannah and Charleston with discretionary powers to procure every requisite for the army.

From the same.

To the editor of the Florida Herald:

SIR: As it is desirable to your readers and to the public generally, to learn the operations of the army commanded by gov. Call, you will be pleased to publish the following short, but correct statement furnished by one who was with him.

On the 28th, the governor passed the Suwannee at the Old Town, with 1,250 volunteer Tennesseans and 125 Floridians, all mounted. He had ordered an abundant supply of rations and forage, which was then afloat at the mouth of that river, but owing to the sickness of the crew of three steamboats lying in that river, had not been brought to the depot. Such was the impatience of the volunteers to find the enemy that they prepared to make a sudden rush on the foe, presuming that they might be surprised—and although an express from gen. Read, then at the Old Town, overtook the governor within ten miles from that post to inform him of the reception of a full supply of every thing wanted by the army, both officers and men expressed a decided unwillingness to delay their march. On their route to Camp Drane, seven Indians were killed, and few, if any, discovered by the spy guard in advance, escaped the unerring shot of the volunteers.

On the 1st of October, the governor reached Fort Drane and found the fires of the enemy still burning. They had escaped with their women and children by a few hours only, and but for the accidental escape of a spy found about Wacahouta, who was hotly pursued, but in vain, we should have surprised and perhaps destroyed this whole gang of Micasuckies, with Powell at the head. As it was, 4 of their number was run down and killed.

The army remained encamped at Fort Drane until a junction could be effected with major Pierce then at Black Creek, on whose zeal and ability the governor relied to supply his army with rations. Nor did he rely in vain. On the night of the 4th at ten o'clock, an express reached the major from San Teffe, giving information that 100 Floridians had reached the latter place, to aid in escorting provisions to Camp Drane—at 12 o'clock, 2 hours after the express, the major was in the saddle, and his whole command on the move. It is zeal and energy like this that the times require; it is this that gains the confidence of the general-in-chief, and saves an army from want. On the morning of the 5th the movement was made from Black Creek, and on the evening of the next day major Pierce with his detachment, reached Fort Drane and furnished to gov. Call, 7 or 8 days rations for his whole command, a distance of 66 miles.

With this supply it was deemed advisable to press on to the Wythlacoochee, pass it at the cove, if found fordable, and capture their women and children if the warriors should elude us; or should the waters of the river be beyond the banks, fall down the river, to the depot directed to be established at Graham's old camp, and unite with gen. Read, and col. Lane, at the head of the friendly Creeks. On the way the advanced guard fell in with a small encampment of Micasuckies, the most warlike and hostile of the tribes, killed 13 men who did not fire a shot, and took prisoners 4 women and 8 children. After an examination of the squaws it was found that we had reached the river at the point most desirable; that the body of the Indian families were on the opposite side, and the negro town, so called, was 3 miles above us, protected by a deep creek, running through a thick swamp hammock, and fordable only at very dry seasons. To this last place a detachment of 300 Tennessee volunteers under col. Gill proceeded, who returned in the evening with 3 killed and 7 wounded, by a shot from an unseen foe, unable to cross the creek from the depth of water.

The main body continued their march to the river, and on reaching the banks, after passing the most villainous swamp ever passed on horseback, found the river flooded greatly above its banks, and 250 yards over whilst standing on the edge of the water and mortified that a barrier so unlooked for was thrown in our way, a few shots were fired from the other side, and it was with much difficulty that the impetuosity of our men could be restrained—the firing was continued on both sides without our seeing the Indians. When the volunteers had been recalled, major Gordon gallantly volunteered with 200 of his men to silence the firing on the opposite side.

To this the commander-in-chief was reluctantly induced to give his assent, and the gallant band marched to the banks, two feet deep in water, and after much ineffectual firing, which our officers observed, was only useful in getting rid of ammunition of which we had not too much, were recalled at the sound of the bugle, maj. Gordon being wounded in the breast by a spent ball.

The army thus foiled by the high water in their attempts to cross the river, and end the war at a blow, and almost without rations, had but one of two courses to pursue. The first was to fall back to Black creek or Volusia for supplies—or to advance onward to the mouth of the river to communicate with general Reed or colonel Lane, to obtain provisions there. The last course was preferred by the general and by a council of war, and the march was commenced—greatly to our disappointment, no depot was established, at the point so peremptorily ordered, and the army was directed to Fort Drane and Gray's ferry. Luckily the main object of the expedition was effected, and a junction was formed with colonel Lane, who crossed the Wythlacoochee at Ganines' battle ground on the 3 miles above our encampment, having been governed in his march by the sound of our artillery as we daily fired a signal gun.

Thus has ended for a time our operations. Many horses have been lost, and must be replaced. Depots must be established, we have discovered the proper locations. We have found the enemy's strong hold and the means to assail it. We have found willing and able guides in the prisoner squaws, and derived much valuable information from them. They tell us that there is a large peace party in the nation who would have sent in an envoy, but from dread that we should shoot him. They tell us that their powder is nearly exhausted, and above all that the two head chiefs, the most warlike and the most hostile, next to Powell, the one of the Micasukies, the other of the Long Swamp tribe, were killed by major Pearce at Fort Drane—from that or some other cause, perhaps the defection of the Creeks. We believe that there is dissension amongst them, that their war spirit is broken, and that they will be whipped, humbled and perhaps shipped before Christmas. A high spirit prevails in our army, harmony between the regulars and volunteer militia, and zeal, courage and ardour throughout all.

In addition to the above the Herald has the following:

Major Pierce marched on the 5th in the morning at 2 o'clock, and arrived at Fort Drane on Saturday the 6th, with ten days provision for the Tennessee brigade. Governor Call, marched on Monday, the 8th for the Wythlacoochee, taking a new direction with a view to surprise the Indians; to do this it was necessary to cut a new road for the artillery and wagon train, for more than 50 miles which was performed by the battalion of 200 artillery under major Pierce in 5 days, and although attended with considerable fatigue, and on the morning of the 12th, the advanced guard surprised and attacked a large party of Indians, routing and taking 12 female prisoners.

Steamboat Black Creek, Oct. 20, 1836.

MY DEAR SIR: When I last wrote you I was about setting out for governor Call's camp. I left home on the 1st instant, with col. Downing, one of the governor's aids, and a small volunteer party from St. Augustine, and met the governor with about 1,700 men, (Tennesseans and Floridians), at Camp Drane about the 9th. At Black creek we joined major Pierce with about 200 regulars, who took a field piece and an 18 pound howitzer, and a train of wagons with provisions, intended as a temporary supply for the general army, until it should reach the head waters of the Wythlacoochee, where a large stock had been ordered under gen. Read.

On the 12th, as we were pursuing our course toward the Wythlacoochee, and when within about two miles of it, the advanced guard or spies suddenly came upon an encampment of several families of Indians, and so unexpectedly, that those situated nearest had not time to escape. The volunteers dashed among them, and killed eleven, and took four squaws and eight children prisoners.—The squaws were interrogated in the evening as to the situation of the Indians, and readily gave, as they said, all the information in their power. They stated that we were opposite Powell's (Oseola) strong hold—the cove of the Wythlacoochee; that Oseola was sick, and had with him but few warriors—three or four hundred—the remainder being scattered over the country in small parties; that they would pilot the army across, according to the desire of the governor, the next day, &c.

We had with us Billy (brother-in law of the late chief, Charley O'Martha) and an Indian negro, named Cudjo, as interpreter and guide.

On the morning of the 13th, the army proceeded to the river, which was skirted with a thickly wooded swamp, about one hundred yards in width. The spy guard were ordered into the swamp in advance, followed by the regulars and our St. Augustine volunteer dragoons, in order to cross over. We proceeded to the margin of the stream, when Cudjo and one of the squaws, as guides, advanced, and the troops following; but the moment we were discovered by the Indians, who were prepared for us, a brisk fire was opened upon us, and kept up for about half an hour, and returned with equal spirit by the volunteers. The river being unusually high, and our army out of provisions, it was deemed expedient by the commander-in-chief to withdraw the troops, and proceed on in search of the provisions. We had two men wounded, but none killed.

400 men had been despatched in the morning, with Billy and one squaw, four miles up the river, to a place called Negrotown, where many of the Indians and negroes resorted, and where there was another crossing place. Here they were met in the same manner as at the other crossing, and, after a sharp skirmish, returned, having lost two Tennessee volunteers killed, and seven wounded, together with poor Billy, who was shot at the first fire, and died in a few seconds. He was a kind hearted man, and universally respected by the officers of the army.

The next morning we proceeded down the river, toward the celebrated blockhouse, to which governor Call despatched 200 men. They returned on the 16th, with the intelligence that no provisions or force had arrived. The bread was entirely exhausted, and we had nothing but fresh beef. Our horses were starving for want of corn, whereupon the army were ordered to face about, and fall back to Camp Drane, and obtain a supply from Black creek.

On the 17th, before we arrived at the latter place, an express overtook us with information that col. Lane was on the bank of the Wythlacoochee, with 700 friendly Creeks and 100 regulars, nearly out of provisions. He was desired to come on to Fort Drane, and on the 13th, when I left, he was only five miles from it.

The commander-in-chief intends to obtain fresh horses, and recruit up those that will answer, get on a supply of forage and provisions, and make another push as soon as possible to the same point.

Had gen. Read, who was specially charged with obtaining supplies, and seeing them forwarded to the head waters of the Wythlacoochee, been punctual, as the governor had anticipated, I believe the war would have been terminated this month. We had found Oseola and his women and children, and nothing but bread and corn prevented us from taking him.

Gen. Call has been sick of bilious fever, and is now unfit for the duties and fatigues of the field.

I have thus been particular in narrating the facts, however uninteresting, as already a false report has gone abroad.

From the New York Evening Post.

News from Fort Brook, Tampa Bay. Sometime since I heard that the head of the friendly Indians died when within twenty miles of his place of final destination in Arkansas. Poor fellow—he was a noble Indian, of whom I will write more hereafter. There have in truth been few such red men as "Holachte Emathla" or Blue Warrior. I would tell you that the ch. in Holachte is pronounced like the German ich. His death excited a feeling of very general regret. But for the aid of his friendly dispositions and remarkable energy, there would not now be a single friendly Indian in Florida. Having brought over to our side 499 Indians, he migrated in April last for the west. At Fort Brook, in July, we had a small break in upon the general monotony. On the 18th of that month six or seven men, whilst cutting wood at the distance of a mile, were attacked by thirty or forty Indians. The savages rose up within ten yards of them and fired—missing all but one who was slightly wounded in the side. Our men of course took to their heels, and one poor fellow, named Patrick Quin was overtaken. He discharged his musket at them, and as they approached him, he knocked one of them down with the butt end of it; but he was soon overpowered by numbers. One Indian actually fired at him at a distance of twelve feet and missed him; and six or seven fired at a very short distance. Their rifles having failed, they attacked him with knives, stabbed him in the back, through the lungs, knocked him down and scalped him, and yet he is still in the hospital and is absolutely recovering. He received two large stabs in the back and two in the neck—a scalp about the size of the palm of the hand was taken off. He says that he distinctly recollects every stage of the process; and that two men were upon him—stabbed him in the back of his neck—seized him by the hair, and in a trice striped him of his scalp. The Indian then sprung up into the air with a shrill and long yell, when they all scampered off. Undoubtedly they thought him dead, and were hurried off by seeing our men hastening to the rescue. At the fort we heard the rifles and the warwhoop, and in one minute the men were paraded under arms and a strong detachment hurried to the spot. Half a dozen of our men were mounted. We chased them above three miles, the horsemen overtook them, and exchanged shots, but of course, could not close with such superior numbers. These incidents will show you how much the aim of the Indian rifle has been exaggerated. To be shot at by half a dozen Indians, at a distance of twenty yards is, of course to be a danger, but that is all. Their miserable shooting is hardly credible, and during the last campaign, I am persuaded that not more than one of a thousand balls, at a reasonable distance, took effect—and when they do hit, their balls are so small that if a bone is not broken they make but a slight flesh wound. Numbers of the Seminoles will starve, or commit suicide rather than yield. The king—"Micco-Nopa," commonly called Micanopy, remains in the glades. His majesty is a huge lump of fat—kept in the glades for safety—far too unwieldy to run, and too sacred to be left for us to pick up. Those who know him say that, in the last extremity, he will cut his own throat or hang himself.

In addition to the above particulars, we learn that lieutenant colonel Lane committed suicide, at Fort Drane, on the 20th ult. by placing the hilt of his sword on the ground, and falling on it in such a way that the point passed through the corner of the eye into the brain. No conjecture is offered as to the cause. He was in command of the friendly Indians and a hundred regulars. With this force he had gallantly fought his way from Tampa Bay to Fort Drane, where he effected a junction with gov. Call. Two hours after succeeding in this difficult undertaking, he deprived himself of life. The Globe, in speaking of the melancholy occurrence, adds:

"Col. Lane was a young man of high attainments and promise—was indefatigable in his pursuits, and full of mental and personal energy. He had the entire confidence of his commander, gen. Jesup, who entrusted him with the delicate and highly responsible separate command which he led into Florida. This dreadful termination of his career is still a heavier blow to his unhappy father, the hon. Amos Lane, who had received intelligence of the death of an accomplished daughter just before the close of the last session of congress."

The Pensacola Gazette of the 15th ult. relates the following noble instance of hospitality: "The sick of the army operating against the Seminoles were sent from Suwanee Old Town, in the United States steamboat American, to the number of one hundred and ten. Their destination was this place, but, when near St. Joseph, the steamboat met with an accident which compelled her to put into that port for repairs. At the moment of her arrival, the ladies of St. Joseph were about to set out on a party of pleasure. They no sooner became acquainted, however, with the situation of the gallant defenders of their country on board the American, than, with one accord, they postponed their pleasure party, and devoted themselves to the duty of alleviating the sufferings of the sick. The entire building lately erected for a hotel by col. Beveridge was given up to them, and the general strife was who should do the most for the sufferers. Every family contributed something. We are gratified to add that, when we last heard from them, the sick were all doing well.

MR. CLAY AND THE CHEROKEES.

The following letter was addressed to the Cherokee nation of Indians, through one of their people, by Mr. Clay, in 1831—the time of their great distress and excitement—and has lately appeared in the newspapers. We have seldom seen so brief an address so full of interest. How statesmanlike, how full of good sense, of wise counsel, of humane feeling and honorable sympathy! No one can read it, we are sure, without experiencing an increased degree of respect both for the head and the heart of the eminent citizen who penned it. [Nat. Int.]

Ashland, 6th June, 1831.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter of the 14th ult. describing the wrongs and sufferings of the Cherokee nation. Of these I had been previously well informed. In common with a large portion of the citizens of the United States, I regretted them, and felt the sincerest sympathy with you on account of them. I regretted them, not only because of their injustice, but because they inflicted a deep wound on the character of the American republic.

I had supposed that the principles which had uniformly governed our relations with the Cherokee and other Indian nations had been too long and too firmly established to be disturbed at this day.—They were proclaimed in the negotiation with Great Britain at Ghent, by the American commissioners who concluded the treaty of peace; and having been one of those commissioners, I feel with more sensibility than most of my fellow citizens, any violation of those principles; for if we stated them incorrectly, we deceived Great Britain; and if our government acts in opposition to them, we deceived the world.

According to those principles, the Cherokee nation has the right to establish its own form of government, and to alter and amend it from time to time, according to its own sense of its own wants; to live under its own laws; to be exempt from the operation of the laws of the United States, or of any individual state; to claim the protection of the United States; and quietly to possess and enjoy its lands, subject to no other limitation than that, when sold, they can only be sold to the U. States. I consider the present administration of the government of the United States as having announced a system of policy in direct hostility with those principles, and thereby encouraging Georgia to usurp powers of legislation over the Cherokee nation which she does not of right possess.

Such are my opinions, which are expressed at your request; but they are the opinions of a private individual, which can avail you nothing.

What ought the Cherokees to do in their present critical situation? is a most important question for their consideration. Without being able to advise them, I see very clearly what they ought not to do. They ought not to make war. They ought to bear every oppression, rather than fly to arms. The people of the United States are alone competent now to redress these wrongs; and it is to be hoped that they will, sooner or later, apply the competent remedy.

In communicating these opinions at your instance, I have done it with no intention that they should be published. A publication of them might do injury, and I therefore request that it be not made.

I feel very thankful for the friendly sentiments towards myself, which you have expressed, and offer my sincere wishes that your nation finally may obtain justice at the hands of the United States, and may become a civilized, Christian and prosperous community.

I am, with high respect, your obedient servant,
H. CLAY.

Mr. John Gunter.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

On Monday, the 24th inst. the "democracy of the 1st congressional district of Pennsylvania assembled at the Commissioners' Hall, in Southwark, and held a great festival in honor of the victory gloriously achieved by the democracy of the first district over the combined forces of anti-masons—traitors, apostates and mis-called whigs."

When the cloth was removed, answers from the president of the United States, the secretary of the treasury and the navy and the post master general, to invitations to join the festival, were read. The following are the letters of the president and post master general:

Washington, Oct. 22, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th inst. inviting me to unite with the democratic citizens of the 1st congressional district of Pennsylvania, in celebrating, on Monday next, the triumph of their principles in the recent election of col. Lemuel Paynter.

My public duties, at this time, not admitting of my absence from this place, it is out of my power to accept this kind invitation. Be pleased, however, to convey to the citizens of the district the assurance of the high satisfaction which it always affords me to learn that the schemes of those who seek to obtain power against the will of the people have been disappointed.

I feel thankful for the evidence which your letter contains of the approbation of my public conduct, by the large and respectable portion of my fellow citizens composing the first congressional district of your state, who are represented by you on this occasion. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ANDREW JACKSON.

Messrs. Wm. W. Chew, John Thompson and others, committee, &c.

Washington, Oct. 22d, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter of the 19th inst. inviting me to a celebration of the late triumph of democracy, &c. to be held on the 24th inst. in the first congressional district.

Did public duties permit an acceptance of your kind invitation, no occasion has presented itself since the late war with Great Britain, on which it would have given me more gratification to indulge in festivity, gratulation and triumph. A direct attempt has been made to govern your state by corruption, and it has been rebuked and repelled in a spirit worthy of '76. It is not a triumph of one man over another; it is a victory of principle over profligacy—the triumph of a virtuous people over concentrated wealth, mercenary talent and licensed corruption. It affords a brilliant illustration of the purity of our people, and is a presage of the necessary reform and enduring stability of our republican institutions.

But the conquest is not complete. The enemy you have vanquished will not cease to be dangerous until he ceases to exist. Follow him up with blow after blow in November and May, until he shall be exterminated without hope of resurrection.

This is not all. Since corruption has found wings in bank notes, liberty needs new safeguards. The principle must be settled, that no legislative body can grant a charter or a privilege which any subsequent legislature or the people in convention may not abrogate or recal. The idea that a corrupt legislature may sell the rights of the people, without redress, is monstrous. If the people tolerate such rules by establishing the inviolability of charters, the time will soon come when they will have no rights to sell. A charter confers on men the privilege of using their property in a particular way; the repeal of a charter does not destroy their property, but only prevents their using it longer in that particular way. The repeal of a bank charter destroys no man's property: if it have been honestly and prudently conducted, each stockholder will receive back the money he vested in it, and may use it in any other lawful business. When banks become corrupt and abuse their powers, they become a public nuisance, and may be abated by the same power which prevents private citizens from so using their own as to inflict injury on their neighbors.

Whom will the establishment of this principle injure? Not the farmers, nor the mechanics, nor the laborers, nor any other man, who, content with protection from his government, relies upon himself alone for wealth and advancement. It would only obstruct those who seek by combinations and exclusive privileges to make others subservient to their will and auxiliary to their aggrandizement. And have any set of men a right to complain when deprived of this power? The maxim of a republican government should be, protection for all—favors for none.

But I have not time to pursue this glowing theme. In conclusion, please accept my thanks for your kindness, and if not in your opinion inexpedient, present to the company the annexed sentiment.

With high regard, your ob't servant,

AMOS KENDALL.

Messrs. Wm. W. Chew, John Thompson, Geo. C. Stevenson, Jos. M. Doran, Pierce Butler.

Pennsylvania—Honest, firm and incorruptible—she will gloriously close the war with corruption which president Jackson so fearlessly began.

By the company. Hon. Amos Kendall, postmaster general—Distinguished alike for his eminent talents and the soundness of his political principles.

Knoxville, (Tenn.) Sept 30th, 1836.

The undersigned citizens of, and, for many years past, residents in Knoxville, have noticed an editorial paragraph in the "Standard of Union" charging judge White with being favorable to free negro suffrage and asserting, that upon one occasion, viz: in 1825, he actually "locked arms with a free negro and walked with him to the ballot box." The same charge substantially, has appeared in other quarters and met such rebuke as its falsehood and baseness merited. Had it not been so repeatedly and gravely urged, in portions of the country where judge White is personally unknown, the undersigned would not have deemed it necessary or proper to bestow any notice upon a charge which is here universally known and pronounced to be false and unfounded in every respect. No man in this community, however credulous he may be, or however much he may be prejudiced against judge White, pretends to believe or countenance the aforesaid charge. So far from judge White taking an active part in the canvass of 1825 it is known to all here, that he was so indifferent as to the result, that he merely voted without exercising any exertion or influence whatever. The time never was when he would have condescended to act in the manner represented, and more especially would he not have done so on the occasion specified. The individual who gave the information to the editor of the "Standard of Union," has either been imposed upon himself by some malignant slanderer, or he has wilfully and wickedly given currency to a base falsehood. The charge, in all its features, is a fabrication. We make this assertion confidently and challenge contradiction from any respectable source. Judge White's opinions and principles on the subject of slavery and various questions connected therewith, have so recently been expressed by himself in his public capacity that it is superfluous to repeat them.

We have made the foregoing statement without the knowledge of judge White, and in his absence from home, deeming it but a simple act of justice due from his neighbors and friends.

Knoxville, 29th Sept. 1836.

In the Standard of Union, a newspaper published at Milledgeville, Georgia, I have seen an article asserting that in 1825, in a warmly contested election at Knoxville, in which col. Williams was one of the candidates, judge White, who took an active part for his brother-in-law, locked arms with a free negro and walked with him to the ballot box.—This charge is said to rest on the testimony of a respectable citizen of Georgia. I was myself the opponent of col. Williams in 1825 and it was a closely contested election. If such conduct had taken place with judge White and a free negro, I have no doubt that it would have been noticed by myself or my friends. I never heard the charge against the judge until I saw it in the paper above alluded to. I am therefore inclined to believe that the story is without foundation. It is so foreign from judge White's character and principles to have acted in the way represented that, a contradiction of the charge where he is known, would seem to be entirely useless.

JAMES ANDERSON.

The following letter was addressed by general Harrison to a committee of the citizens of York, Pa. in reply to a letter requesting information in relation to a charge of his political opponents that he had "wantonly burned a Moravian town in Canada, with all their provisions, and that but for the humanity of com. Perry, in furnishing them with flour, they must have perished with hunger."

York, Oct. 8, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: In answer to your inquiry in relation to the burning of the town occupied by the Moravian Indians, near to the scene of the action of the river Thames, in the year 1813, I state, that it was not burned by my order, but by order of a major general of the Kentucky militia, after I had left the army on my return to Detroit. This gentleman has always been opposed to me in politics.

but although he was blamed by others, I thought he was perfectly justifiable in doing so, because the Indians to whom it belonged, had fought against us in the action, and if the town had been left, it would have afforded a place of rendezvous for the hostile Indians during the winter, which would have enabled them greatly to annoy our outposts and the settlements of Detroit. In war, nothing is more common than the destruction of the houses, even of our friends, where they can be used to advantage by the enemy. Thus general Jackson very properly destroyed all the houses of American citizens in front of his lines near New Orleans. No general, who does not do so, where the necessity occurs, would deserve to have an army entrusted to him.

I will add, that there were no provisions or stores of any kind in the town, as they had all been consumed by the British troops and Indians, nor was there a barrel of flour, belonging to our army, within fifty miles. The story, therefore, of the Moravians being supplied by commodore Perry, is a wilful fabrication. I am, respectfully, &c.

WM. H. HARRISON.

Letter from col. R. M. Johnson.

Oak Woods, Oct. 10th, 1836.

MY DEAR SIR: It is my intention to visit my district before the presidential election in November. But in this I may be disappointed; and, at all events, I cannot gratify my wishes in this respect till late in October. In the mean time, I take the liberty to express to my constituents, through you, as far as practicable, and as far as your friendship may induce you to make known my gratitude to them for past favors, and as I have never done any thing to forfeit their confidence, to appeal to them for their support, in the coming election in November, as it may be the last time they will ever have the opportunity of giving evidence to the world that I have never lost their friendship and approbation.

I do not consider the principles of party politics involved in this election; but, even in such a case, my friends and fellow citizens will remember that, in serving them, I have never yielded to party feelings or party considerations, but I have served them faithfully, without respect to persons or politics. Whether I shall get the vote of Kentucky, my native state, or not, you must know that it is natural that I should feel great anxiety to get a large vote in a district which I have served for 30 years. I appeal, therefore, to that kind feeling which has ever existed between my constituents and myself. Excuse this trouble, and believe me, truly and sincerely, yours,

RH. M. JOHNSON.

N. B. Please read this, when convenient, to the citizens of your neighborhood.

Mr. Adams has addressed the following letter to the committee of an anti-masonic convention lately held at Hanover.

Quincy, 21st October, 1836.

Messrs. Benjamin V. French and Harvey Field, committee of the anti-masonic convention, held at Hanover, on the 18th October, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I have received with sentiments of grateful sensibility, the copy of the resolutions of the convention held at Hanover on the 18th instant, relating to myself, and communicated to me by you. Conscious of the favorable indulgence with which the convention has been pleased to estimate my services as the representative of the 12th congressional district of the commonwealth, in the congress of the United States, I am sensible that the only portion of that approbation which they have bestowed, to which I can have a just claim, is that which regards the honesty of intention, and the assiduity of industry. I receive it as the testimonial of the kindness which has been extended to me by the convention and their constituents, and with a confirmed resolution to adhere, as long as I shall remain in public life, to those principles upon which I have hitherto discharged the trust committed to me by them. With regard to the resolutions referring to the election of a president of the United States, it may be proper for me to say, that the only contingency upon which I may be required to take a part in it, would be the failure of a choice by the electoral colleges, thereby devolving it upon the house of representatives, in which event, entertaining a respectful opinion of all the candidates whose names may be returned to the house, my vote would be given in favor of him whom I shall have reason to believe most acceptable to a majority of my constituents, the people of the 12th congressional district of Massachusetts.

I am with great respect, gentlemen, your friend and fellow citizen,

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Lexington, Oct. 12th, 1836.

Messrs. Henry Clay and Chilton Allan.

GENTLEMEN: We have just learned, with much surprise, that col. R. M. Johnson, in his electioneering stump speeches, for the office of vice president of the United States, asserts, as of his own knowledge, that his competitor, Francis Granger, esq. of New York, the whig candidate, is an abolitionist, that he was one of the organs of that party, and maintained abolition opinions and principles on the floor of congress last winter. As we know you had every opportunity, from private intercourse as well as public, to become possessed of the opinions of Mr. Granger on this subject, we beg you will give them to us, with authority to present them to the public. Very respectfully, yours, &c.

Ashland, 13th Oct. 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your note of yesterday, stating that the honorable R. M. Johnson asserts, as of his own knowledge, that his competitor for the vice presidency, Francis Granger, esq. is an abolitionist, that he was the organ of that party, and that he maintained abolition principles and opinions on the floor of congress last winter; and you requested me to communicate his opinions on that subject, under the supposition that I had every opportunity of becoming possessed of them.

I regret that the short interval between the present time and the period of the election does not admit of your obtaining from Mr. Granger himself a statement, under his own signature, of his real sentiments, and laying them before the people.—This consideration reconciles me in giving an answer, in compliance with your request.

I cannot but persuade myself that you must have been misinformed as to the assertions attributed to col. Johnson. I think he could hardly have made such a great mistake in imputing opinions to a distant and absent competitor, who had no opportunity of answering him.

Abolition was an engrossing topic of private conversation and public debate during the last session of congress. I had frequent opportunities in social intercourse with Mr. Granger, and in his public discussions, of learning his opinions. I understood him clearly and distinctly to disapprove of all interference with slavery, as it exists in the states tolerating that institution, either on the part of congress or the northern states. And I am perfectly sure that it is altogether inaccurate to say that he is either an abolitionist or the organ of the abolitionists.

Numerous petitions were presented to both houses of congress, praying for the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia, over which congress has a right, by the constitution, to legislate in all cases whatever. Mr. Granger and many other members were charged with presenting some of these petitions. Some of them were sent to me, and I felt it a duty, as probably others did, to present them, when couched in respectful language. It was the subsequent duty of congress to dispose of them as might seem to it to be right. A question having been made as to the reception of these petitions, it was decided by a very large majority in the senate that the petitioners had a constitutional right to offer them. The same opinion prevailed in the house.

I was well acquainted with Mr. Gideon Granger, the late postmaster general, appointed by Mr. Jefferson. He was the father of Mr. Francis Granger. During part of the years 1818 and 1814 my family and that of Mr. Gideon Granger resided in Washington near to each other. We were very intimate, and I then became acquainted with Mr. Francis Granger, whom I have known ever since. And I should not do justice in concluding this note, without bearing testimony to his high character, his great abilities, his manly and uniform correct deportment. I have found him, whether in the senate of New York or the house of representatives, with unflinching firmness, supporting those great measures of national policy which appeared to me best adapted to strengthen the union and advance the common prosperity. I am, gentlemen, with great respect, your obedient servant.

HENRY CLAY.

Winchester, Oct. 14, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 12th inst. is before me; in reply I have to say that during the last session of congress, I learned from his public speeches, as well as from numerous conversations, that the hon. Francis Granger, of New York, was opposed to abolition.

He maintained the opinion in public and private, that congress had no constitutional power to interfere in any manner whatever, with the slave property of the people of the United States. With great respect, I am your obedient humble servant,

CHILTON ALLAN.

"REFORM OR REVOLUTION" IN MARYLAND.

Public meeting in Montgomery.

Pursuant to public notice, inviting the voters of the 2d election district of Montgomery county, to assemble at Mrs. Cumming's tavern in Clarksburg, on Saturday the 22d instant, "to consider the propriety of instructing our senatorial elector to return to Annapolis and unite in making a senate."

A large and respectable number of the citizens of said district assembled. For greater convenience, the meeting adjourned to the large room of Mr. Stephen Lewis, where the meeting was organized by calling Lot Lenthicum, esq. to the chair and appointing Leonidas Willson, esq. secretary. Upon motion of Robert M. Beam, esq. a committee of seven was appointed by the chair to propose and submit to the meeting resolutions for their consideration. Whereupon the chair appointed Robert M. Beam, Wm. L. Wilson, Zachariah Waters, Zachariah Magruder, Samuel Blount, Charles H. Murphy, Zadock Summers, said committee, who retired and, after some deliberation, reported the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That the nineteen electors, by refusing to unite in electing a senate, have violated an express command of the constitution; have wilfully abandoned a high public duty; have disregarded their engagements with their constituents; and have arrogated to themselves a power destructive to the right of the people, and fatal to the existence of all good government.

Resolved further, That, in the attempt to call a convention, as the only means by which we can be preserved from a state of anarchy, the consequence of their own wilful and deliberate acts, they have usurped the sovereignty of the people, and have added insult to the injury which their own criminal violation of duty may occasion.

Resolved further, That we are decidedly opposed to such a convention and will not aid in its formation.

Resolved further, That the twenty-one electors, by their steadfast perseverance in holding themselves prepared to execute the high trust for which they had been appointed, and to rescue the government from the revolutionizing attempts of others, have exemplified the true spirit of patriotism, and have endeared themselves to all the friends of law, and all true lovers of their country.

Resolved further, That we view the conduct of Mr. John S. Sellman, in retracing a step which he discovered to be at variance with the wishes of his constituents, as an evidence of consistency of principle in the man who professed to be governed by the will of the people—and of a noble independence of character in him, who could thus dare to be the foremost in retracing an error and thus sacrificing personal feeling at the shrine of duty.

Resolved further, That the perseverance of Dr. Duvall in a course, which the result of the late election, as well as his own personal observation, must have convinced him was in direct opposition to the wishes of a large majority of his constituents, indicates a total disregard for the rights of the people, and a determination to sacrifice duty and principle to the attainments of political ends.

Resolved further, That his attempt through the medium of the press, to impress the public mind with the belief wholly unwarranted and unfounded, that the "people of Montgomery" have yielded "a generous and prompt approbation to his course," we can view with no other feelings than those of regret and indignation.

Resolved further, That as it is the wish not only of this meeting, but we believe of a large majority of the people of this county, that Dr. Duvall should return to Annapolis and unite in electing a senate, this duty he is earnestly requested to perform.

After the above proceedings were had, the meeting was addressed by Anthony Kimmel and Richard I. Bowie, esqs. On motion, Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the chairman and secretary, and published in the Maryland Journal, National Intelligencer, Baltimore Patriot and Chronicle.

LOT LINTHICUM, chairman.

LEONIDAS WILLSON, secretary.

GREAT FRAUD.

The fraud described in the annexed article has excited more than ordinary attention in New York: From the Journal of Commerce.

POLICE OFFICE, OCT. 29.

Extensive frauds. An investigation is going on at the police, from which it appears that some of the imposing merchants of the city have been defrauded to a very large amount by two store keepers in Broadway. The accused parties are Richard Venables of 255 Broadway, and his brother-in-law John Pemberton late of 575 Broadway. Venables and Pemberton are Englishmen, and but a short time in this country. Some months back they opened silk mercery and dry goods stores in Broadway, on an extensive scale, and at first purchased goods for cash, and then on short credits, until they formed a character for stability, and having done so, they obtained goods to the amount of about $20,000 from different merchants in the city. About a fortnight back, Pemberton shut up his store and started for England, having first disposed of his stock, amounting to more than $100,000, which he got secretly conveyed away from his premises. When his flight became known to his creditors they made enquiries about the matter, and learned that a large and valuable portion of Pemberton's stock was conveyed from his store by a carman at a late hour of the night previous to his absconding. His creditors, consequently offered a reward of $500 for the discovery of the carman, and Mr. A. M. Smith, of the police office, was fortunate enough to find him, and learned from him that on the night in question he brought the goods from Pemberton's store to that of Venables, and had carried them into his store through a private passage leading into it from Peale's museum, and also that a clerk of Pemberton's named Potts, had assisted him in conveying away the goods. Mr. Smith intimated the information he had thus obtained to Pemberton's creditors, and on last Wednesday night Venables was requested to call at the house of Mr. A. J. Brown, of the firm of Ramsdell & Brown, corner of Cedar and William streets, where he accordingly went, and was asked for an explanation relative to the information which was obtained from the carman. Venables denied positively having received any property from Pemberton, but acknowledged that a carman brought some articles to his store in the manner above mentioned, but stated that they consisted only of some trunks belonging to his sister. As nothing satisfactory could be elicited from Venables, the ensuing day some of Pemberton's creditors took out writs of replevin, and searched Venables' premises, where they found large quantities of goods, which had been sold to Pemberton by Ramsdell & Brown, and Mr. A. Lawrence, of Cedar street. There were also other goods found, which Pemberton had purchased from different merchants in this city, and amongst them a quantity of linen, which he bought from Mr. William Redmond. The latter article Venables asserted he bought from some person who brought it from England, and in support of his assertion he produced a bill of it, dated the 4th of September, but Mr. Redmond is positive they were in his store the 12th of September. According to the carman's account, he must have carried more than $100,000 worth of goods from Pemberton's store to that of Venables. As all these circumstances made it pretty clear that Venables and Pemberton had conspired to defraud the merchants, Venables was taken into custody on Friday, and ordered to find bail in $10,000, and in default thereof was committed to prison. He has since, it is said, offered to assign over all his property for the benefit of Pemberton's and his own creditors, but it is thought his offer will not be accepted. Besides the goods from Pemberton's, which were found at Venables', upwards of ten thousand dollars worth have been found at a house in Chatham street.

LAW CASE.

SUPERIOR COURT OF NEW YORK—JUDGE JONES PRESIDING.

Peter F. Even vs. John Wood. This was an action to recover damages for breach of an agreement relative to the sale of a house.

On the 28th of January, 1835, the plaintiff entered into a written agreement with the defendant to rent a house from him in Madison street, for two years from the ensuing May, with a proviso that if within six months from May, the plaintiff wished to purchase the house and lot for the sum of $7,500, the defendant should sell it to him. The plaintiff went into possession of the premises on the first of May, and on the 15th of the following October served a written notice on the defendant, stating his intention to purchase the house at the price agreed on, and requesting the defendant to have the deed of transfer prepared. Conformably to this notice the plaintiff called on the defendant on the 17th of October, and tendered him $7,500 and demanded a deed of the house. The defendant refused to sell him the house, as he had already sold it to his son, but offered to give the plaintiff another house of equal value. The plaintiff refused to take any house but the one in question, and the matter rested so until the following December, when the plaintiff commenced the present suit against the defendant, who, the day after the suit was commenced, offered to make good his agreement. Four witnesses were produced by the plaintiff, who stated that the house and lot were worth from 9 to $10,000 in October, 1835, and the plaintiff now sought to recover the difference between that sum and $7,500, for which the defendant had agreed to sell him the house.

This was the case for the plaintiff. Counsel for the defendant moved for a non suit, on the ground that as the plaintiff had given no consideration for the contract, it was a mere privilege given him by the defendant, and not binding on the latter by law.

The court overruled this motion, and several witnesses were then examined for the defence, according to whose testimony the house and lot were not worth more than $7,500, or at the most $8,000, in October, 1835. The defendant's son deposed that he had been always willing to transfer the premises to the plaintiff. But it did not appear that an offer to do so was ever made on the part of the defendant until after the commencement of the present suit. It was, however, admitted on the part of the plaintiff, that the defendant in selling the house to his son, had not acted in bad faith to the plaintiff.

The court charged the jury, that the first question was, whether the defendant was liable to pay damages? And the 2d, what was the rule of damages? The court had dismissed the first question by saying that the agreement was as binding on the defendant as if the plaintiff was bound to take the house. It was alleged on the part of the defendant, that although he was bound to give a deed of the house, yet, as his refusal to do so, was not founded in bad faith, the plaintiff was only entitled to nominal damages, as he sustained no loss except the profit which he might have made on the purchase. The court, however, did not think so. If a man agrees to sell a property, which he thinks he has a right to sell, and when called on to do so, finds that he has no authority, he is not liable for any damages except what had been actually sustained, and not for any rise which might have occurred in the value, as he had acted in good faith. But this was not the case in the present instance. If the plaintiff had no authority to sell the property in October, it was his own fault, and he was liable to damages. The next question was what amount of damages ought to be given. The witnesses for the plaintiff valued the property at from 9,000 to 10,000 dollars, while the witnesses for the defence valued it at only $7,500 or $8,000 at the utmost. If the jury thought that the property was intrinsically worth any sum over $7,500, in October, they would give the plaintiff a verdict for the difference; but if they believed that the property was only worth $7,500, a verdict for the plaintiff for six cents.

Verdict for the plaintiff, $250.

VOLCANOES IN THE SEA.

Our readers will recollect the remarkable occurrence which took place some time last year, of the sudden rising up, out of the bosom of the Mediterranean sea, of an island, formed by the action of a volcano. A friend has handed us the annexed account of a similar phenomenon, which was witnessed some years ago in the Atlantic, and which may possess interest for the general reader. The account is from the pen of an officer of the British ship of war Sabrina. The Mediterranean formation sunk and disappeared almost as rapidly as it rose. Whether the one described below was equally evanescent, or whether it still exists, we do not know.

H. M. S. Sabrina, 15th July, 1811.

It gives me the greatest pleasure to have it in my power to write on so interesting a subject as you will find in the following lines. On Sunday, the 16th June, (being bound from Fayal to St. Michael's, and in sight of the latter), at 1 P.M. we observed two separate columns of white smoke arising from the sea, off the west end of St. Michael's, which appeared very much like an engagement: we immediately made all possible sail, in hopes to join it, but this we were prevented from by the wind dying away. The smoke continued to ascend till 4, (with the same strength it did at first), at which time it ceased, except at intervals, till 6, when it again broke out with redoubled violence. It had now continued about 5 hours, which we concluded was too long for an action, and that it was a volcano; but we were too far distant to see the part of the island from whence it arose.

In the above manner it continued to arise till dark, when we lost sight of it, except sometimes that it was rendered visible by flashes of lightning, which seemed to ascend in the smoke. During the night a breeze sprung up, and on the 17th, at 6 A.M. we were close in with St. Michael's, and 8 or 9 miles from the volcano, which appeared to be 1-2 or two miles from the nearest part of the island, and still raged in a most majestic and awful manner. At 9 we anchored off the town, and the British consul came on board, who informed us the smoke was first seen to arise on the 14th June, previous to which they had sustained several very severe shocks of earthquakes, so much so that the destruction of the whole island was greatly dreaded; but they had now ceased, to the great satisfaction of the inhabitants. From our anchorage we could not see the volcano, but the smoke continued to arise over the land in immense clouds, all the remainder of the day. The 18th, the captain and some of the officers went to the west end of the island, where they saw the volcano still throwing up (from under water) vast columns of smoke, together with stones, cinders, ashes, &c. Whilst they were observing it, they were surprised with the shocks of earthquakes, one of them more than slight. At 11 A.M. they saw the mouth of the volcano or crater, just showing itself above the surface of the sea, and christened it Sabrina island. There were formerly 40 fathoms over the spot the volcano arose from. When the captain and officers returned, which was 3 P.M. they left Sabrina island about 30 feet high, and a furlong in length. The 19th we weighed and made sail toward Sabrina island, having on board four or five ladies, the British consul and five or six other gentlemen. At 11 A.M. we were about five or six miles from Sabrina island, which then appeared 50 or 55 feet in height, and two thirds of a mile in length. Before 12 we were within 3 miles of it, directly to leeward, when the clouds of smoke, having drawn up several water spouts, which, spreading in the air, occasioned a shower of rain to fall, together with a great quantity of fine black sand, which had been carried up with the smoke, descended with the rain, so much as to completely cover our decks. We remained about three or four miles from it the rest of the day. At 4 P.M. a very great eruption took place; vast quantities of black smoke were thrown perpendicularly up (notwithstanding there being a fresh breeze) with incredible velocity, pillar after pillar, in continued succession, hurling out at the same time a great number of large stones, some of which I saw fall into the sea more than a mile from the volcano. When the black smoke had arisen to its greatest height, (which was more than double as high as any part of St. Michael's it fell into the sea, where it left all the cinders, ashes, &c. that were too heavy to remain in the air, and then arose in a white cloud, and was carried away to leeward. We remained at sea all night, and, being near enough, we could see the smoke, which, being frequently illuminated by flashes of lightning ascending from the volcano, and the fall of red hot stones from an amazing height, exhibited a pleasingly awful scene.

The 20th, at 8 A.M. we came to in the roads of Ponta Delgada, having left Sabrina island at 5, upwards of one hundred and fifty feet high, and almost a mile long, still raging with great violence, and continuing to increase in size. We arrived at Fayal the 28th, and having watered, we sailed on the 30th for St. Michael's, leaving the consul at Fayal, and two of his daughters on board for a passage. On the 4th of July we were close in with St. Michael's, and about seven or eight miles from Sabrina island, which was perfectly quiet. At 10 A.M. we hoisted out the gig, and the captain, the consul, master, purser and myself went to see if there was a possibility of landing. On our near approach to the island, we found it surrounded with a very narrow steep beach of ashes, with a great deal of surf on, which occasioned a little difficulty in landing. When we got on the beach, we found the cliffs, or bank, (which was composed of fine black ashes and sulphur, with a few cinders and dross of iron), altogether inaccessible, except in one part, which we ascended with great difficulty, the ashes giving way at every step we took, fill it got so very hot to our feet that we were glad to return. We then walked round to the side toward the island St. Michael's; but before I proceed, I will describe its situation more fully.

It is about a mile and a half from the west end of St. Michael's, its circumference is more than two miles, the steepness of the cliff renders it inaccessible, and its height is more than two hundred feet. On the side toward St. Michael's it is quite open, that being the weather side when it was raging; here we saw the mouth of the crater, but it has now the appearance of a basin, being full of boiling hot water, from which there runs a continual stream of boiling water into the sea; and at the distance of fifty yards out the water abreast this place is too hot to keep one's hand in it. When we came to the stream we could not cross it, but walked round the island to the other side, where, after considerable difficulty, we got on an eminence about fifty feet high; here we set up our flag staff and hoisted the union, taking possession of the island in the name of his Britannic majesty. In many places the cliff was so hot that we could not bear to touch it, and the smoke still issued from the back part of the crater, which induced us to think it must soon break out again. In short, the whole island is but a crater, the cliff being the walls of it, for it is as steep inside as outside. After we had taken some samples of the different sorts of stone we found, we returned on board, and next morning anchored at St. Michael's, where we learned we were the first that ever set foot on Sabrina island, and of course had an undoubted authority to name it.

DISTRESSING CASUALTY

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

We find in our late Paris papers the following particulars of a painful disaster which occurred near Lyons. The result of the efforts to relieve the sufferer was not known at the date of the latest papers.

Lyons, September 6.

Last Sunday a tragical event happened on an estate situated at Champver. Some workmen employed in digging a well in a sandy and loose soil, had reached a depth of 63 feet, when they thought they perceived the drums, which are used to prevent the sand from breaking in, bending, and feared that they were just ready to yield to the pressure of the weight around them. The workmen made haste to reascend; but, in their haste, they left at the bottom of the well some of their valuable tools.

The contractor, wishing to repair this forgetfulness, went down himself to bring up the tools; but, on arriving at about three-quarters the depth, a part of the drum gave way, the ground crumbled in, and shut out all retreat from the imprudent man, to whom there remained no means of communication with the outside, except from the crevices left in the wood-work which had served to form the drum. In this position he still remains. He can speak, and is able to receive food and drink, which is sent down to him to support him until his deliverance can be effected. The efforts which have been made for this purpose, during the whole of yesterday, have been fruitless, and the unfortunate man has passed the whole night in this horrible position.—This morning they have continued their exertions. As it is manifestly impossible to save him by immediately clearing out the well, it has been determined to dig another by the side of the first. Some workmen of the school of civil engineers have entered on this labor, which cannot be finished till to-morrow.

September 8. We give some new details respecting the contractor who is buried under the crumbling of a well. Suspended in an abyss, and threatened every moment with a dreadful death, Dufavel (this is the name of the unfortunate man) shows great coolness and courage. He can communicate verbally with men who descend into the upper part of the well, which remains undisturbed; and in this way he has received a visit, at his own request, from M. Thevenet, the vicar of the parish of St. Just, who did not hesitate, notwithstanding the danger of the attempt, to descend into the neighborhood of this unfortunate man, and bestow on him the consolations of his holy office. Dufavel has sent up all the valuables he had about him, such as his watch, his silver money, ear-rings, &c. He kept nothing but his knife to use, as he says, to put a period to his miseries, if he should perceive that all the efforts for his deliverance prove fruitless.—He recommends them not to work over his head, and has pointed out, as the only means for his rescue, that they should dig a well parallel with the first, with which they can open a communication by means of a subterranean gallery. The public authorities have displayed a praiseworthy zeal on this occasion. M. Chinard, a physician, and one of the city government of Lyons, has not quitted the spot since the disaster, and he is accompanied by other members of the government. They encourage the workmen, who, to the number of eight, work day and night, with the soldiers of the engineer department, under the orders of an officer and of the head engineer. It is to be hoped that these labors may have a favorable result. At the hour at which we write, they have not succeeded in disengaging Dufavel. They do not even hope to reach him until to-morrow.

September 9. The unfortunate Dufavel is not yet released from the well where he was buried alive several days since. Yesterday evening the workmen of the Croix Rousse had dug a well parallel to that in which the crumbling took place, and had reached a depth equal to that of the first, and were employed in digging a horizontal passage to free their unfortunate companion, when a sudden crumbling forced them to ascend in haste, and abandon entirely the work they had begun. There remains now no hope except from the well undertaken by the workmen of the civil engineers, which cannot be finished until to-morrow.

September 10. The unfortunate Dufavel is not yet released from his horrible prison; but the engineers who are laboring to deliver him, hope to reach him in the course of the day. This evening he will be saved or lost. His courage keeps up; he has not, for a moment, been delirious, and he gives directions as to the method of working most likely to succeed in giving him relief. He eats with good appetite, and asks for food. His limbs are less pressed than for some days past. He cut away with a knife a hoop of the cask which pressed upon him. Though seated on the sand, and bent down, he is able to change his position in some measure.

September 11. In the course of the day yesterday, Dufavel became indisposed; his voice was changed, and he found difficulty in speaking; he is most incommoded by the pressure on one of his legs, on which he is seated, and which he can scarcely move. During the night he cut away with his knife some of the wood which embarrassed him. "I worked so hard," said he, "that I moistened my shirt with perspiration; but, as I could not sleep, it was as well to work." This morning he is better; he breakfasted with a good appetite. One of his cousins, a well digger, like himself, descended to speak to him. He expressed a desire not to be deceived as to his situation, and said, "You see I do not lose courage." On being told that they hoped to get him out on Saturday, he said, "That it will be more than eight days, but I can wait until then." He afterwards spoke of his wife: "Tell her (said he to his cousin) that I have good courage, and that she must not be distressed." The interest that the whole city takes in the horrible position of Dufavel increases every day. Several charitable persons cause masses to be said in churches for his deliverance. Last night the civil engineers who are at work on the gallery were on the point of reaching the gallery where he is buried, when a considerable quantity of an almost fluid sand crumbled in suddenly, and made ten or twelve hours of labor necessary to bring them to the point they had before reached. They are now very near the unfortunate man, but they must advance with infinite precaution, and very slowly.

September 12. We cannot yet announce the deliverance of Dufavel. The engineers advance but very slowly, on account of the sandy soil in which they are making a gallery. They have four or five feet horizontal distance to clear before reaching the cavity where the unfortunate man is pressed, in a position which grows more and more painful.—They are unable to advance more than two inches in an hour. They have planned the work so as to reach the back of Dufavel at the height of his shoulders. At the moment they reach him, he must be seized and dragged backwards with great promptitude into the passage made by the miners, otherwise he must infallibly be swallowed up by the crumbling which will take place at the moment they pierce the moveable walls of his subterranean retreat. It is easy to judge the difficulty of such a labor at 63 feet perpendicular depth, with similar means, and in such a position, and the danger in which the unfortunate man is placed so near his deliverance or his death. The interest taken by our citizens in the fate of Dufavel is intense. The territory of Champver is a dependency of the city of Lyons, and the charge of delivering Dufavel devolves on our government, who have spared no exertions to effect this object. The population of the city crowd to the spot: there are never less than seven or eight hundred individuals assembled there; all the roads leading to the place, particularly the one from Lyons, is constantly crowded with people going and returning. It has been necessary to place barriers at fifty paces distance from the opening of the well, and to place a guard of soldiers to restrain the curious, and prevent their breaking through the barriers, and interrupting the workmen. Collectors on the spot have received very considerable presents for the benefit of the unfortunate Dufavel and his family.

P. S. They announce that the deliverance of Dufavel is momentarily established.

A Lyons paper says: "Yesterday morning Dufavel asked again for the vicar Thevenet, and received a visit from him. M. Chinard sent down to him a double portion of hot wine. One of our richest and most charitable ladies has visited Dufavel, and promised to take on herself the care of providing for all his wants when he is relieved."

INTERESTING NATURAL PHENOMENON.

On Wednesday before the last, I had the good fortune to witness, in conjunction with several friends, the most splendid mirage I ever beheld. This interesting spectacle known under the names of the Spectre of the Brocken, Fata Morgana and Spectre Ships, is much more frequent than is generally supposed, and though now divested of its supernatural character by the searching scrutiny of science, is yet an object of intense delight to the philosopher and the lovers of nature. It was an object of superstition among the early American colonists, and has been happily seized upon by Washington Irving, in his beautiful description of the storm ship. Baron Humboldt, in his Travels in South America, describes a very curious mirage, in which cows were seen at a great height in the air. Scoresby, during a voyage to Greenland in 1822, says that having seen an inverted image of a ship in the air, he examined it with a telescope, and found it to be his father's ship, the Fame, and immediately announced it to the officer of the watch. Many more interesting instances of a similar nature might be mentioned, but I hasten to describe the one we witnessed. The phenomenon is more interesting, as it differs from any on record. It was all seen from the verandah of the New Cove House, near Phillip's Beach. The day was unusually clear and pleasant, and we were on the lookout for the aerial images, as one of our party had seen them on a similar day, a few weeks before.

Towards 3 o'clock, P. M. the shore south of Nant, known as the south shore, began to loom, and in a few minutes the mirage was upon the coast for leagues, and the Flying Dutchman, the terror of sailors, was before us in all its beauty. That part of the coast nearest to us, appeared to the naked eye to rise to a great height, and looked as if it were formed by immense perpendicular sand cliffs. On examining it with a glass, double images of all discernable objects were beautifully distinct. If a house was seen at the foot of the cliff, directly above it and at the top of the cliff, was also seen an erect image of the house, having as perfect outlines as the real object.

On following the coast towards its most distant part, the mirage assumed a different and more interesting character. The extreme visible coast seemed projected and hanging over the sea for miles, without foundation. It looked as if the sea had washed away its basis, and left its upper portion dangling in midair. By the telescope, this was found to be the inverted image of the coast below the horizon and perhaps many miles beyond the limit of direct vision. The tops of the trees were just dipping into the sea, and above them a small boat was seen sailing in the shrubbery. Presently the hitherto hidden coast rose from the waves, and now it looked as if it had been cleft by some mighty effort and the light of heaven were shining through the chasm. Trees were seen corresponding to the inverted images above, and the little boat was seen sailing near the coast. Following this image out to sea, something like a balloon was seen floating in the air, but by the glass it was found to be the inverted image of a sloop under sail and below the horizon. Vessels of all descriptions were seen sailing in the air with their hulls uppermost, in some instances the real objects not being visible, and in others being blended with the image so as to make a vessel of twice the ordinary height. Sometimes the image met the object vessel at the top of its masts, and at others was high in the air above it. The phenomenon lasted above an hour with a constantly varying character.

The mirage is doubtless the origin of the Flying Dutchman, and under a variety of forms was a source of superstitious terror until within the last fifty years; since which time it has become an object of scientific investigation, and is now reduced to definite laws and can be produced at pleasure on a small scale. It is the effect of a double refraction through a stratum of air of irregular density.—Those who are interested on the subject will better understand it by referring to Brewster's Letters on Natural Magic, as it is there explained by plates.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

Bristol, Thursday evening. The various engagements which have occupied the attention of the members throughout the whole of the week do not appear in the slightest degree to have weakened their interest, as was displayed in the continued full attendance at the sectional meetings this morning. In consequence of the contemplated botanical excursions to-morrow—one to Porthead in a steamer provided gratuitously for the occasion—this section prolonged its sitting this afternoon, and terminated its proceedings for the present session. The proceedings consisted of the conclusion of Dr. Richardson's report on the zoology of North America, which was drawn up at the request of the association; some remarks by Dr. Corbet on vegetable physiology, in which the absorption of different solutions into the circulating system was proved to be distinguished by the application of chemical tests, producing the distinguishing colors; a communication containing some general remarks on the productive spherules of the marisliace of the cryptogamic class of plants; and a paper by J. B. Yates, esq. on the vegetating wasp in the West Indies. The author was of opinion that the vegetative process, which is a cryptogamic plant, commenced during the life of the insect, which was, however, doubted by many of the naturalists present, several instances likewise being given of a similar excrescence on silkworms and other insects. A communication was also made by the rev. Mr. Phelps on the formation of peat, which he considered formed in stagnant waters by successive layers and deposits of aquatic plants; when Mr. Mackay exhibited some specimens of pine wood and leaves, in a remarkable fine state of preservation, found under a layer of peat 16 feet in depth. In connection with some remarks by Mr. Royle on the subject of caoutchouc, Mr. Rootsey gave his opinion that the elasticity of the fibre of silk produced by the silkworm was owing to the plants on which it fed containing this substance, which he found to exist in mulberry leaves. Several specimens of different varieties of silk were also exhibited and presented to the members.

At the statistical section an interesting communication was made by professor Forbs on the height, weight and strength of the Belgian, English, Scotch and Irish nations, the comparison being the least favorable to the former, and the most so to the latter. The experiments from which these deductions were made, were conducted from those made by professor Queteler at the meeting of the association in Cambridge. The average height of the Belgian was stated as 5 feet 7 8-10 inches; English, 5 feet 9 inches; Scotch, 5 feet 9 3-10 inches; and Irish, 5 feet 10 1-10 inches. The strength of the Belgians was also less than that of the English by 60 lb; in every case of experiment, 25 years being taken as the age of maturity.

Baron Charles Dupin, whose name has so long been known in connection with English statistical inquiries, next exhibited two maps of this kingdom, in which the several counties were shaded according to the density of population and proportionate criminality. The deductions formed from his inquiries into the latter were as follows—He calculated six different degrees of density of population to the 1,000 acres—Firstly, 100 inhabitants to 1,000 acres; secondly, 218; thirdly, 465; fourthly, 555; fifthly, 1,100; and sixthly, which was in highly populated counties, such as Middlesex, 7,000 inhabitants to the 1,000 acres. In the first district the proportion of offenders to the population would be 1 to 2,963; in the second, 1 to 1,427; in the third, 1 to 593; in the fourth, 1 to 550; in the fifth, 1 to 498; and in the sixth, 1 to 558.

In Ireland the same proportionate regularity did not exist, as their society was not in such a state as to allow the laws to be fully developed; and although the population was more condensed, there was less crime in the north than in the south, owing to the more industrious habits, greater degree of education, and comfort of the inhabitants.

Some curious comparisons were next given of the relative ages of criminals in England and France, in which the proportion of juvenile offenders was much greater in this country.

A paper was also read by Mr. Heyworth, being a report from the Statistical society of Manchester on the state of education at Liverpool, the investigation of which had taken a period of nearly fifteen months to complete. It represented that of the lower order to be of a very incomplete description, as, out of 62,700 children, 32,700 alone received incomplete instruction, whilst 30,000 were altogether destitute of it.

A paper was then read by Mr. Frupp on the statistics of education in Bristol.

At the mathematical section, papers were read from Messrs. Stevely, Wheatstone and Addans; and at that for geology a communication of deep interest was read from Mr. Cross on the changes introduced in the composition of substances by the continuous action of voltaic electricity. At the evening meeting, Mr. Murchison made some observations on the ancient hydrography of the Severn and the tributary streams, with an account of the alluvium and drift of South Wales and the adjacent parts of England, as distinguished from the great western drift. The chemical section also elicited a paper from professor Johnston on chemical constants; from professor Hare, of Philadelphia, a discussion on the nomenclature of Berzelius; and from Dr. Dalton remarks on atomic symbols. Mr. Exley made a communication on mathematics as applied to chemistry, which received the high approbation of Dr. Dalton and others, as being the first successful attempt to make chemistry a mathematical science. The application of his theory actually enabled the author to explain many of the common laws of chemical combination, and by it he had succeeded in calculating the specific gravity of nearly 57 different substances, in their gaseous and aeriform states, the results of which were most exactly the same as those attained by experiment.

The geological excursions, on which, during the last week, much interest has been manifested, will take place to-morrow, one being in a steamboat provided gratuitously for the occasion, which will go to the mouth of the Avon, and the other to inspect the cutting and progress of the great western railway, in consequence of which the geological section terminated its sitting this afternoon. The promenade at Miller's grounds, which was suspended on Tuesday evening, on account of the unfavorable state of the weather, was very well attended this evening, and afforded an opportunity, which was eagerly sought after and embraced, of cultivating a friendly intimacy with the various cultivators of science from remote parts which this occasion has drawn together. Amongst other desirable objects, a committee of record has daily been sitting during the week, for the purpose of considering and reporting to the general committee the various suggestions that may be made as a guide to future proceedings.

In addition to that from Liverpool, a deputation from Norwich is in the city, in order to invite the association to pay a visit to that place next year, and, to give strength to its appeals, is accompanied by a prebendary, who brings with him the cordial wishes and sympathy of the venerable diocesan.—This, along with various other matters, will be decided on Monday night.

The iron bar across the Avon has to-day been replaced in its position, but has been so much twisted in its fall as to render the anticipated flight across the river scarcely possible.

FOREIGN CHRONICLE.

Two African princes, sons of the late king of Ashantee, are in London, with their tutor. They were introduced to Lord Glenelg by one of the colonial governors. Their names are Quantamissah and Awasph.

King Otho of Greece arrived at Potsdam, in Prussia, on the 9th of September. The marriage contract between him and the princess Amelia, daughter of the grand duke of Oldenburgh, was signed on the same day at Dresden. The princess will be 18 in December.

The receipts at the musical festival in Manchester, were £10,592. Not far from $50,000. Viva la musica!

A new regulation has been enacted in England, by which bakers are required to have scales and weights in their shops, and to weigh the loaves in the presence of the purchasers, if requested. Also to furnish their bread wagons with scales and weights, for the same purpose.

A portion of London was thrown into an uproar, on the 15th of September, by the news that a huge bear had made his escape from a stable, and was roaming about, seeking whom he might devour. He had been a passenger from N. York on board the Sampson, intended for the Zoological Garden. A party of keepers from the garden succeeded in recapturing him, before he had done any mischief.

The Mendicity society in Dublin contemplate to make the poor who have received relief from their funds, which are now nearly exhausted, march in procession, to the amount of some thousands, for the purpose of exciting the charity and compassion of the affluent!

Letters from Madras say that the king of Bokhara had prohibited his Hindoo subjects from burning their dead, on the ground that such cremation is offensive, unhealthy and abhorrent to the feelings of Mussulmen.

Madam Malibran, the queen of song—she who commenced among us her brief but brilliant career, is no more. She died in Manchester, England, on Friday night, 23d September, after an illness of nine days, having only reached her 28th year.

Some disturbance had occurred at Nantes, in consequence of the arrest, trial and condemnation to a short imprisonment of a number of combination operatives—trades unionists. When the prisoners were on their way to prison, the populace attacked the gendarmes, with stones and other missiles. Several of the soldiers were seriously wounded. The mob proceeded so far as to commence throwing up barricades, but were ultimately dispersed by force.

The coronation of the emperor of Austria took place at Prague, on the 8th of September.

The London consol market is quoted, on Saturday afternoon, September 24th, at 88 13-48.

Bosnia. By attempting to introduce civilization among his subjects in Bosnia, it is said the sultan has thrown that province into a state of insurrection. The Mahomedans of that region have enjoyed peculiar privileges time immemorial, and they are determined not to yield them without energetic resistance. There had been some cutting off of heads. The insurrectionists had assembled in arms to the number of 12,000—and were increasing. The force of the vizier to oppose them, was only 10,000.

The slave trade. The English newspapers speak of the increase of the slave trade. There were about fifty Spanish slave ships to the southward of the coast of Africa, and about thirty to the northward, chiefly American built, engaged in the traffic. Many Portuguese vessels to the southward of the line, were engaged in this trade. There is no doubt that many American vessels built in the northern states and sold (though not built expressly) for the slave trade.

A duel lately took place in France between two brothers, one of whom was killed; it was occasioned by their rivalry in the profession of surgery.

A rare occurrence. A Paris paper states that the revenue of the kingdom of Norway, for the year 1835, exceeded the expenditure by 419,000 dollars. Notwithstanding the reduction of duties by the tariff of 1833, the receipt of customs was an excess of 911,700 dollars in gold and 88,718 dollars in notes.

Accounts from St. Helena, brought by an arrival at Salem, state that the English ship Doncaster, from Isle of France, with upward of eighty passengers, had foundered off the Cape of Good Hope, and all were lost. A part of the wreck and a number of the bodies had drifted ashore near Cape Aguilhas.

American cotton had advanced at Liverpool. The Review of the market for Saturday, the 24th September, says: "there has been a good demand for cotton throughout the week, particularly American, the common kind of which have advanced 1-8d. whilst the better descriptions, as well as most other kinds, fully support our last quotations." The sales of the week, including auction, amount to 28,350 bales, of which 5,500 American were on speculation. The prices ranged for baled, 6,880 bales, from 8 3-8 to 12d. New Orleans, 6,000 bales, 8 to 12 1/2d. Mobile and Alabama, 7,200 bales, 7 1/2 to 12d.

The land speculators have reached England. Virginia, Georgia and Texas lands are in market. Texas scrip sells for an English shilling per acre. A thousand acres of Georgia land sold for £50.

The British government has been compelled to raise the interest on the outstanding exchequer bills from 1 1/2 to 2 1/2 per cent, or 3 per cent. per annum, to prevent their being returned upon the treasury for payment. There are from eight to nine millions of these bills in circulation, all of which would have been sent in, as payment for taxes, had not the measure been adopted. Thus there is a pressure in the money market in England also.

It is stated in the London journals, that as the efflux of gold continues, the bank is about taking farther stringent measures. The joint stock companies and country banks are still curtailing their discounts; and a necessity is said to exist of pursuing rigid measures, until the value of money shall have been still more increased—until, in fact, the precious metals shall be rendered more valuable at home than abroad. The exportation of gold would then cease of course.

Important question. A reward of a gold medal, of the value of 400 florins, was offered lately by society at Harlem, for the best answer to the following questions:—"Is the time in which we live distinguished or not, as an epoch of good sense and humanity? If the affirmative, give the indications and proofs of it. If the negative, demonstrate it. In either case produce the result, honorable or dishonorable, towards the existing time." The answer may be written in Dutch, Latin, French, English or German.

Recognition of Mexican independence by Spain. In our columns will be found the report of a committee of the Mexican congress upon the subject of opening her ports to the commerce of Spain, preparatory to the recognition of her independence; and a restoration of amicable relations between the two nations. In our next number we shall republish the whole of the proceedings and discussions upon the question. The report and debates we find in the official paper of the Mexican government, the Diario del Gobierno, from which we translate them. [N. Orleans Rec.]

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

Letters from the Mediterranean announce the arrival, on the 19th August at Piræus, of the American squadron, consisting of the Potomac, Constitution and John Adams. On the 21st they were joined by the frigate United States.

Governor Jenison of Vermont, in his address to the legislature of that state, recommends the adoption of measures for the improvement of the public schools. He suggests the expediency of establishing institutions for the education of teachers, and of appropriating to the aid of such institutions and also of primary schools, the income of the portion of the surplus revenue which is to be received by the state.

Charles R. Williams has been elected chief justice, and Messrs. Royce, Collamer and Redfield assistant justices of the supreme court of Vermont.

On Tuesday the 25th ult. the thermometer at Albany, N. Y. stood at 20°, or 12° degrees below freezing, and so cold was the night that the locomotive from Utica the day previous was detained some time in order to procure water, which they were obliged to take from wells—the water in their reservoirs along the route being frozen solid. There is much snow to the north and west.

The St. Joseph's (Florida) Telegraph state that the hon. J. M. White has returned from a two years' tour in Europe, bringing with him a large supply of seeds and plants of foreign growth.

Speaking of the commercial prosperity of New Orleans the Grand Gulf Advertiser says—While on a visit there a few weeks since, we were actually astonished to witness the great number of large and splendid edifices which were under way and in rapid progress towards completion. The spirit of enterprise and industry seemed to be an absorbing principle with all classes. Eighteen months ago we thought the progress of improvement great, but it was nothing to compare to that which has taken place within the past six months and now in active operation.

This is ascribed to the recent division of the city into three independent municipalities, "as each municipality is ambitious to excel the other." To those who may incline to link their future fortunes with that enterprising place it is our duty to quote the opinion of the Grand Gulf Advertiser as regards the health of that city. The health of the city has been better the past summer than it was ever known to be; and from our observation of things, there is little doubt but that each succeeding year will find it greatly improved.

A meeting of the standing committee, appointed pursuant to a resolution adopted by the citizens of Richmond, at a meeting convened on the 12th instant, to consider the propriety of constructing a rail road from Richmond, by way of Farmville, to Lynchburg, and from Farmville to Danville, was held on the 27th October, which was resolved that as soon as a sufficient sum shall be subscribed for the purpose of procuring a preliminary survey and estimate of the rail road from Richmond to Farmville, this committee will proceed to the appointment of an engineer, to execute and prepare the same.

It is rather an interesting and certainly a novel fact that, owing to the present exorbitant price of bread, and wheat flour, public attention has been directed to the use of superfine rice flour. One part of this united with three of wheat flour makes the most wholesome, and by far the cheapest family bread. It is now extensively used by the family bakers in New York, and found to make superior bread to wheat flour alone. It is the most wholesome of all farinaceous substances, being the sole food of millions in Asia, where protracted lives are justly ascribed to the constant use of this simple food. The difference in the price of both articles is well worthy the attention of families—the rice flour is quite dry and it should be remembered that where a barrel of wheat flour should contain 196 lbs. the dampness leaves not more than 190 lbs. of food. The rice flour, as before stated, is perfectly dry—is all food—far more wholesome, and sells at a more economical rate.

A special election by order of the governor of Georgia will be held on the first Monday of the present month to supply the place of the hon. J. Coffee, in the present congress. On the same day comes on the election for president and vice president of the U. States.

In reference to the fertility of Texas a planter of that country bets $200 that he will clear this year, with 13 hands, $600 each, that is $7,800, and that his profits would be much greater but for the disturbances in the country.

A letter dated the 22d ult. from Ashville, N. C. states that the number of shares subscribed to the Louisville, Cincinnati and Charleston rail road at that place was 442, and an extract from a letter dated Columbia, 24th October, states that the subscriptions in the upper country have been quite liberal.

Patent rifle. A young man named John H. Cochran, of New Hampshire, has invented a rifle which may be fired any number of times in quick succession. He has sold the right for manufacturing in the United States to a company in New York for $300,000, and received a gold medal from the New York American Institute as a reward for his ingenuity.

Upwards of three hundred mechanics, artisans and laborers, landed at New Orleans on the 11th instant from the northern cities. During the past season, inferior carpenters were procuring $4 to $4 50 per day in that city, and first rate bricklayers often commanded $5 per day.

Specie has become scarce in New Orleans, and the papers of that city announce, with no little satisfaction, the arrival of parcels from abroad. $100,000 arrived on the 10th from Philadelphia, and $55,000 from Natchez, and the banks have made a joint arrangement for the importation of $3,000,000 from Mexico, to be paid by bills on England.

A letter from Cincinnati states that the theatre of that place was destroyed by fire on the morning of the 21st inst. The loss is estimated at $100,000.

Such is the scarcity of coal at Quebec that the daily line of steamers to Montreal is suspended. The cold is so excessive that the ice made on the canal at Montreal, Oct. 28, and large quantities of potatoes have been frozen.

Meteor. On Sunday, 23d, a large meteor, or fire ball, was observed to pass over Greenfield, Mass. at 7 and 11 o'clock at night; it exploded both times, causing the houses to quiver as if affected by an earthquake.

It would seem from the Bangor Courier that the lawyers in that place must be doing a fine business—there being on the docket of the court of common pleas, at a recent session, no less than twenty-five hundred cases, and on that of the supreme court about to commence its sittings—sixteen hundred.

Another dreadful accident. A schooner which arrived at Portland, (Me.) picked up, 70 miles from Elizabeth, a schooner belonging to Bath, loaded with potatoes and wood, and bound to Boston, capsized and on her beam ends, all the crew dead except the captain, who is now in a very low state—four dead bodies were found on the wreck. The captain had a nephew on board, who was the last man who died.

Post office in New York. A branch of the New York city post office has been established in Wall street in that city and Jameson Cox, esq. has been appointed to take charge of it.

Telescope. One of the most powerful reflecting telescopes in the United States, has been recently manufactured by Amasa Holcomb of Mass. for the Newark college, Delaware. Length 14 feet, and with a 10 inch speculum.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 11.—VOL. I.]

BALTIMORE, NOVEMBER 12, 1836.

[VOL. LI.—WHOLE No 1,311

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

"REFORM OR REVOLUTION" IN MARYLAND.—In the present sheet we publish governor Veazey's proclamation reprobating the conduct of the recalcitrant electors,—declaring that the constitution and government yet exist in all their integrity—that the senate elected in 1831 continue to be the senate of Maryland, and will so continue until superseded by the election of successors as constitutionally and lawfully provided for—that they with the house of delegates elected in October last constitute the general assembly of the state—and convening the said general assembly on Monday the 21st inst. &c.

The proclamation has caused considerable excitement, but will not, we think, lead to any serious difficulties. The result of the late election, and the attitude in which the state now stands, has produced a crisis which invokes the moderation of the reflecting portions of both parties; and from present indications we are sanguine that the question will be settled without collision between the "reformers and revolutionists" and the authorities under the constitution.

FRANCE AND THE UNITED STATES. Among the passengers in the packet ship Silvie de Grasse, which arrived at New York on Tuesday last from Havre, is M. Pageot, the former secretary to the French legation, who has been appointed by the government of France charge d'affaires until the arrival of the new minister, M. Edouard Pontois, who is at present in Brazil. Thus friendly relations are restored with our ancient ally, and we hope they will long remain uninterrupted.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. We cannot, from the numerous contradictory statements before us, make out any thing like a correct account of the result of the elections recently held, with the exception of that in Maryland—for the returns partake so much of the wishes or fears of the parties making them, that it is impossible to arrive at the truth.—Our readers must, therefore, be content for the present, with the following brief synopsis from the returns before us, chiefly based upon rumor and conjecture. In the next "REGISTER" we will be able, we hope, to present a correct exhibit from official sources.

Connecticut. In this state the election took place on the 7th inst. and the following is said to be correct as far as ascertained.

	V. B. maj.	H. maj.
Hartford county,		206
New Haven,		30
Litchfield,		78

Majority for Van Buren, 895
There are seven counties yet to hear from which will not vary the result.

From New York, in which the election continued three days, we have very few returns. The New York Commercial of yesterday says—

The inspectors, from the great number of scattering votes, make but slow work of canvassing in this city. We have visited most of the polls this morning, but have not been able to ascertain with certainty the result.

Marcy's majority for governor will not probably vary much from 1,000.

Tallmadge's election to the senate is almost beyond a doubt.

The congress ticket probably stands two and two, viz: Cambreleng and Moore on the Van Buren ticket, and Curtis and Hoffman on the whig.

Galick is elected register, by about 3,000 majority. The assembly ticket is canvassed as yet but in few of the wards. Probably there are two or three whig members elected.

Nothing certain from the river counties or the interior of the state.

From Pennsylvania the returns are still very confused and incomplete, and the state is claimed by both parties. The "National Gazette" of yesterday, Vol. LI—Sre, 11.

contains a statement that leaves out several large majorities on both sides, that are contested or denied, and omits altogether any estimates of the vote of nineteen counties, and gives the following result: for Harrison 53,548, for Van Buren 52,068. The last "Pennsylvania" (V. B.) publishes a statement which makes Van Buren's majority over 4,000; and the "Philadelphia Daily Advertiser," (whig) contains a letter dated at Harrisburgh, Nov. 10, that says it is conceded that the state has gone for Van Buren.

The election has been very close, and it is impossible to arrive at a correct result until the returns are canvassed at Harrisburgh. Both parties also claim a majority in the convention. The "Daily Advertiser" says it will stand 68 whigs to 65 V. B.—and the "Pennsylvanian" 68 V. B. to 64 whigs—I doubtful. We will of course give full and authentic returns hereafter.

The following is the result of the election in Delaware.

	Harrison.	Van Buren.
Kent county,	186	New Castle, 146
Sussex,	422
Harrison,	608
Van Buren,	146

Harrison's majority, 462

The whig governor and member of congress have been elected by about the same majorities.

The following returns of the election in Maryland are nearly correct. In our next we will present the aggregate returns from the counties, and a revised summary.

Harrison majority 3,585

From Ohio the returns, thus far, place general Harrison 4,883 ahead of his opponent, and 30 counties yet to hear from.

Virginia. The Intelligencer of this morning contains a statement from thirty-six counties and the cities of Richmond and Norfolk, that gives the following results: whig ticket 4,922—Van Buren ticket 3,611.

JAMES H. McCULLOCH, esq. the venerable collector of the port of Baltimore, died at his residence, near this city, on Thursday evening last. No man that ever lived was more ardent in devotion to his country, or resolute in defending her liberties. In the revolutionary war he was a brave and active partisan, and in the late war with Great Britain, tho' his locks were hoary with age, he shouldered his musket, and at the battle of North Point, fought with an invincible spirit. In that battle his leg was broken by a cannon ball, and he was taken prisoner by the enemy. His private life was characterized by stern integrity, and he faithfully discharged his public duties.

EULOGY ON MR. MADISON. We have at last found an opportunity of publishing Mr. Barbow's eloquent eulogy upon the character and services of Mr. Madison. Most of our subscribers have, no doubt, ere this read it; but it is due to the memory of the illustrious deceased that it should be placed on record for the benefit of posterity. As soon as room is afforded, we will also publish copious extracts from Mr. J. Q. Adams' eulogy on the life and character of the same devoted patriot, delivered at the request of the mayor, aldermen and common council of Boston, on the 27th of September last. It makes a pamphlet of 87 pages, large 8vo. and is one of the most noble efforts that has proceeded from the powerful mind of its distinguished author; being deeply imbued with the "philosophy of history," and practical wisdom that will benefit the nation and individuals.

"BALTIMORE ADDRESS DIRECTORY." We have before us a little work compiled by Wm. G. Lyford, esq. entitled the "Baltimore Address Directory."—It contains the names and places of business of the principal merchants, mechanics, traders, &c. of Baltimore, handsomely displayed, introduced by a very interesting exhibit of its trade and resources, highly creditable to Mr. Lyford's tact and industry. This volume Mr. L. intends to distribute, in person, through the western states; and we cannot conceive a better plan to accomplish a great good by small means, as those who promoted the project, will, we hope, soon discover.

THE PUBLIC DEPOSITES. The Rhode Island legislature, on Friday the 4th inst. passed a bill providing that the portion of the public money which shall be received by the state of Rhode Island, shall be deposited in the several banks of the state which have conformed with the law of the state, and which will agree to receive the same and pay to the state interest at the rate of five per cent. The interest is appropriated to the support of public schools.

THE TENNESSEE LEGISLATURE adjourned on the 26th ult. They passed a law to secure to the state her proportion of the surplus revenue of the United States. It empowers the governor, comptroller and treasurer to receive the money, on giving the necessary pledges for its safe keeping and return when required. They are to deposit it in the Union bank, and in the Planter's bank of Tennessee—on their giving bond to receive it at their own charge, repay it when required by the secretary of the treasury of the U. States—and pay 5 and 6 per cent. interest on it—and if these banks decline, then to deposit it with the bank of Memphis.

THE SURPLUS. The National Intelligencer estimates that the following division of the surplus will be declared on the 1st of January:

Should the sum to be distributed, on the 1st day of January, amongst the states, amount, as it possibly may, to forty-six millions of dollars, the share of each state will be as follows:

New York,	42	$6,573,000
Pennsylvania,	30	4,695,000
Virginia,	28	3,569,000
Ohio,	21	3,236,500
North Carolina,	15	2,347,500
Tennessee,	15	2,347,500
Massachusetts,	14	2,191,000

THE COTTON CROPS. By the New Orleans Standard it is stated on the authority of an eminent merchant, that the crop of last year was 1,355,361 bales. Exported from New Orleans 496,363, of which 23,850 was from Mobile and Florida, leaving the rest brought down the river.

The cotton exports of the present year may be estimated as follows:

Receipts at New Orleans,	510,000 bales.
or 95,000 more than last year.
do. at the Atlantic ports,	600,000
43,219 more than last year.
do. at Mobile,	200,000
or 23,848 more than last year.
do. at Florida,	190,000
or 16,900 less than last year.

Making a total of 1,500,000 bales. Which shows an increase over the past year, of more than 100,000 bales. The increase has been gradual.

So that there is evidently an increased consumption, for the prices are constantly advancing.

DIFFERENCE IN PRICES. The Hampshire Republican gives the following comparative statement of prices in Massachusetts in the years 1796 and 1836, a period of 40 years.

MAJOR GEN. SCOTT passed through Baltimore on Tuesday last on his way to Frederick (Md.) where the court is to assemble for the investigation of the charges against him and other officers, in reference to the failure of the spring campaign against the Indians.

GEN. GAINES. The last number of the Army and Navy Chronicle contains the following extract of a letter from an officer in the army. Gen. Gaines is daily expected in Baltimore on his way to Frederick, Md. to meet the military court which is to assemble there.

"Camp Sabine, La. Oct. 6, 1836.

"Gen. Gaines is at Natchitoches, and will leave in a few days for Mobile. He has ordered five companies of the 6th and two of the 8d infantry to return to Fort Jesup. Major Thompson, commanding the 6th, is to remain at Fort Jesup. Brevet major Riley, of the 6th, is ordered with three companies of the 6th to take up a position near the Sabine, about 90 miles north west from this camp.—Brevet major Belknap, of the 3d, with two companies of the 8d and two of the 7th, will occupy Camp Sabine.

"This frontier is perfectly quiet. No Indian disturbances, and none likely to take place. The Indians are few in number, quietly pursuing their avocations, and in my opinion dare not molest the frontier settlements of Louisiana; and it is believed that they have never entertained an idea of the kind. A thousand stories have been circulated to the prejudice of the Indians, which have proved false. On this frontier, a man would be considered very credulous, who should regard the reports that daily come from Texas."

The Arkansas State Gazette of the 18th ultimo, contains another letter from an officer in the United States army, dated "Camp Nacogdoches, Texas, Sept. 21," in which it is stated that there had been a great deal of sickness, both in town and camp, and that all the officers except two had been ill. They were, however, recovering. The letter adds:

"There is something singular in our occupation of Nacogdoches. There never has been, nor is there likely to be, any difficulties with the Indians.—They are as peaceable as could be expected, urging the necessity of keeping white men out of their country. The principal chiefs say that the white man sell liquor to them, they get drunk, become quarrelsome, and they are apprehensive, lest they might, in their drunken quarrels, kill a white man; in which case they say war would ensue."

The Natchitoches (La.) Gazette, of 24th ult. contains the following, from which we presume that the troops who were ordered to the Sabine, from Fort Towson and Gibson, some time ago, are on their return, ere this, to their old quarters.

"The United States troops which Gen. Gaines had so unwisely ordered across the Sabine, have been recalled, we understand, and are to depart shortly from Fort Jesup for Fort Gibson (or some other frontier post of Arkansas) in consequence of a communication from Gen. Arbuckle, announcing commotions among the Indians in that country."

THE CREEKS. The New York Journal of Commerce contains an extract of a letter, dated at Washington, Nov. 4, which says—"It seems that our disturbances with the Indians are never to be quieted. Rumors are already rife in relation to the declarations of Chillee McIntosh and the Creek chiefs that are yet to emigrate. Chillee has boldly declared that he will kill all the Creek chiefs that migrate west of the Mississippi, unless they do fealty to him; and our government has received notice of his declared intentions. Hence we shall be obliged to increase the army to ten or fifteen thousand men, or receive the services of an adequate number of volunteers, to keep in subjection these very Indians, which the humane policy of our government provided with new homes west of the great father of rivers."

INDIAN TREATY. The Louisville (Kentucky) Journal of October 21, contains the following interesting information—"A correspondent in the Wisconsin territory informs, that a negotiation was held, on the 23d ult. at Rock Island, between governor Dodge and the confederated tribes of Sacs and Foxes.

The governor as superintendent of Indian affairs for the territory, had authority to negotiate with those tribes for the purchase of all their lands west of the Mississippi, and to propose to them to remove south of the Missouri. Propositions to this effect were made to the Indians in council, to which they refused to accede: they would consent to sell only a small reserve on the Iowa river, containing about 400 square miles. This governor Dodge, purchased of them for the sum of $192,000, being at the rate of 75 cents per acre—a higher price than was ever before paid to the Indians for their lands.

THE WILLIAM GIBBONS. We are sincerely gratified to learn that Joshua Andrews, late first mate of the steam packet William Gibbons, has been arrested and committed for trial, on the charge of robbing the passengers and lading of the steam packet, after the wreck. The occurrences previous and subsequent to that disaster, have been such as to call loudly for a close investigation, and severe punishment of all who may be proved deserving thereof. The examination of Andrews took place yesterday before judge Betts, of the U. S. district court. We copy from the Courier and Enquirer.

[N. Y. Com.]

The principal witness to sustain the accusation was captain Thomas W. Winslip, of the ship Scotland, about to sail for Liverpool, who at the time of the accident, was a passenger on board of the William Gibbons. From his testimony it appeared that himself and others, after the landing of the passengers, were engaged until the 16th or 16th of October, in attempting to rescue from destruction and land the baggage and cargo, among which was a considerable number of watches and a quantity of jewelry, consisting of breast pins, rings, &c. &c.—That Andrews, the accused, was the first mate of the vessel at the time of her being wrecked, and from various circumstances that occurred, the witness and others entertained strong suspicions that Andrews was perpetrating deeds of dishonesty, which induced them to keep a vigilant eye upon him; and on two several occasions, during the afternoon of Wednesday the 12th October, they distinctly saw him take from his pockets two handfuls of jewelry, principally rings and breastpins, and throw them overboard into the sea.

Captain Winslip then collared him, threw him down, taxed him with the theft of the jewelry and watches, which he sternly denied, although two of the watches were afterwards found in his possession, independent of some watches and watch chains which Andrews had previously given to the barkeeper and captain Halsey. On one or two occasions during the examination, the prisoner boldly asserted that the evidence was false, although he admitted that he had broken open one box which contained jewelry. He was ordered to find bail in $1,000 to appear at the court in North Carolina for trial for the imputed taking and destroying the property, and in default was committed to prison.

A gentleman who was a passenger on board of the William Gibbons, has informed the editor of the Wilmington, (N. C.) Advertiser, that at the time she was wrecked "the atmosphere was entirely clear and scarcely a breath of wind stirring," and that there is strong ground for the supposition, that the wreck of the boat was the result of a preconcerted scheme of some of the officers and crew. Many circumstances which occurred after the loss, furnished strong confirmation to the passengers of this opinion. One among many others, was, the simultaneous robbery, by the crew and some of the officers, of the passengers trunks, from which money to a large amount was taken, together with watches, jewelry, &c. Those who were suspected of this most atrocious villany, had found their way to Norfolk in the yawl of the steamboat, thence they proceeded north. At the last accounts the steamboat had bilged, and was in possession of the wreckers.

CHOLERA AT CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA. The board of health have issued a report, declaring that the disease had nearly disappeared from Charleston. No new case had occurred for the last two days. The following table will show the number of deaths from the first appearance of the disorder to the last day of October:—

MCGREGOR vs. MCKINLEY. This case, which has occupied the attention of a Philadelphia court for four weeks, was terminated, by a verdict for $1,709 25 in favor of the plaintiff. This is one of the cases arising out of the late extraordinary failure of Mrs. McKinley, which caused, at the time, so much excitement in N. York. The following report is from the Philadelphia Gazette:

Mr. McGregor sold her goods to the amount of twelve hundred and fifty-one dollars and three cents; when his bill came to maturity he called on her for payment, and was, like the most of her creditors, put off with the declaration that she was a married woman and not liable for her contracts, and that her husband was not liable, having, as she said, never participated in her business. Upon receiving this reply, Mr. McGregor instituted a proceeding in replevin to recover back his goods; in this he was baffled by the lady, as she, by destroying the marks of identity on the goods, effectually concealed them from the sheriff. Although Mr. McGregor thus failed in obtaining his goods, he persisted in his action to recover their value in damages from the husband.

The case was put principally on the ground of fraud, and the whole of these transactions were minutely and laboriously examined. After the evidence was closed, the counsel on both sides submitted the cause to the jury without argument. The jury gave the verdict above stated which was composed of the following items: Twelve hundred and fifty-one dollars and three cents for the value of the goods; eighty-six dollars and seventy-three cents interest; and three hundred and seventy-one dollars forty-nine cents damages as a decided mark of their disapprobation of the conduct of the defendant.

SOURCES OF THE MISSISSIPPI. From a letter written by the scientific traveller, Mr. Nicollet, to the president of St. Mary's college in Baltimore, dated October 1, at St. Peter's, Upper Mississippi, we have been kindly permitted to publish the following extract. [Balt. Gazette.]

"I have just returned from a long journey to the sources of the Mississippi. I owe to the politeness and enlightened liberality of col. Davenport and the other officers of Fort Snelling, and of major Taliaferro, all the facilities and the protection which I needed to perform this long, painful and dangerous expedition. The result of this adventurous journey is, that I have completed the knowledge of the sources of the Mississippi, and have traced a detailed geographic and topographic map of an interesting region, two-thirds of which has hitherto been unknown. The numerous researches which I have made are founded on two thousand astronomical and barometrical observations. I have spent fifty-nine nights in the forests of the north west, or in the marshes of the Mississippi, and yet my health is at this moment better than it has ever been. Uniting the observations of this campaign with the result of my labors for three years in the whole extent of the valley of the Mississippi, and in every direction in the far west, I find myself enabled to write the physical and civil history of one of the greatest rivers in the world from the height of its sources till it empties into the Gulf of Mexico."

THE GREAT WESTERN ROAD. It will be recollected by our readers, that at the last session of congress, the sum of $100,000 was appropriated for opening a military road from St. Peter's near the falls of St. Anthony, on the Upper Mississippi, along the western frontiers of Missouri and Arkansas, to Red river. In conformity with this act a board of officers has been appointed by the secretary of war, consisting of colonel Taylor and major Smith, of the U. States army, and major McNeil, of the topographical engineers, who were ordered to rendezvous at St. Louis, (where, we perceive by the last papers, some of them had arrived), to mature their plans of operations for surveying the whole route for the road. It is contemplated, (we understand by a gentleman of the army who has seen the instructions of the board), to establish a cordon of military posts along this road, for the more permanent and effectual protection of the western frontier.

The board of officers are instructed to have a special regard to the law, (also of the last session of congress), for the removal of the troops from Fort Gibson, and for the location of a new post at or near the boundary line, and the new road is to cross the Arkansas at the same point. [Arkansas Journal.]

Messrs. Hall, Slade and Allen (whigs) and Mr. Fletcher (Van Buren) are elected. In the 3d district, now represented by Mr. Everett, there was no choice.

SHOOTING STARS. Most persons will remember to have seen or heard of the splendid phenomenon of those brilliant meteors on the morning of the 18th of November, 1833. Various and discordant theories have been formed and published, to account for these shooting stars, as they are commonly denominated. One of these theories make them asteroids, and contend for their annual return. In a New Orleans paper, "The Times," public attention is called to the heavens on the nights of the 12th and 13th of this month.

A look into the heavens on a clear night is always rewarded, even if nothing else appears but "the eternal lamps," the steady members of the upper regions; therefore we add our recommendation to that of the New Orleans writer, though we differ in totum from the opinion which gives a planetary character to those scintillating sparks. We may, however, remark, that their non-appearance at any given place, affords no conclusive proof of their non-existence, as they may pass over in daylight. Those of 1833 were seen on so wide an angle of the sphere, as to render their passage necessarily visible from some part of the earth. Time and more accurate observation will change hypothesis to science, on this as on all other subjects adequately examined.

The phenomenon of the morning of November 13th, 1833, was visible along the eastern coast of North America, from the Gulf of Mexico to Halifax, from 9 in the evening of the 12th, to sun rising of the 13th, and it is said, that in some places was after sun rising to 8 in the morning.

In 1799, a similar phenomenon was seen in America, by M. de Humboldt; in Greenland by the Moravian brethren, and in Germany by divers persons; and also in the night between the 11th and 12th of November. The evidences of such appearances in the heavens between the 10th and 15th of November of each year, are so numerous as to demand attentive observation from all who are so situated as to give attention to the "WONDERFUL WORKS OF GOD." [Pittsburgh Ado.]

NEW JERSEY. On Thursday the 3d inst. Phileman Dickerson, of Patterson, was elected by the legislature, governor of New Jersey, in place of governor Vroom, who resigned that office in consequence of indisposition. The vote, on joint ballot was, for Dickerson 33, William Pennington 25. Mr. Dickerson is a brother of the secretary of the navy, and a member of the present congress.

OFFICIAL. Navy department, November 8, 1836. The board of naval surgeons, recently convened in the city of Washington, has closed its labors and adjourned.

The assistant surgeons, passed for promotion, rank in the following order: Jona M. Foltz, John C. Mercer, Samuel C. Lawrason, Edward Gilchrist, Lewis Wolfly, Lewis W. Minor, Robert M. Baltzer, William P. Powell.

SENATOR PORTER, OF LOU. The Louisiana Advertiser of the 25th ult. states that Alexander Porter, esq. will not be a candidate for a seat in the U. S. senate at the approaching election by the legislature. He is said to be engaged in writing a history of Louisiana.

BARON DE RONNE was presented on the 27th ult. by the acting secretary of state to the president, to whom he delivered his credentials as minister resident of his Prussian majesty near the U. States.

The secretary of the navy, who has been much indisposed from the beginning of the month, and for the last fortnight confined to his room, has so far recovered as again to attend at his office for the transaction of business. [Globe.]

A DEED OF NOBLE DARING. Mr. James D. Garland, of Newark, publishes in the Daily Advertiser of that city, the following account of the rescue of his only son during the recent conflagration:

"My son, a boy of eleven years, led by curiosity or boyish hardihood, ascended to the second story of a wooden building in the rear of, I believe, a trunkmaker's shop, in Market street, the roof of the building at the time being nearly destroyed, and one end in flames. Some of the bystanders told the boy to come down, as the chimney tottered. He immediately attempted it, but the flames had reached the stairs, and he pushed back to the window; the garret floor had now burnt through, and the fire was falling around and upon him.

"The people now beckoned to him to jump, as the only means of saving his life; terrified at his situation, nearly suffocated by the smoke and flames, he sunk down on the floor. At this moment a young man sprang through the crowd and rushed up the burning stairs to rescue him. The moment he reached the top, the stairs fell, leaving no egress but a leap from a second story window among the burning brands beneath. Nothing daunted, he caught up my son, and sprang from the blazing building unhurt, bearing with him the object of his noble efforts! With the true modesty of his daring spirit, the preserver of my child disappeared from the crowd, and not until last evening could I learn his name. And it was then with admiration that I learned my son is the fifth fellow being he has been the instrument, in the hands of a gracious Providence, of saving from a violent death.

"If there is an individual possessed of the noble and lofty attributes of man, that being is Henry Moore, of Ferry street."

USEFUL INVENTION FOR THE SICK OF THE ARMY. Captain H. L. Thistle, of New Orleans, who commanded a company of Louisiana volunteers during the last campaign in Florida, has invented a saddle for the conveyance of the sick on a march. The invention has met with great favor among the officers of the army—and the war department, to testify its high opinion of it, has already ordered fifty saddles to be made for present purposes. It requires eight or ten men, says the Army and Navy Chronicle, to carry a wounded man on a litter, and then the progress is very slow. By means of captain Thistle's saddle, a horse and a man to lead him are sufficient, and the patient is removed with less pain and inconvenience.

ACCIDENT AND LOSS OF LIFE. The steamboat Rhode Island on her passage down last night, run into the sloop Eliza Nichols, bound to New Bedford, rendering the sloop a perfect wreck, and a Mrs. Howland was unfortunately drowned. Two persons were rescued from the cabin of the sloop by being cut out.

When the steamboat ran foul of the sloop, the main boom of the vessel struck the ladies' cabin and demolished a tier of berths. An infant was lying in one of the beds and was thought to have been killed, but on removing the crushed pieces of boards, &c. the little infant was found unharmed, and restored to its anxious parents. [N. Y. Star.]

A GROWING ISLAND! The New York Sun states on the authority of a letter from a French geologist to the French academy of sciences, that an extensive island of solid rock will soon make its appearance in the Mediterranean. The particulars of this strange geological fact are as follows:—

"The fishermen of the island of Panetorio, in the Grecian Archipelago, informed a visitant to the island, towards the close of the last century, that the bottom of the sea had lately risen considerably at a certain place near the port of Thera. The soundings were then from 15 to 20 fathoms, but previously the bottom could not be found. In 1829 that island was again visited, when it was ascertained that the rise of the submarine land had gradually continued, and that the depth of water was then not more than four and a half fathoms. Soundings were again made in 1830, when in a period of less than a year, the depth had decreased half a fathom. The form and extent of the rock was also taken by which it was found to be 800 metres in length and 500 in breadth. The depth all around this anticipated island was very great. Since this time the place has been repeatedly visited, and the rock found gradually to rise, so that in September last it had come to within two fathoms of the surface. In four years, therefore, the rock will become a large island, and these are the facts communicated by the letter referred. By the submarine volcanoes there, in 1712, the island of Kaimeni, in the same port, and near by, was formed, but no eruptions have since appeared, though this rising of the land indicates the still active power of internal heat which, whenever the resistance shall be reduced, will burst forth in its wonted fury."

MADAME MALIBRAN. The funeral of Madame Malibran took place at Manchester on the 1st of October. More than two columns of the London Morning Herald are occupied with a description of the ceremonies. Mons. De Beriot, her husband, was not present, having set off post-haste for Brussels immediately after her decease. This proceeding had given rise to many unfavorable reports, which even went to such a length that the coroner was strongly urged to hold an inquest on the body. He waited on the committee appointed to direct the funeral, and was satisfied that no grounds existed for his official interposition. Dr. Belluomini, who attended Madame de Beriot, is an eminent osteopath; he has published an account of her illness in the newspapers. He has also published a statement intended to exonerate M. de Beriot from all blame on account of his strange departure before the funeral; which, it seems, was only advised but insisted on by the doctor, who feared that M. de Beriot's grief and excited state of feeling would prove fatal to him unless dissipated by change of scene, &c. It is understood that at the body will be hereafter removed to the continent—probably to Belgium, of which kingdom M. de Beriot is a native.

The Paris papers state that a grand musical festival is in preparation in memory of Madame Malibran; the artistes connected with all the lyric theatres will assemble at a musical soirée, the proceeds of the entertainment to be distributed to the poor. The salle of the opera has been offered by M. Duopnchel for the occasion.

BRITISH COMMERCIAL POLICY. The editor of the New Orleans Standard remarks:

The British government is becoming aware of the advantage of having warehouses on this continent. Already the port of Harbor Grace, in Newfoundland, and of Grand Key, Turk's Island, in the Bahamas, are declared free ports for the warehousing of goods. This is another attempt to aid British shipping, and may attain its object. An entrepot and free port at the Bahamas may also act as a minor rival to Havana in the European and Atlantic trade with Mexico; and certainly with the West India islands.

CANADA JURORS. The following extract from the Montreal Gazette of the 25th ult. exhibits a ludicrous picture, and conveys a singular idea of the mode in which justice is administered in the provinces—where a portion of the inhabitants speak no English, and many speak no French:

"Of all ridiculous scenes, that which occurred on Friday last, at the quarter session, must bear the palm. The hon. D. B. Viger, took possession of the bench, and instead of following the usual method of naming a foreman, requested the grand jurors present to retire and elect one for themselves. With this, the jury complied, and presented the object of their choice in the person of Charles Jarret. The chairman then inflicted upon them of course, a long address upon every thing and nothing, after which the jury retired to proceed to business. The hon. chairman had scarcely got himself into a comfortable and dignified attitude, ere the jury returned to state, that their foreman could neither read nor write, and they therefore were incompetent to act.

The court now named Jesse Thayer as foreman, but still this would not do. The jury again came into court and stated that they could not understand each other, some could speak English and others French, but none could act as interpreter between them both. This was another dilemma, and yesterday, Messrs. Viger, Barret and Millar being on the bench, the opinion of the court was pronounced by the latter as being opposed under law and precedent to the introduction of a sworn interpreter, Mr. Viger differed from his colleagues, and gave them and the audience a lecture upon the jury law, the present dreadful state of society, anarchy, confusion, the weakness of government, &c. &c. evidently to the satisfaction of the chairman, but fatiguing to the auditors. The jury retired again and late in the afternoon had found some means to proceed to business, inasmuch as they brought in four bills."

THE AMERICAN ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY held its annual meeting at Worcester, Mass. on the 24th ultimo. The semi-annual report, which was read, represents the affairs of the association in a flourishing condition; and, among other valuable donations which had been received, notices one quarto volume entitled the "Evangelii Gothica," containing the four Evangelists in the Gothic and Anglo-Saxon languages, printed at Dort, in Holland, in 1665. There was also contributed a cabinet desk, formerly the property of governor Belcher, who was governor of that state from 1730 to 1740, in perfect condition, and well adapted to use. The library of the association at present consists of about twelve thousand volumes. The officers of the society are the honorable T. L. Winthrop, L. L. D. president, and John Davis, United States senate, and Joseph Story, supreme court of the United States, vice presidents.

ORIGINAL ANECDOTE OF ETHAN ALLEN. An old gentleman of Vermont has told us an anecdote of Ethan Allen, the revolutionary hero, which we have never seen in print, but which is nevertheless historically true. About forty years since, Allen was sued for a note of about one hundred pounds. As it was not convenient for him to pay it, he employed Chittenden, the lawyer, to manage the case in court, and get it put over to the next term.—When the case came on, Chittenden accordingly appeared, and as the note was signed by a witness, who lived at a distance, he got up and denied the signature, knowing that the witness could not be produced during the session, and he should thus obtain the delay his client wished. The denial of the signature therefore was a mere finesse, and perfectly understood by the court; but Allen chanced to be in court at the time, and he viewed the matter in a more serious light. Rushing up to the bar of the court, and clenching his gigantic fists, he made the following address: Lawyer Chittenden! I did not employ you to come here and tell a barefaced lie! I did sign the note, and I won't deny it, may it please your honors!—that's my signature, and that's a good note. I honestly owe the money, and mean honestly to pay it. All I want is, that your honors should put it over to the next court; and by that time I shall have the cash from Boston, and will pay every farthing of it." The result was, that by consent of parties, the case was continued to the next term. Such were the notions of honesty entertained by a soldier of the olden times, that he could not bear even a fiction of law to deny the obligations of a paper to which his signature was attached. Let us compare this with the notions of a modern politician. [Dedham Patriot.]

SOMETHING NEW. The Weekly Chronicle, published at St. John's, Nova Scotia, has enlarged the knowledge of its readers by the following paragraph.

"Important news: If true. A report has been current in this city for several days past, that the long disputed boundary question is about to be speedily and definitively settled, it having been agreed between the British and American governments, that the whole matter in dispute should be left to the sole decision of Daniel O'Connell, esq. M. P. It is said that this illustrious individual will leave the port of Valentia, in Ireland, (in company with our delegates) early in the spring, and proceed in a government steamer to Halifax, and that we may expect the honor of his company during the greater part of the summer."

How much may the illustrious Daniel be expected to pay, for having this splendid rumor put in circulation! We think we see him mediating between the "bloody ruffians who own black slaves in America," and the "bloody ruffians who own white slaves in Ireland." And moreover we think we hear the mighty roar of scorn and indignation, that would burst forth on both sides of the Atlantic, were such a proposition seriously hazarded.

DUFANEL THE ENGINEER. A Paris paper received at New York, states that Dufavel, the engineer, of whose long incarceration in a well which caved in upon him, we published an account in the last "REGISTER," was relieved from his prison after some ten or eleven days of suffering. On the day after he was released, he was so far recovered as to bear the fatigue of conveyance to his own house. Great rejoicings took place on the occasion.

SPAIN AND MEXICO. We are informed, says the Louisiana Courier of the evening of the 22d ult. by the captain of the schooner Liberty, from Havana, whence she sailed on the 16th instant, that that port had been opened to Mexican vessels.—The debates which have taken place in the Mexican congress, relative to such a measure, leave not a doubt as to its correctness.

COL. LANE. It is stated that there seems reason to believe that the imputation of suicide to this young officer, was incorrect; and that his death was the result of some incomprehensible accident.—There can be but little doubt that his mind was to a considerable extent unhinged by pain and illness.

FROM BARBADOES. Advices from Barbadoes to the 27th of September state that the yellow fever is making dreadful ravages in that place. The New Times of the 6th of September states that "numbers, chiefly of the young and middle aged, have already been hurried to their graves, and others are at this moment suffering from it in different degrees of malignity."

WAR IN FLORIDA.

The National Intelligencer of the 5th instant, says—"The failure of gen. Call's late expedition against the Indians having been attributed to his disappointment in not finding a supply of provisions on the Wythlacoochee, it has been naturally supposed by many that this disappointment was imputable to some remissness in the subsistence department of the government, in not placing sufficient supplies of provisions within reach of the general commanding in Florida; and this opinion has been freely expressed through our own columns, as well as those of other journals. It is due, however, to the vigilant administration of that department to state, that we have authentic evidence of its innocence of any delinquency in the case referred to, or of its being chargeable with any of the blame which attaches to gen. Call's failure. On the contrary there were placed in depot, on the east side of Florida on the St. John's, and at other points, as early as the month of September, not less than 600,000 rations; and on the west side of the peninsula, at Tampa Bay, on the Suwannee, and other points, three hundred thousand rations.—This large stock of provisions, at various depots on both sides of the peninsula, was placed at the disposition of gen. Call; he was officially advised by the department of their deposite, and it was left to him to order supplies to be transported to any of the points at which his operations might require them, before he moved his army. If he failed to do so, and suffered the frustration of his expedition in consequence, the blame cannot justly attach to the subsistence department."

Our accounts from gen. Call, published last week, left him at Fort Drane, whither he had retired from the head waters of the Wythlacoochee in consequence of not having received the expected supply of provisions. We now learn that he has issued an order directing all the United States troops stationed at the different posts on the St. John's to proceed immediately to Fort Drane. The 700 friendly Indians expected at that post, had arrived by the way of Tampa. The hostiles are said to be concentrated on the Wythlacoochee.

From Tampa Bay. The Appalachicola Gazette of the 19th ult. contains the following: "The steamer Meridian arrived at this place from Tampa Bay on Monday last. There had been no fighting in that quarter, since our former dates. The deputation of friendly Indians which had been sent out to hold a talk with the hostiles, and induce them to come to terms without further fighting—or, in other words, with a proposition to the Seminole chief to buy them up—had returned to Tampa, without having been able to effect any thing. Harjo, the head of the deputation, reports that he found the chiefs of the Seminoles in a hammock within the Wythlacoochee swamp, which was surrounded on all sides by deep morasses, ponds, and an almost impenetrable underbrushwood, with as he calculated, about 3,500 of their people, men, women and children. On the proposal being made to Oseola to lay down his arms and retire to the westward—the reply was firmly and decisively—"Never—the land is ours, and we will die on it." They boasted of having beaten off other armies of the whites, and speak confidently of their ability to withstand the present preparations against them."

The U. S. steamer gen. Izard, in attempting to ascend the Wythlacoochee with supplies for the depot, got aground at the mouth of the river, with her bows on the bank on one side, and her stern on the other, and 8 feet water in the middle of the channel. In this awkward position they remained till the tide went out, when her centre timber gave way, and she broke down. Her stores being mostly wet, it is supposed will be saved. How she came to get into this awkward position, seems to be not well understood. It is said that she was made fast over night by bow and stern line; and in the morning it was found that her bow line had been loosened, and that she had floated round into the position above stated.

Midshipmen Wm. B. Beverly and Wm. L. Parkinson had arrived at Pensacola in the Frederick Arnet. The crew of the Izard, like those of the American and Dade, have returned enfeebled and worn down by disease. Out of a crew of twenty-eight who left Pensacola in the Izard, in June last, only four men have returned in health. The country, however, is now beginning to grow more healthy.

GENERAL ORDER.

Head quarters, Fort Drane, Oct. 26.

The commander-in-chief with deep regret announces to the army, of the death of col. John F. Lane of the Creek volunteers, which occurred yesterday.

In announcing this melancholy event, the commander-in-chief cannot refrain from the expression of those feelings of deep sensibility with which the whole army with him sympathize at the loss of a most valuable young officer, thus suddenly arrested in a most brilliant career of arms, for the successful and glorious termination of which he was so admirably qualified by his ardent zeal, his great talents, and his uncommon acquirement. The usual honors due to an officer of his rank will be paid to his remains by the army. The funeral ceremony will take place at 12 M. this day, under the direction and order of major W. W. Morris of the same corps, who will arrange and command the escort.

By order of the commanding general-in-chief of the army in Florida. (Signed)

BY HIS EXCELLENCY.

THOMAS W. VEAZEY, governor of Maryland.
A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, by the constitution of this state, and with the view, as well of perpetuating an essential branch of the legislative department of the government, as of providing for such changes in the members thereof periodically, as the people might desire to make, it was provided that the people of the several counties, and of the cities of Baltimore and Annapolis, duly qualified as electors, should, on the first Monday of September last, elect two persons for each of the said counties, and one person for each of the said cities, to be electors of the senate, who were required to meet in the city of Annapolis on the third Monday of said month: and they or any twenty-four of them, so met, were directed, after having qualified in the manner provided for, to proceed to elect fifteen senators, who, when so elected and duly qualified as such, were to constitute "the senate of Maryland," in the place of those who then constituted that branch of the general assembly.

AND WHEREAS, eighteen of the persons who were chosen as electors, in pursuance of the aforesaid provisions of the constitution, and in conformity to law, have failed to perform the duty enjoined upon them as aforesaid, by refusing, and continuing to refuse or neglect to meet the other electors who have attended, qualified and held themselves in readiness to perform their duty: in consequence whereof no new senate has yet been elected.

AND WHEREAS, the said unfaithful agents of the people, in addition to their violation of the duty as aforesaid, seem vainly to have imagined that the effect of their conduct would be the destruction and overthrow of the constitution and government of the state, which many, if not all of them, had heretofore sworn to support; and, accordingly presumptuously proceeded to recommend measures for substituting another constitution and government for that which they seem to have supposed they had destroyed, or, at least, mortally wounded.

AND WHEREAS, sundry evil disposed or misguided citizens have taken, and are continuing to pursue and prosecute measures in accordance with said recommendation, and designed to carry out and consummate the disorderly designs and purposes aforesaid.

AND WHEREAS, these unprecedented, unconstitutional, disorderly and revolutionary occurrences and proceedings, although wholly inefficient to accomplish any of the avowed objects of those engaged in them, are fraught with incalculable evils and mischiefs, and must, if persisted in, and sustained by any considerable portion of the people, greatly disturb the tranquillity and peace of the state—impair her credit and resources—arrest here great works of internal improvement—blight her lately brilliant prospects of increasing prosperity, and, finally, involve us in all the horrors and unspeakable calamities of anarchy, intestine commotion and CIVIL WAR, and therefore demand from the executive the adoption of such constitutional and legal measures as may seem to them best adapted to quiet the public mind, which has been thus wantonly disturbed; to defeat the unholy designs and purposes aforesaid, and maintain and support the constitution and authority of the government, by all the means and powers with which they are entrusted.

AND WHEREAS, we are well advised, and entirely satisfied, that the aforesaid unfaithful "trustees of the public," and their abettors, have as entirely mistaken their power of destroying the constitution and government of the state, as they have clearly violated a solemn duty—that the constitution and government yet exist in all their integrity and power—that the senate elected in September 1831, continue to be "the senate of Maryland," and will so continue until superseded by the election of successors, as constitutionally and lawfully provided for, and, with the house of delegates elected, in October last, now constitute "the general assembly" of this state.

NOW, THEREFORE, I THOMAS W. VEAZEY, governor of the state of Maryland, with the advice of the council, and in virtue of the authority vested in me by the constitution, deeming it proper and necessary, in the present crisis of our affairs, that the general assembly should be convened before the time fixed for the next annual session, to which its stands adjourned, do HEREBY APPOINT AND PROCLAIM MONDAY the 21st of November, instant, as the time of the next meeting of the general assembly, and call upon and require the several senators and delegates to attend at the seat of government, on that day, to take into consideration the present condition of our public affairs, and adopt such measures as to them may seem meet and expedient in relation thereto, and for the transaction of such other business as the welfare of the state may require.

And I do furthermore declare and proclaim, to all whom it doth or may concern, that, as chief magistrate of the state, I shall exert to the utmost, all the powers which have been, or may be vested in me by the constitution and laws, and which it may become necessary to employ, to curb the spirit of anarchy, disorder and revolution, manifested by the aforesaid conduct and proceedings, and to support the constitution and enforce the laws upon all offenders against their majesty, who shall proceed, by OVERT ACTS either of resistance to the constituted authorities of the state, or of carrying out and consummating the revolutionary designs and purposes of the aforesaid recusants and their abettors; and I do hereby require and enjoin all civil officers of the state, to be vigilant in the performance of their several and respective duties, at this important crisis and upon all military officers and citizens to hold themselves in readiness, in case their services may become necessary in aid of the civil authorities, to maintain the public peace, repress disorder, uphold the constitution, or enforce the laws; and, finally, with humble supplication for, and reliance upon Divine Providence for direction and aid, and also with the firmest reliance upon the people of the state, to support, and, if necessary, enforce the declaration, I do solemnly DECLARE and PROCLAIM that the constitution of the state MUST BE PRESERVED and the government maintained, as they now are, until "altered, changed or abolished," in the manner constitutionally provided for.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the state of Maryland, at the city of Annapolis, this eighth day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and of the independence of the United States the sixty-first.

THOS. W. VEAZEY.

By the governor,

THOS. CULBRETH, clerk of the council.

ORDERED, That one thousand copies of the foregoing proclamation be printed in handbill form, and that it be published, until the time fixed for the meeting of the general assembly, in all the newspapers printed in the state, whose proprietors and conductors are in favor of upholding the constitution and laws, and defeating the revolutionary designs and proceedings intended to accomplish their overthrow.

The "Baltimore Republican," the organ of the "reformers or revolutionists," thus notices governor Veazey's proclamation.

From the "Baltimore Republican" of Thursday last.

RIDING ON STILTS.

We lay before our readers this morning a proclamation issued by king Veazey, by the advice of their high mightinesses, the executive council, in which it is declared that the old senate can continue to hold their seats until others are elected in their places, and calling upon the members who composed it, and the persons recently elected to the house of delegates to meet on the 21st instant. It would have been as well for him to have referred to the article in the constitution on which he founds his declaration, and which gives to him and his council the authority to call together a legislature composed of such very different materials; for we can assure him that his royal word will not pass current on such subjects, without some other authority than his bare declaration, and will not in the present case.

It must be perfectly manifest to the most superficial observer, that king Veazey does not believe the truth of his own declaration; for if he did, there would have been no necessity for a meeting of the legislature at a period earlier than that which is prescribed for the commencement of their annual session, which is the last Monday in December.—If it were true that the members of the senate when once elected and qualified, could continue to act as such until successors were elected, they would, as a matter of course, meet at the time fixed for the regular assembling of the general assembly. But there is no provision in the constitution which authorises their meeting after the time prescribed by the constitution for the election of the senate, and they know it, and king Veazey knows it. He has therefore officially declared that to be a fact, which he knows to be false; and his having called what he chooses to denominate the legislature together on a day earlier than that which is prescribed for the commencement of the session, proves that he was well aware there was no authority to warrant the declaration he has made, or the act he has performed.

If the members of the old senate can constitutionally retain their seats until others be elected to supply their places, there could have been no possible necessity for an earlier meeting of the legislature than usual, and our proclaimer has not pretended to assign for it any other reason than, that there are persons in the state who believe that in case no senate be elected, the government is so far dissolved, as to render it necessary to call a convention to amend the old constitution, or to form a new one. If the persons referred to are correct in their views, there is no authority by which the members of the old senate can be called upon to act, nor is there any authority for them to act as senators, after the time fixed for the election of others in their places, but on the contrary, if the declaration contained in the proclamation were true, there could be no necessity or propriety in the call of an earlier meeting. But the call has now been made, and for what purpose? On this subject we are not informed. Is it for the purpose of imitating the example set by the last legislature, when they passed the indemnity act, by passing a bundle of ex-post facto laws, under which all those who doubt the infallibility of the present rulers of the state, or the justice and propriety of the provisions contained in the present constitution, are to be strung up by the neck for political heresy? If so, we should like to be informed of the fact, in order that we may be prepared for the fate that awaits us. If it is not for some such purpose, we candidly confess we can conceive of no object that can be designed for the movement, except to let us know that a certain would-be great man can issue a proclamation as well as grant nolle proseques.

Well, it seems, then, that we are to have an extraordinary session of the legislature, composed of persons who constituted the senate, whose term of service expired in September last, and persons elected to the house of delegates in October last.—Or, perhaps it is intended that the old delegates shall also meet, for the proclamation does not inform us who are the persons, who, under the proclamation, are called upon to meet, whether they are the old members or the new ones. Altogether, it is what the lawyers would call a complete hodge-podge. We suspect, however, that when assembled, there will be a number of vacant seats, unless they are filled by what are termed lobby members, of whom there is never any lack, where there is mischief to be done, and the people's rights can be trampled upon. In the present case, they would have just as much right to take their seats upon the floor, and proceed to pass laws to answer their own purposes, as the members of the old senate would have to do; and their acts would be as binding and as much respected or obeyed. This hodge-podge legislature will not be recognized, and they might as well be now informed of the fact, as be left to learn it after they have attempted to exercise their unconstitutional and unwarrantable authority.

It is quite amusing to see how admirably the proclamation has imitated the language of the alarmists who have been prating about the matter for the last month. We are told that anarchy, civil war, strife, contention, the loss of state credit, and all the evils of Pandora's box are to be the result of an omission to elect a senate, if the people, in consequence of it are permitted to proceed to the work of electing delegates to a convention to form a new one, and the civil and military authorities and the people are called upon to resist any such attempt, and to sustain the present rotten constitution, and the rotten-hearted cormorants who are feeding at the public crib under its provision. King Veazey can, no doubt, like Owen Glendower, call spirits from the vasty deep, but the question is as applicable to the one as the other, will they come when called. Those who live by their offices will, most probably, be very willing to obey the call, even if it should amount to cutting the throats of those who would aid in displacing them by the formation of a new constitution; but we strongly suspect there are but few others who will pay any more regard to the proclamation than the author of it has to the constitution and laws of the state.

The proclaimer would not have dared, before the late election, to insult the people by issuing such an incendiary production; but, as his party has succeeded in that election, he now displays the rancor of his heart, and has become a very giant.—

But he may yet find that there are bounds to his authority, and bounds to his power, and that when he attempts to o'erstep those bounds he will step on dangerous ground. We live under a government of laws, to which those in authority are as much bound to adhere as those who are ruled.—We own no despot's sway, and the man who attempts to exercise a power that is not given to him by the constitution and laws, and for which he cannot point to his authority in that constitution and those laws, will find that there is a power above him which will bring him to an account for his actions.

There is in no class of our community any disposition to create any disorder, confusion, strife or anarchy; but there are those who desire a reform in the constitution, and will have it; and if the author of the proclamation expects to defeat their purpose he has deceived himself. He may be blinded by the late triumph of his party; but we would advise him, while he thinks he is prosperous, to act with discretion, or adversity may come upon him when he little expects it.

A writer in the "Republican" of Thursday last, proposes the following mode of allaying the excitement.

COMMUNICATED.

Messrs. EDITORS: To allay, if possible, the excitement which the highly inflammatory proclamation of the governor has produced, I would offer the following suggestions.

Let those gentlemen who were the most prominent friends of reform in every county, meet in this city immediately, or, as soon as practicable. Let them write a manifesto or protest against the words of the proclamation, pointing out that the governor, instead of being dispenser of conciliation and peace, is the very first that would bring CIVIL WAR. Let them point out one by one the falsity of his accusations; let them appeal to the people of the United States and to the general government for the sacred truth and proof of a peaceable reform by the fact, that their first act, was to confirm the present governor and other officers in their present authority, until the new constitution should be approved by the people. Let them point out as a further confirmation of their peaceable intentions, and avoid every idea of intentional collision; that the convention shall meet in Baltimore instead of Annapolis, and then and there, whether every county is represented or not, let them proceed to write a REPUBLICAN CONSTITUTION which shall go abroad to the people. At the next election let them vote for the old or the new, as they best like, and take my word for the result.

As soon as the manifesto is written, let reform meetings be called in Monument square, where it shall be read and other resolves entered into. D.

8. The officers promoted will report accordingly, and join their proper stations and companies without delay; those on detached service, or acting under special orders and instructions, will report by letter to their respective colonels.

"IV. Rule to be observed in ordinary cases of promotion."

4. "If a field officer, the officer promoted will join the regiment and station of his predecessor; if a company officer, he will join the particular company where the vacancy to which he succeeds may have occurred."

5. The practice of commanding officers assuming authority to grant leaves of absence to officers on tendering their resignations, is disapproved, it being contrary to the rules of service. Hereafter, letters of resignation will be forwarded by the commanding officer to the adjutant general of the army, Washington, to be laid before the war department; and the officer who may so tender his resignation, will not be permitted to quit his post until the decision of the president be duly communicated.

GENERAL ORDER, NO. 76.

Head quarters of the army, adj. gen's office, Washington, Nov. 7, 1836.

1. The secretary of war having assigned the duty connected with Indian emigration, heretofore under the direction of the commissary general of subsistence, to the commissioner of Indian affairs, the officers of the army who have been detailed for performing the above-mentioned duty under the subsistence department, will continue to execute it under the direction of the commissioner of Indian affairs.

2. Commanding officers in the field will report to the head quarters of the army the time, that the several officers relieved from detached service and ordered to join their regiments, pursuant to "general order" No. 69, of October 15, may report in person for duty with the troops.

By order of Alexander Macomb, major general commanding-in-chief: R. JONES, adj. gen.

THE SURPLUS REVENUE.

It is stated in the Washington Globe of Tuesday that a notice similar to that referred to in the annexed paragraph, has been sent to the deposit banks in every state in the union, giving to each which will be called on next January, seasonable notice of the probable amount it will then, and quarterly during 1837, be required to pay over either to the state in which it is situated, or to some other state near, where a sufficient share of the public money is not deposited.

Division of deposits among the states. The secretary of the treasury has notified the bank of Virginia, that he shall draw on that bank, a few days after the 1st of January, in favor of the treasurer of Virginia, for about $350,000 which will, of course, be previously deposited in the bank. This ratio will give to the state about $2,600,000 by the 1st of October next, and make the whole distributable sum about or upwards of 36 millions, including Michigan.

Treasury department, November 1st, 1836.

SIR: It is deemed proper and useful thus early to apprise the bank over which you preside, that in a few days after the 1st of January next, [provided the state of shall then have passed a law, accepting the deposit, and if not, as soon afterwards as a law shall be passed] a transfer draft will probably be drawn on it by this department, for about the sum of $

It will be made payable forthwith to the authorized agent of said state—the money to be kept in deposit on behalf of the United States. This transfer will be followed on the 1st of April, July and October next, by other drafts of similar amount, and payable to the same agent, unless in the meantime a different notice is given by this department.

When the transfer drafts are forwarded to you the precise amount will be ascertained and specified therein—and the form enclosed of such duplicate receipts as are to be taken by you of the agent, and one of them returned here as a voucher of your payment.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.

REAL ESTATE IN NEW YORK.

From the N. Y. Daily Advertiser.

We are indebted to our worthy fellow citizen John Simonson for full and detailed statements from the assessor's books, from which we make the following statements:
Return of the board of assessors of the value of the real and personal estate of the city of New York for 1836.

Several wards were assessed too low by the ward assessors. The board consequently raised them to a standard with other portions of the city, and which is added above. 15 per cent. to be added to the real estate of the 4th ward; 5th ward, the owners of the fee in St. John's park, who have the exclusive benefit for private use, it now being open to the public, 10 per cent.; 6th ward, 8 per cent. on real estate; 8th ward, 4 per cent. on real estate; 9th ward, 8 per cent.; 12th ward, 140 per cent. as follows: from 40th to 62d street, inclusive, 175 per cent.; from 62d to 132d st. 132 per cent. and on the remainder of the ward 95 per cent.; 13th ward, 7 per cent.; 14th ward, 18 per cent.; 15th ward, 7 per cent.; 16th ward, 4 per cent. The board of assessors, previous to their commencing their assessments, by a unanimous vote agreed to assess all the real estate up to actual sales, and all the property similarly situated at the same rate—when it was found on the examination of the book of any ward that it was not so assessed as above, the per centage was added. Some of the wards that had been raised, the assessors of the same placed it where, in their best judgments, they thought would bear it.

We commend the course taken by the assessors. In all former years there has been a course taken manifestly unjust. The present mode of equalizing all portions of the city is just and proper. We give below a table of the value of both real and personal estate since 1805. The reader will be amazed at the rapid increase of wealth in this city. Assessed value of real and personal estate in the city of New York for the years 1832 and 1833.

LEGEND OF BRADY'S HILL.

From Silliman's Journal for October 1836.

Samuel Brady, the hero of the following adventure, was over six feet in height, with light blue eyes, fair skin and dark hair: he was remarkably straight, an athletic, bold and vigorous backwoodsman, inured to all the toils and hardships of a frontier life, and had become very obnoxious to the Indians, from the numerous successful attacks on their war parties, and from shooting them in his hunting excursions, whenever they crossed his path, or came within reach of his rifle; for he was personally engaged in more hazardous contests with the savages, than any other man west of the mountains, excepting Daniel Boone. He was in fact an "Indian hater," as many of the early borderers were. This class of men appear to have been more numerous in this region, than in any other portion of the frontiers; and this doubtless arose from the slaughter at Braddock's defeat, and the numerous murders and attacks on defenceless families that for many years followed that disaster. Brady was also a very successful trapper and hunter, and took more beavers than any of the Indians themselves. In one of his adventurous trapping excursions, to the waters of Beaver river, or Mahoning which in early days so abounded with the animals of this species, that it took its name from this fact, it so happened that the Indians surprised him in his camp and took him prisoner. To have shot or tomahawked him on the spot, would have been but a small gratification to that of satiating their revenge by burning him at a slow fire, in presence of all the Indians of their village. He was therefore taken alive to their encampment, on the west bank of the Beaver river, about a mile and a half from its mouth. After the usual exultations and rejoicings at the capture of a noted enemy, and causing him to run the gauntlet, a fire was prepared, near which Brady was placed, after being stripped naked, and with his arms unbound. Previously to tying him to the stake, a large circle was formed around him, consisting of Indian men, women and children, dancing and yelling, and uttering all manner of threats and abuse that their small knowledge of the English language could afford. The prisoner looked on these preparations for death, and on his savage foes, with a firm countenance and a steady eye, meeting all their threats with a truly savage fortitude. In the midst of their dancing and rejoicing, a squaw of one of their chiefs came near him with a child in her arms. Quick as thought, and with intuitive prescience, he snatched it from her and threw it into the midst of the flames. Horror struck at the sudden outrage, the Indians simultaneously rushed to rescue the infant from the fire. In the midst of this confusion, Brady darted from the circle, overturning all that came in his way, and rushed into the adjacent thickets, with the Indians at his heels. He ascended the steep side of the present hill, amidst a shower of bullets, and darting down the opposite declivity, secreted himself in the deep ravines and laurel thickets that abound for several miles to the west of it. His knowledge of the country and wonderful activity, enabled him to elude his enemies, and reach the settlements on the south of the Ohio river, which he crossed by swimming. The hill, near whose base this adventure is said to have happened, still goes by his name; and the incident is often referred to by the traveller, as the coach is slowly dragged up its side.

Brady's leap. Capt. Brady seems to have been as much the Daniel Boone of the north east part of the valley of the Ohio, as the other was of the south west, and the country is equally full of traditional legends of his hardy adventures and hair-breadth escapes, although he has lacked a Flint to chronicle his fame, and transmit it to posterity in the glowing and beautiful language of that distinguished annalist of the west. From undoubted authority, it seems the following incident actually transpired in this vicinity. Brady's residence was on Chartier's creek, on the south side of the Ohio, as before noted in this diary; and being a man of herculean strength, activity and courage, he was generally selected as the leader of the hardy borderers in all their incursions into Indian territory north of the river. On this occasion, which was about the year 1780, a large party of warriors from the falls of the Cuyahoga and the adjacent country, had made an inroad on the south side of the Ohio river, in the lower part of what is now Washington county, but which was then known as the settlement of "Catfish Camp," after an old Indian of that name, who lived there when the whites first came into the country on the Monongahela river. This party had murdered several families, and with the "plunder" had recrossed the Ohio before effectual pursuit could be made. By Brady a party was directly summoned, of his chosen followers, who hastened on after them, but the Indians having one-or two days the start, he could not overtake them in time to arrest their return to their villages. Near the spot where the town of Ravenna now stands, the Indians separated into two parties, one of which went to the north, and the other west, to the falls of the Cuyahoga. Brady's men also divided; a part pursued the northern trail, and a part with their commander to the Indian village, lying on the river in the present township of Northampton, in Portage county.

Although Brady made his approaches with the utmost caution, the Indians, expecting a pursuit, were on the lookout, and ready to receive him, with numbers fourfold to those of Brady's party, whose only safety was in a hasty retreat, which, from the ardor of the pursuit, soon became a perfect flight.—Brady directed his men to separate and each one to take care of himself; but the Indians knowing Brady, and having a most inveterate hatred and dread of him, from the numerous chastisements which he had inflicted upon them, left all the others, and with united strength pursued him alone. The Cuyahoga here makes a wide bend to the south, including a large tract of several miles of surface, in the form of a peninsula: within this tract the pursuit was hotly contested. The Indians, by extending their line to the right and left, forced him on to the bank of the stream. Having, in peaceable times, often hunted over this ground with the Indians, and knowing every turn of the Cuyahoga as familiarly as the villager knows the streets of his own hamlet, Brady directed his course to the river, at a spot where the whole stream is compressed, by the rocky cliffs, into a narrow channel of only twenty-two feet across the top of the chasm, although it is considerably wider beneath, near the water, and in height more than twice the number of feet above the current. Through this pass the water rushes like a race horse, chafing and roaring at the confinement of its current by the rocky channel, while, a short distance above, the stream is at least fifty yards wide. As he approached the chasm, Brady, knowing that life or death was in the effort, concentrated his mighty powers, and leaped the stream at a single bound. It so happened that, in the opposite cliff, the leap was favored by a low place, into which he dropped, and grasping the bushes, he thus helped himself to ascend to the top of the cliff.—The Indians, for a few moments, were lost in wonder and admiration, and before they had recovered their recollection, he was half way up the side of the opposite hill, but still within reach of their rifles. They could easily have shot him at any moment before, but being bent on taking him alive, for torture, and to glut their long delayed revenge, they forbore the use of the rifle; but now seeing him likely to escape, they all fired upon him: one bullet wounded him severely in the hip, but not so badly as to prevent his progress. The Indians having to make a considerable circuit before they could cross the stream, Brady advanced a good distance ahead. His limb was growing stiff from the wound, and as the Indians gained on him, he made for the pond which bears his name, and plunging in, swam under water a considerable distance, and came up under the trunk of a large oak, which had fallen into the pond. This, although leaving only a small breathing place to support life, still completely sheltered him from their sight. The Indians, tracing him by the blood to the water, made diligent search all round the pond, but finding no signs of his exit, finally came to the conclusion that he had sunk and was drowned. As they were at one time standing on the very tree beneath which he was concealed, Brady understanding their language, was very glad to hear the result of their deliberations, and after they had gone, weary, lame and hungry, he made good his retreat to his own home. His followers also all returned in safety. The chasm across which he leaped is in sight of the bridge where we crossed the Cuyahoga, and is known in all that region by the name of "BRADY'S LEAP."

TRADE OF THE CANALS—THE GRAIN CROP.

From the Albany Argus.

In consequence of the alleged failure of the crops in the western part of the state, we have been induced to take some pains to ascertain what effect it has had upon the business of the Erie canal, as compared with the last year, and how far the diminution of the great staple article of wheat, since the new crop began to come in, has probably tended to the diminution of the canal tolls for the same time.

The information we have obtained is from an official source, and shows the quantity of flour, wheat and barley delivered from the canal at Albany, West Troy and Waterford, on the Hudson river, and at Schenectada, the termination of the Mohawk and Hudson rail road. The quantities of each article so delivered, up to the 1st of September, in the present and the last year, are as follows, viz:

	Bush. barley.	Bbls. flour.	Bush. wheat.
1835	83,576	484,073	266,252
Increase,	9,139	73,447	214,711

Thus exhibiting an increase this year to the date given, in the barley, of more than 9,000 bushels; in the flour, of more than 73,000 barrels; and in the wheat, of more than 214,000 bushels.

Assuming the 1st of September as the period when the new crop began to seek market, a comparative statement similar to the above, from the 1st of September to the 21st of October, in each year, and showing the weekly quantities of each article, with the increase or diminution of each, is as follows, viz:

Comparative statement of the quantities of wheat, flour and barley, delivered from the Erie canal, at Albany, West Troy, Waterford and Schenectada—

Thus showing a falling off, since the first of September, in barley, of 212,825 bushels; in flour of 62,078 barrels; and in wheat, of 26,947 bushels.—A statement, showing the total amount up to the 21st October, in each year, and embracing both the above statements, is as follows:

	Bush. barley.	Bshs. flour.	Bush. wheat.
1835	818,064	771,016	524,560
1836	115,378	782,385	730,324

Decrease, 202,686
Increase, 11,369 187,764

Showing an increase in the flour of 11,000 barrels; in the wheat 187,000 bushels; and a decrease in the barley of 202,000 bushels.

It is possible that the period assumed for the coming in of this year's crop is not early enough; that the high price of flour may have led to its earlier preparation for market, and that that cause may account for some of the increase in the flour and wheat on the 1st of September, and for the subsequent falling off.

However this may be, it is evident that the continued failing in October, notwithstanding the present high prices, augurs unfavorably for the fall and spring business in these great staples.

MR. BAYLIE PEYTON'S LETTER.

Gainesboro' (Tenn.) Sept. 10, 1836.

SIR: On the first Monday of this month a large number of your constituents of this county assembled at the court house to evince their approbation of your political course, particularly during the last session of congress, and deputed the undersigned to invite you to a public dinner in this place on Saturday, the 17th instant. In performing this agreeable duty, the undersigned take occasion to express to you the high estimation in which they, in common with their fellow citizens of this county, hold both your public and private character. Yours, respectfully,

RICHARD F. COOK,
SAMPSON W. CASSETY,
JAMES T. QUARLES,
MERLIN YOUNG,
DAVID G. SHEPHERD,
MICAJAH L. ARMSTRONG,
JOHN SCANLAND,

committee.

Hon. Baylie Peyton.

MR. PEYTON'S REPLY.

Station Camp, near Gallatin, Sept. 18, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I had the honor to receive, through your politeness, on yesterday, the proceedings of a public meeting of a portion of my fellow citizens of Jackson county, assembled at Gainesborough on the 5th of this instant, inviting me, at such time as might suit my convenience, to partake of a public dinner, at or near that place, "as an evidence of their approbation of my course since I have been their representative in congress, and particularly during the last session." This voice from Jackson is to me cheering and animating in no ordinary degree. Amidst the shifting currents of the day, to be greeted on my return by my friends in Jackson county, with this warm and generous welcome and "well done," excites emotions in the heart, and gives a vigor to the nerves, which the wretch who sells himself for place can never feel. To be told by honest men and "free," that "you have been true to your country, true to the republican professions which you have heretofore made, true to the trust with which you have been honored," is calculated to inspire a lofty pride, and affords an incentive to patriotic actions, nowhere to be met with but in the spontaneous applause of freemen. How could I, how dare I, betray my sacred trust, when backed by such high-souled and generous constituents? What has a public servant to FEAR from POWER, or HOPE from OFFICE, when he lives in the bosoms of such constituents, and is sustained by the dauntless spirits of such men? Thank God, that there still breathes in its unadulterated purity that spirit and love of liberty, that American spirit, which inspired a Henry, and burnt in the breasts of our fathers; which won our liberties, and has sustained our arms and our honor upon every field and upon every sea. The crisis, gentlemen, calls aloud for it; the times demand it; the ballot box is assailed; the citadel of your liberty is in danger. The question is, where lies the SOVEREIGN POWER?—This is the issue. Is the SOVEREIGN POWER in the PEOPLE of this country, or is it in the high offices of the government? This is the true issue. Let no man disguise the fact that the president of the United States, at the head of one hundred thousand officers of the federal government, is boldly in the field, and openly electioneering for Mr. Van Buren; that all the power and patronage of the government are brought into "conflict with the freedom of elections;" that in this trying summer of '36, which will appear in history so unlike our glorious summer of '76, the president in person, every thing else having failed, has assumed the command, and, at the head of his official regulars, may be seen carrying the war into the very heart of the states, and throwing himself between the people and the ballot box. As for Tennessee, she has been considered in a state of open rebellion. Letter after letter had been written: proclamation after proclamation had been sent on without effect. What was to be done?—That was no secret at Washington; the president himself was not, like some of the Florida commanders, to go into summer quarters, but to make a summer campaign, and reduce her to subjection.—Yes, the lines were to be clearly drawn; the people of Tennessee were to be plainly told, you CANNOT and SHALL NOT be my friends unless you support Mr. Van Buren.

Gentlemen, I would again and again call on you and my fellow citizens generally, to look this issue, so cruelly forced upon us, full in the face. Was any man born to think for this state or for this nation? If so, what star pointed out the place of his nativity? What voice of inspiration announced his coming? In what clause of the constitution did our patriot sires write his unlimited letter of authority? Are you the SOVEREIGNS of this land?—Are you such freemen as your fathers were? Are ALL officers of government, from the president of the United States down to the corporal in your captain's company, YOUR AGENTS, YOUR PUBLIC SERVANTS? Or is the sovereign power of this country transferred to the president, directors and company at Washington city? This is the true question. Are you bound to THINK as THEY THINK—to VOTE as THEY DIRECT? This is the issue. How has it been brought about? By the subtlety of the SPOILS men—by the artifices of the SPOILS party. They have crawled around the dying couch, as it were, of this venerable and confiding old warrior, and, taking advantage of his age, his open, unsuspecting nature, and those infirmities "which flesh is heir to," they have beguiled him from his friends, from his sacred principles, and from himself. They have even urged him to the public defence of their collaborer and copartner in the piracy which is going on upon the treasury—Reuben M. Whitney. Where was Reuben M. Whitney when the chivalry of Tennessee was charging, on the night of the 22d, into the British camp? Where was he on the ever-glorious 8th of January, when the best blood of Tennessee was shed in purchasing those laurels for Andrew Jackson which will grow green in history forever!—Reuben M. Whitney was then a traitor in the British camp. He himself acknowledges that he took an oath, yes, that he called heaven to bear witness—upon that God who guarded the sword of Washington, and conducted our fathers through seas of blood to liberty—to bear witness, that he, Reuben M. Whitney, was a traitor to his own country, and would be true to the king of England!!! Is it not too much that while the president is induced to make this public defence in an address at Jonesborough, East Tennessee, in behalf of Reuben M. Whitney, he should be excited to denounce one of the purest men and most incorruptible patriots of this land as a "red hot federalist," and the people of Tennessee who support him, as "new born whigs?"

Gentlemen, I will give you an instance of the impudent and reckless spirit which distinguishes the swarm of hungry expectants who surround the president, as well as the unbounded confidence he reposes in them. I say these plunderers of the treasury, and pirates upon the hard-earned fame of Andrew Jackson, feel that their days are few; they know their power, and are resolved to use it. They scruple not "to sell and mart" the offices of the government, in his name, "to undeservers," for partizan services. They can make any impression upon his feelings, and excite him to the denunciation of any man without the slightest cause. Their word is taken against the record, against the journals of congress, against the archives of the government. But, as Mr. O'Connell says, "one fact is worth a ship load of arguments." I will give you the fact. It is my own case. They have set the president on me, and caused him to denounce me from Washington to the Hermitage, for opposing, as he said, the bill making an appropriation to carry into effect the Cherokee treaty, when, in fact, I supported the measure with zeal and whatever of ability I possessed. I not only voted, but spoke in its behalf. One of my colleagues, who knew the course that I had pursued, on hearing the president, before he left Washington, bring this charge against me, suggested to him that he had been led into error on the subject. But it was of no avail.—There was the journal of the house, there was the Globe newspaper upon his table, which represented me correctly, not only as voting for the bill, but as following Mr. Wise, in a speech of considerable length, in its support.

What safety is there for a public servant, what encouragement has he to support an administration, when the word of Amos Kendall, Reuben M. Whitney, or Francis P. Blair, will stand against the journals of congress, and when the denunciations of the president, like a seventy-four pounder, can be brought to bear with point blank shot upon those who support the measures of his administration? His safety is where it should be found—in the virtue, intelligence and independence of his constituents. It is to be found in such warm hearts and strong arms as now, and I trust will ever, defend the liberties of this country.

But, gentlemen, these parasites have not only harrowed the feelings of the president, and poisoned his affections against all who cannot, who will not support Mr. Van Buren; but they have in his name began the work of recanting, nay, "expunging," his most valuable doctrines—doctrines upon which he went into office, and upon which the broad foundation of his fame as a statesman must rest. In his celebrated letter to Mr. Monroe, written in the prime, freshness and vigor of his mind, the president embodies, with a master's hand, the great cardinal doctrines of republicanism, and the equal rights of man. These immortal principles he has been induced to revoke, for they struck at the life, and soul, and very existence of "the party." In that letter he laid bare, as with the bold strokes of his own broad sword, the monstrous idea—the barbarian doctrine, that "to the victors belong the spoils." He called upon Mr. Monroe (then president elect) "to exterminate the monster party"—saying that names were nothing—that he himself had been once called a federalist for supporting Mr. Monroe. (Just as you, gentlemen, are now called "federalists, nullifiers and new-born whigs," by the president, for supporting Judge White.) His doctrine then was, that in appointments to office the only inquiry should be, "is he honest, is he capable, is he faithful to the constitution?" These, gentlemen, were the lofty sentiments of Andrew Jackson in the prime of his manhood and prime of his intellect. But at the age of threescore years and ten, when broken by the storms of state, when sinking under the weight of years, and the ravages of disease, they tell you in effect, and publish it too in his name, that he was then wrong, and that he now thinks that in appointments to office the "monster party" should be the sole test of merit: virtually they issue his proclamation that the only inquiry shall hereafter be, "Is he faithful to Mr. Van Buren? Is he obedient to the decrees of the Baltimore convention?" And these parasites call themselves the friends of Andrew Jackson!!

Gentlemen, in this struggle between liberty and power, between patronage on the one hand, and freedom of elections on the other, I have made up my mind. I have taken my stand. I have, with a full estimate of its perils, thrown myself in the way of this angry current of federal power and federal corruption, which, if not met and manfully resisted, will sweep away every thing in the institutions of our country worthy of the admiration of a freeman. In this war of power and corruption against public virtue and public liberty, I will be found in the ranks of the people; if they are trodden down, I will go with them. I would not, if I could, survive their fate. If it shall please Providence to make that awful visitation in my day, the grave of their liberties shall be the sepulchre of my political career. When that dark hour shall come, I want no more glorious epitaph than that "he fell covered with wounds amongst his own constituents, in defence of the liberties of his country."

Gentlemen, I accept with pride and pleasure the invitation to a public dinner which you have been commissioned to bear, and I am constrained to name for the occasion Saturday, the 17th instant, as the only day, owing to previous engagements, which I have at my control.

I beg you, gentlemen, to accept for yourselves and my fellow citizens of Jackson county, generally, the gratitude of a heart warmed and deeply alive to the kindness which you have shown me.

I am, gentlemen, with respect and esteem, your fellow citizen,
BALIE PEYTON.

EULOGIUM UPON THE LIFE AND CHARACTER OF JAMES MADISON.

BY JAMES BARBOUR, OF ORANGE COUNTY, VA.*

AMERICANS! Our MADISON—the beloved—the venerated—is dead. We have convened to mingle our condolence on this sad event, and to offer to

*The following correspondence will discover to our readers in what manner this beautiful discourse came into our hands:

Orange court house, Aug. 27, 1836.

Messrs. Gales & Seaton:

GENTLEMEN: You will see by the copy of a correspondence between governor Barbour and the undersigned, who were appointed a committee to solicit a copy of his eulogium upon our late distinguished fellow citizen and countryman, James Madison, for publication, that he has kindly furnished us a copy for that purpose.

Believing, as we do, that your paper, from its wide and extended circulation, would be best suited for our purpose, we respectfully ask you to give it an insertion. In doing this, we are induced to look to the National Intelligencer as best adapted to its extended circulation and reading, not only on account of the reasons above stated, but on account of its high standing as a public journal. Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

RICHARD M. CHAPMAN,
JEREMIAH MORTON,
LEWIS B. WILLIAMS.

Orange court house, Aug. 20, 1836.

The hon. James Barbour:

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the citizens of Orange, held this day, in which colonel Johnson presided, we were appointed a committee to ask of you for publication a copy of your eloquent and beautiful eulogium upon the life and character of our late distinguished and venerable fellow citizen, James Madison.

In performing this duty, we are directed by the meeting to express to you their profound regret because of your absence on the occasion, and to assure you of their heartfelt sympathy in its cause.

We hope that you will yield to us the pleasure of having your eulogium published, and placing it thereby before your countrymen generally, that they may with us enjoy the rich treasure which it contains, and in future times refer to it as strikingly illustrating the character of one of the purest, wisest, and best men who ever lived in any age or country.

With assurances of our high esteem and regard, we are, dear sir, your friends and fellow citizens,

RICHARD M. CHAPMAN,
JEREMIAH MORTON,
LEWIS B. WILLIAMS.

Barbourville, Aug. 25, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: Your favor of the 20th has been received, communicating the wishes of the citizens of Orange that I would furnish for publication a copy of my eulogy on James Madison. I comply cheerfully with their request. The very flattering his memory the tribute of our profoundest gratitude; so eminently due to his great services and to his illustrious character. The partiality of esteemed friends most unexpectedly assigned to me, on this occasion, the honorable part of being the organ of your feelings, not on account of my peculiar fitness for the service, but because I had known him from my infancy, and had through life been honored, uninterruptedly, with his friendship. In accepting this call, I yielded rather to the impulse of my feelings than listened to the warnings of my judgment. I felt that the task was one of time and extent, and beyond my ability. I should have sunk under the weight, but for a hope, I fear a vain one, that, with pretensions humble even as mine, I might be borne along successfully by the sublimity of my theme, and that, though I failed, I should still find a refuge in the indulgent candor of my audience. I will only add, that if, in the opinion of any one of this assembly, in the remarks I am about to make I shall say too much, he may be induced to forbear his censure when I tell him it will be caused by the profound veneration for the deceased, instilled into my infant bosom by my parents, and which increased in maturer age from my own observations and reflection. If, on the other hand, I shall be charged by any one with having said too little, I beg him to remember that the field I am about to enter has already been harvested by many laborers, and that I am but a gleaner.

In thus meeting together to offer our homage to the exceeding worth of our departed friend, while we do justice to our own feelings, and to the memory of the dead, we follow the custom which prevailed when the father of his country died—a custom that obtained in the best times of ancient manners: for the free states of old were accustomed thus to commemorate the funeral of their patriots and sages. It is a good custom, that should be cherished by freemen. It is the award of posterity, sitting in judgment on the actions and the life of a distinguished citizen who has finished his course. While honorable to the dead, it is an incentive to the living. Who is he, solicitous for posthumous fame, that darling object of ingenious minds, that will not be impelled onward in his virtuous course by the honors every where offered to the memory of Madison? It is a terror likewise to the wicked. What great criminal is so hardened in his iniquity, that will not tremble, when, in anticipation, he sees posterity passing on his crimes; and, instead of honor, reproach awaiting his memory?

Besides, the life of a good and great man, when fairly delineated and committed to history, will survive when the pyramids of Egypt shall have passed away: it will stand forever a lofty beacon, amid the vicissitudes and the wastes of time. Athens and Rome, the master states of antiquity, where liberty once delighted to dwell, for two thousand years have been doomed to ignorance, to superstition, and to worse than Egyptian bondage; yet the lives of their great worthies, shining with an undiminished lustre after this long and fearful eclipse, warmed the bosom of modern patriots, by whose efforts has been regained the jewel of inestimable value, so long lost to the world.

And if, in fulfillment of that stern decree which denounces decay and death on all human things—a decree before which Babylon and Jerusalem, Athens and Rome, and all that was illustrious in antiquity, have crumbled into dust—if it be irreversible to all, and America be doomed to travel through ages of bondage, let us indulge the consolatory hope that the life of Madison, triumphing over the injuries of time, may become a pillar of light by which some future patriot may reconduct his countrymen to their lost inheritance.

The manifestations now being made, of love and veneration to the illustrious deceased, have the whole republic for their theatre: its every inhabitant an actor. It is not only the capitol of the republic that is shrouded in mourning, but millions of terms in which you speak of my humble production, which your friendship has over-estimated, lay me under heavy obligations. I am grateful to my fellow citizens for the expression of their sympathies in the visitation which rendered me unable to meet the occasion, the last on which I ever expected to address, publicly, any portion of my countrymen. Suffer me to add, that by indisposition I lost a good share of the time allowed for the performance of the service assigned me, which will, in some degree, account for the imperfect manner of its execution.

I beg you to accept, personally, assurances of my friendly regard, and to make my thanks acceptable to your constituents. Your friend and fellow citizen, freemen unanimously coming forth to do honor to the memory of him, so conspicuous for the purity of his private life, and for his eminent services in the cause of liberty. Yes, coming forth unanimously! What greater eulogium can be pronounced on Madison than that, at the mention of his name, the fell demon of party, that imp from hell, stood rebuked, and consented, while his funeral procession passed, to cease from troubling? His life, his death, the tribute paid his virtues, is a sublime moral spectacle, on which the inhabitants of the heavenly mansions may look with complacency.
JAMES BARBOUR.

Messrs. Richard M. Chapman, Jeremiah Morton and Lewis B. Williams.

That we should unite in this national funeral was most natural. Feeling, in common with all America, the profoundest regard for his public character, there was a peculiar fitness that we, his friends and neighbors, should assemble together to bear testimony to his private virtues, equal to, if not beyond, his public worth.

We are here not to flatter; truth only is worthy freemen. Happily we have no temptation to depart from it; for the truth itself is as high an eulogium as fancy, unaided by the original, could have sketched.

In the solemn temple in which we have convened, and before the God to whose service it is dedicated, we proclaim that his private character was without stain, as his life was without reproach; that, while it was adorned with every active virtue, it was equally exempt from every negative defect.—We know indeed that he was man, and we are not so presumptuous as to say he was perfect: but you will all respond with an according voice to the declaration, that his imperfections were known only to himself and to his God: for by us they were unseen and unsuspected.

It is his private life, one of so much beauty, on which we delight to dwell; to which, as members of a free commonwealth, we would incessantly point, as furnishing an example worthy the imitation of our public servants, and always to inculcate that an approximation to it will be the surest guaranty to their fidelity; for, great capacity, without virtue, has been the ruin of all republics. When vice sits in the highest seats, the contagion becomes general: all history testifies that it descends on the subordinate classes with the increasing rapidity of gravitation. A man dissolute and disorderly in his private life, rarely, if ever, makes a faithful public servant. Let this maxim be indelibly impressed on the mind of every American, and let it be sovereign in regulating his conduct whenever he has to exercise that high privilege of a freeman—the elective franchise.

Our Madison, uniting extraordinary capacity with great virtues, furnished to the world that rare combination of the good and the great man. When contemplating his character as a whole, as parents we are grateful that such a pattern has been left for the imitation of our children; as Americans, we are proud that his name is compatriot with our own; as men, we feel elevated at the exaltation to which he has carried our nature. To trace, minutely, the life of such a man, from its beginning to its end, is an unmixt gratification. But my part, to-day, is to give merely an outline of its more striking features, leaving it to the professed biographer to give a full-length portraiture; for it cannot be doubted that some kindred genius, inspired by the theme, will give so invaluable a treasure to the world.—His materials will be most ample, because, in unfolding the virtues and services of Madison, he would be compelled to write the history of his times. For what great political event occurred in that fruitful period, in which he did act a conspicuous part?

James Madison was born on the 5th March, (O. S.) 1751. We claim him entirely for Orange, though, from a temporary visit of his parents to King George, he was born in that county. His constitution was infirm from his infancy to his death. The opulence of his parents, among the most respectable of our inhabitants, furnished him the means of obtaining a liberal education. After acquiring the rudiments of the English, at the age of twelve he was placed under the tuition of Donald Robertson, a ripe scholar of King and Queen, where he laid the foundations, deep and broad, of those intellectual attainments which in after life distinguished him. At this school he gave an earnest of those rare mental powers, a successful cultivation of which gave such elevation to his character. He finished his preparatory course for college under the Rev. Mr. Martin, who acted as private tutor in his father's house. In 1769 he entered Nassau Hall, then under the direction of the celebrated doctor Witherspoon. Always abreast with the foremost, he soon rose there to distinction. His moral deportment corresponded with his literary proficiency. In 1771 he received the degree of bachelor of arts. After this he returned home, extremely enfeebled by his too assiduous pursuits while at college. In proof of his extraordinary and persevering assiduity, I may refer to a friendly conversation, in which he told me that, for months together, he had allowed himself only three out of the twenty-four hours for sleep, and, when necessity compelled him to relax, he limited his hours of repose to the least number consistent with his health. In this solitary fact we see a high purpose, and the means of its attainment. On his quitting college, he did not precipitately, as is but too common with our talented young men, commit himself to the turmoil of public life. He continued to dedicate years to reading and reflection. It may be confidently asserted that no man at his age had read more, and that there are few who profited more by their reading. The history of the free states of antiquity was with him a favorite subject. In this he became familiar with those illustrious characters which of themselves constituted epochs, from the influence they exercised on the affairs of their country; and by selecting from the best models, he formed his own. His great mind, tracing effects to their proper causes, enabled him to detect the motives of the statesman, and the follies and passions of the multitude, and led him, with an unerring sagacity, to the sources of the prosperity of those states, as well as to the causes of their decline—a knowledge of the highest value to him, in those important parts which fortune was preparing him to act. But it was not from antiquity alone he drew the means of his superior intelligence. Whatever the wisdom of modern times presented as worth attaining, especially as connected with the polity of states, he made his own by his active and persevering researches. Such was his career till the 25th year of his age, when the revolution opened its great drama, whose paramount influence in human affairs constitutes it the most interesting event in the whole course of backward time. Had our independence been its sole object, it still to us would have been of consequence. But this was altogether insignificant when compared with its more important results. The coming conflict was not to decide whether we should remain under the king of Britain, or set up one for ourselves, but looked to a higher and holier purpose. It was a contest between feudalism and free institutions—between the usurped superiority of the privileged few, and the equal and inalienable rights of man. The omens, indeed, were fearfully inauspicious. Our foe was Britain, whose march to power, for a thousand years, had been onward, till she had arrived at a pinnacle of greatness, from whose heights her orators proudly proclaimed to an admiring world “that the roots of her empire reached from continent to continent, while the dews of both hemispheres watered its branches.” Britain was about to direct this vast power, which, lately guided by Chatham, had brought conquered Europe to her feet, against separate colonies, whose limited population was rendered less efficient by its diffusion over a boundless territory—colonies without government, without armies, and destitute in all things which form the material of war. We had only stout hearts, an unconquerable devotion to liberty, and an assurance in the support of heaven, from the justice of our cause. Well has the contest been likened to that of the shepherd lad, who, with his sling and his pebbles, fearlessly went forth to contend with Goliath and his ponderous staff.—And we may humbly but confidently believe that the same Almighty power controlled the issue of both.

In such a contest, the part Madison naturally took was that of his country. The leaders of the revolution—men of profound capacity—at once resorted to that powerful lever of public opinion—associations in all the counties of their most influential citizens, under the imposing name of “committees of public safety.” Madison was a member of this committee for Orange. The commencement of a public life, which became so distinguished, is an object of great curiosity and interest, and will excuse the particular reference I am about to make. I will not disguise from you that, apart from its legitimate object, I wish to avail myself of the opportunity it affords of presenting a testimonial highly honorable to the ancestors of many of my audience, as well as to my own, and indeed of the whole county of Orange, whose citizens thus early and fearlessly encountered this unequal contest.—This committee convened in the place we now are, on the 9th of May, 1775.

What reflections does a retrospect to these distant scenes awaken! Could the curtain of time have been lifted, and a view of this day revealed to our ancestors, how would their apprehensions have been changed into confidence—their gloom into joy! To Madison the privilege was given, not of anticipating, but, from his length of days, actually of beholding, the wonders which the intervening period produced. To our ancestors, on whom this privilege was bestowed, their joy was unmixed. I have seen a spectacle, full of the profoundest interest of this kind. I had the good fortune to be at the great festival of laying the corner stone of the monument erected by our New England brethren to the heroes who fell at Bunker's Hill—it might be called indeed a monument to liberty, whose corner stone was carved out on that battle ground. There were between two and three hundred of the veterans of the revolution present; conspicuous, above all, gen. Lafayette, the mention of whose name alone is, with the Americans, eulogy sufficient. Of these, there were some twenty of the surviving heroes of the glorious field, clothed in the same costume in which they had fought, whose many bullet holes evinced alike the fury of the conflict and their own suffering; but the most striking figure in the group was the pious man who, that day fifty years before, had invoked the aid of heaven on his countrymen going forth to peril their lives for liberty, and now returning thanks, and again supplicating heaven for a continuance of its blessings. His white hairs, his shrivelled frame, his palsied hands, all indicated that the narrow line on which he stood between time and eternity was just ready to crumble under him; and it would have been no surprise if his own departing spirit had attended his prayers to the throne of mercy. When the orator of the day, by one of those sublime efforts which are vouchsafed only to superior genius, contrasted the present with the past, and justly ascribed our liberty and happiness to the men of the revolution, this little gallant band rose spontaneously, uncovered themselves—the tears of joy ran profusely down their furrowed cheeks—the appeal was irresistible—all New England (for the thousands who were there justify the expression) burst forth into a rapturous exclamation. I was, indeed, profoundly gratified. I was assured, from what I saw and heard, that liberty had no stronger citadel than New England; and if she be ever lost to America, New England will be one of the last points from which she will wing her flight.

I return to the proceedings of the committee of Orange. (See Girardin's History of Virginia, 4th volume, p. 16.)

The committee for Orange county met on Tuesday, the 9th of May. Taking into their consideration the removal of the powder from the public magazine, and the compensation obtained by the independent company of Hanover, and observing, also, that the receipt given by capt. Patrick Henry to his majesty's receiver general refers the final disposal of the money to the next colony, the convention came into the following resolutions:

1st. That the governor's removal of the powder lodged in the magazine, and set apart for the defence of the country, was fraudulent, unnecessary and extremely provoking to the people of this colony.

2d. That the resentment shown by the Hanover volunteers, and the reprisals they have made on the king's property, highly merit the approbation of the public, and the thanks of this committee.

3d. That, if any attempt should be made at the ensuing convention to have the money returned to his majesty's receiver general, our delegates be, and they are hereby, instructed to exert all their influence in opposing such attempt, and in having the money laid out for the use of the colony.

4th. That the following address be presented to capt. Patrick Henry and the gentlemen Independent of Hanover:

GENTLEMEN: We, the committee for the county of Orange, having been fully informed of your reasonable and spirited proceedings in procuring a compensation for the powder fraudulently taken from the county magazine, by command of lord Dunmore, and which it evidently appears his lordship, notwithstanding his assurances, had no intention to restore, entreat you to accept their cordial thanks for this testimony of your zeal for the honor and interest of your country. We take this occasion, also, to give it as our opinion that the blow struck in the Massachusetts government is a hostile attack on this and every other colony, and a sufficient warrant to use violence and reprisal in all cases where it may be expedient for our security and welfare.

JAMES MADISON, chairman.

We have no difficulty in ascribing these proceedings to Madison.

The next manifestation of public confidence was his election, in 1776, to the convention. When we reflect on the magnitude of the interests committed to this body, and the peril of the times, we perceive at once how signal was the honor conferred on so young a man, by this election. The firmness, patriotism and wisdom of the convention are visible in their acts. They acquired deserved renown by boldly declaring, on the 15th May, for independence. On that memorable day they unanimously instructed our delegation in congress to bring forward in that body, for adoption, this important measure. The convention, on the 12th of June, agreed to a declaration of rights, Madison being a member of the committee which prepared it, and, on the 29th of the same month, without a dissenting voice, adopted a constitution, in conformity to its principles, thus anticipating every colony, and the congress of the whole, in this decisive step of declaring independence. Madison has shown me the original draught of the constitution, the work of George Mason, with the particular amendments adopted at his own instance. What can be more curious or interesting? The first written constitution the world had ever seen which proclaimed the equality of man, liberty of speech, and of the press, and of the conscience, and was divested of every taint of hereditary privilege. What conception more august can suggest itself to the human mind than the daring and the achievements of our ancestors, with their long train of blessings? A feeble people, for centuries looking up to Britain with filial affection, connected with her by all those ties which bind societies together; taught to admire her government as the happiest effort of the human mind—an impression strengthened by her power and prosperity; with the universally prevalent opinion among mankind, that republics could exist only in a most limited territory; in despite of these obstacles, and, above all, the vast superiority with which they had to contend, fearlessly dissolving this connexion, boldly encountering every peril, and cheerfully submitting to every sacrifice, with a purpose so unshakable as to be undismayed by disasters the most appalling, and magnanimously pressing on to a final triumph—a triumph not merely of arms, but of liberty. Boldly cancelling the dogma which confined her to a walled town or a narrow territory, they gave her a boundless empire. Her altars, so long desecrated or beaten down, were now, having been lustrated with the blood of patriots, reconstructed, and the undefiled purity of her worship re-established. Such are the glorious works of our ancestors, among whom stands conspicuous the name of Madison.

An incident occurred the ensuing year (1777) which presented a strong and melancholy proof of the fickleness of popularity, and of the facility with which, for a season, a people can be seduced from their allegiance to virtue, intelligence and patriotism. He was rejected by the people of Orange that year from their delegation to the state legislature. Tradition ascribes it to a successful effort to divide and array against each other the poor and the rich, the ready instrument in all times now, as formerly, of the demagogues, a pestilent race! love of the people always on their lips, and treachery at their hearts, who seduce only that they may betray.—What can be more preposterous or more pernicious than such a contest in a country like ours! where the wheel of fortune is perpetually revolving, where the descendants of the rich of this generation are the poor of the next, and where every man may occupy precisely the position to which he is entitled from his talents, his industry and his moral worth? The fidelity of my narrative required that I should refer to this event, humiliating as it may be to my native county. It is the province of truth to record the vices as well as the virtues of mankind. They may both become profitable to posterity; those to avoid, these to imitate. The example before us will not be without its use, if it should teach the people to beware of the wily insinuations of the demagogue, of the sacred importance of a prudent exercise of the elective franchise; for into this the whole mystery of liberty and self-government is resolvable; it is from this head spring their current runs, or else dries up.

This ungrateful return of the people served only to place Madison in a higher sphere of usefulness. The legislature, who, from a knowledge of his talents and worth, were indisposed that the abilities of such a man should be lost to his country at such a period, elected him immediately to the council of state, whose important duty it was, in concert with the governor, to prepare and direct the means of national defence. He continued in this situation till the close of 1779, when he was elected a member of the continental congress, in which body he took his seat in March, 1780. Its journals bear ample testimony to the fidelity and ability with which he discharged his duties; and we know, from other sources, that he was the author of the instructions given in October, 1780, to Jay, maintaining the right of the United States to the navigation of the Mississippi. He also prepared the address to the states, urging the adoption of some plan to enable the confederacy to meet its various pecuniary engagements; the vast importance of this step I shall have occasion hereafter to refer to.

Time rolled on, delivering itself of great events, till, finally, our independence—the great object of our hopes—to effect which our treasure and our blood had been so profusely poured out, was acknowledged. Thanks to God—thanks to our brave defenders—and thanks to the genius of the great and good man who directed them. Let me add a passing tribute to his memory. His ministry having been fulfilled, in the independence of his country, he eagerly resigned his important command to become a private citizen, and received, as his just reward, by the common voice of human kind, precedence in their ranks. These glorious results, while diffusing joy over all America, attracted the earnest attention of the oppressor and the oppressed throughout the earth. To the former it was as the hand-writing on the wall to Belshazzar. To the latter, the dawning of a day, whose meridian would break the yoke, and make the captive free.

Amid this general joy, the enlightened statesman could not disguise from himself that, in our condition, there were elements which, unless arrested by timely preventives, boded great mischief. The government of the confederation, the pressure of war being removed, dissolved in its own weakness—bankruptcy ensued; equally unable to redeem its foreign engagements, or its more sacred obligations to the war worn veteran, many of whom, reduced to poverty, sunk speedily to a premature grave—and private confidence destroyed. These are the forerunners of civil commotion; the result corresponded with these alarming symptoms. Add to these the state of parties, which was not less ominous. One of them, the ultra friends of state sovereignties, who declared against any material change. The second, its antagonist, inclining to a strong central government, with an executive essentially monarchical, was indisposed to a change then, because, bad as our condition was, they contended that the states were not yet prepared for such a modification of the government as to give to it the necessary efficiency. Between these was the third party, rendered respectable and influential by its leaders, among whom Madison was prominent, which, holding a just medium, was willing to surrender so much power to the federal government as would render it equal to the object of its creation—the regulation of the affairs of the union; while the states should retain the exclusive power of managing their internal concerns, and both to be restrained within their respective spheres by such impassable checks as, it was hoped, would prevent collision. This is the culminating point in Madison's public character, which his country will forever contemplate with affection and with admiration. It was from the heights he occupied that, calmly looking down on the troubled and threatening scene, he called order out of chaos. It is to him more than to any mortal, unless Washington be an exception, that we are indebted for our constitution, and, in consequence, for our union. I have had occasion already to remark that, when first in congress, for he was now a member, he was the author of the address of that body to the states, soliciting an extension of the powers of the federal government. This object he incessantly pursued. While constitutionally ineligible to congress, he consented to become a member of the Virginia legislature, with a view to its furtherance. To do an act of justice to the people of Orange, I will state they have long repented their folly and ingratitude to him, and now most anxiously solicited his services. In that body he pressed, with the whole weight of his character and intelligence, the measure of adding to the powers of the federal government, till, eventually, in January, 1786, he succeeded in obtaining the passage of a resolution appointing deputies, of which he was one, to unite with those who might be appointed by the other states, to effect this great purpose. They met at Annapolis during that year, but, from the smallness of the number of the states represented in that meeting, and from the very limited powers of the deputies, nothing was done but the adoption of an earnest appeal to all the states to appoint afresh deputies, and to enlarge their powers. Still being a member of the legislature, he succeeded in inducing them to ratify this recommendation of the late convention. Washington, Madison and three other distinguished citizens composed the delegation of Virginia. Every state, save Rhode Island, sent deputies to this convention of their most distinguished citizens. For intelligence, patriotism and virtue, they may well challenge comparison with any deliberative body that the whole course of time had furnished: to them was confided the future fate of their country. They deliberated, amid great difficulties, on a state of affairs without a parallel; there was no precedent on the files of time for their guidance. The orator proclaimed, "We were without a compass, in the vast ocean of human affairs." It was one of those great crisis when the scales of destiny, charged with a large portion of the happiness and misery of the human race, were vibrating in equipoise. It was then that these illustrious men, with Madison as their Palinurus, committing themselves to the polarity of their own superior intelligence, triumphed over every difficulty, and, by forming and recommending our happy constitution, wrought out our deliverance. Wonderful men! Glorious consummation!

The convention had, indeed, done nobly; but their power was limited to the recommendation of the constitution to the American people. It had yet many dangers to encounter: state pride, honest prejudices, real apprehensions, and the efforts of the factious, were still to be surmounted. Madison and his able associates, Hamilton and Jay, addressed a series of essays to the American people, distinguished for their moderation and extensive views, with a simplicity of style and force of argument that wrought great effect. Whether the constitution would be adopted, was yet extremely doubtful. Its fate, it was admitted, depended on Virginia: she then had great weight in the union. The centrality of her position, her numbers, her intelligence, but, above all, the loftiness of her character and her noble and disinterested bearing, whenever liberty was concerned, gave her a moral influence, almost sovereign, over the union. How have the mighty fallen! Who is now so poor as to do her reverence! But I forbear. In opposition to the constitution, was seen a formidable array of talent and patriotism. Henry was among them, like Saul among the prophets—himself a host—exercising, by his eloquence, a dominion over the human mind never before surpassed, increased by his popularity, which struck its roots deep into the revolution, "to whose ball he had given the first impulse." Madison, though aided by powerful auxiliaries, was the leading champion of the constitution. Both were elected to the convention, to which had been referred the adoption or rejection of the constitution. Henry put forth all his vast powers; he astonished and alarmed his audience, by flights of eloquence, sublime and terrible, accompanied by that fearful gesture which no language can describe. His contemporaries delighted to tell of one occasion, as furnishing a signal proof of the promptitude and illimitable range of his genius: Henry was addressing the convention for the last time; the final question was about being put; the issue, in the impassioned language of the orator, involved the fate of both hemispheres. He had already invoked beings of a higher order to his aid, when an angry cloud of such violence passed over as to carry dismay through the hall. It was in this moment of alarm that the towering genius of Henry was seen mingling with the storm, when, by a stroke of inspiration, he audaciously seized the forked lightning itself, and made it obedient to his purpose. Madison was in striking contrast to Henry. Modest even to bashfulness, instead of the strong and melodious voice of Henry, his was inconveniently feeble, so that, when he rose to speak, the members, lest they should lose a word, were accustomed to gather around him. He used little or no gesture; his style of speaking was pure and simple, and without ornament. Yet, modestly confiding in his own vast resources, and strong in the conviction of the righteousness of his cause, day after day, for six weeks, he continued to wrestle successfully with his gigantic opponent. To his eloquence, he opposed a calm appeal to the understanding, sustained by reference to the experience of the past, and more especially that furnished by the free states of antiquity; pointing, with unerring wisdom, to the causes of their fall; furnishing new beacons by which we should profit; demonstrating, with the clearness of a sunbeam, the necessity of a change in the federal government, and, if the union were to be preserved, of imparting to that government more efficient powers. These efforts were the more successful on account of his high character for disinterestedness, awarded him alike by friend and foe—I mean political foe, for private he had none; so that his words fell upon his audience like the responses of an ancient oracle—adored for its truth and wisdom. In fine, the good genius of his country was in him personified; and, surely, it could not have found a purer mortal tenement. The conflict between these giants and their auxiliaries was enacted before an audience to which every quarter of the union had contributed some of its most distinguished citizens; and was so full of interest that, to enjoy it, industry gave up its pursuits, and dissipation forbore its indulgences. The constitution was adopted in Virginia by a majority of ten, and by all the states, save Rhode Island and North Carolina. Let us pause here for a moment, to mark well the time of the occurrence of this important measure. It furnishes, we think, a decisive evidence of a kind Providence, whose pleasure it has been so often to stretch out his protecting arm over these states.—In point of time, it was coincident with the commencement of the French revolution; that fearful event in the history of the past, whose beginning, indeed, was illustrated by acts of patriotic devotion exalting to our nature, but whose progress was marked by horrors so atrocious as to have required demons for their actors; a revolution which, acquiring strength in its advance, swept before it principalities, and powers, and kingdoms, till the social edifice of Europe shook like a volcanic mountain in the moment of its throes; when, eventually, its fiery spirit was seen riding on the wave of the Atlantic, coming to disturb our peaceful shores.—There it was met and rebuked, by the genius of our free institutions; consolidated and strengthened by our lately adopted constitution, and by the energy and wisdom of that superior man whom Providence, in its mercy, had granted us for its administration.

The constitution, having been adopted by the states, was to be reduced to practice. Washington, without one dissenting voice, amid the millions of the American people, was called to the chief magistracy. Surely no mortal ever received, or was more worthy of so high an honor. He summoned around him, without regard to party, for these were the virtuous days of the republic, in the composition of his cabinet, men distinguished for their talents, and enjoying the full confidence of their country. The two houses of congress were filled with the most illustrious citizens. Among them Madison, representing this district, had no superior. Under auspices like these, the interesting problem of man's capacity for self-government was to be tested. Intelligence and patriotism, sitting at the helm, directed the vessel of state. Its early progress filled the bosom of every patriot with joy and with hope. The threatening clouds which had so long shadowed our country disappeared, the clamor of faction was hushed, the law ascendant, justice impartially administered, private and public credit re-established; industry enjoyed the fruits of its labor, and peace, liberty and happiness pervaded the utmost borders of the republic. But it seems not to be the lot of man here below to enjoy happiness uninterruptedly long. Time and circumstances produce discord and division: the country became divided into parties; the more conspicuous of these were called federalists and republicans; they were known, indeed, by other names at the time, but decency and justice have long since caused them to be forgotten. Our own experience most unfortunately teaches us how easily offensive epithets are invented by cunning politicians to divide and hoodwink the people so as to dupe them to their purposes, by causing them, in the conflict of parties, to forget their country; and, in consequence, two good honest neighbors, with no wish but for the well-being of their common country, are made to consider each other as traitors to that country. Is it not high time, fellow citizens, that we the people should rather look to the deeds than the names of parties? The federalists were charged by their opponents with seeking, by a latitudinarian interpretation of the constitution, to obtain indirectly this enlargement of the powers of the government, which they had not dared to attempt directly, and that the inevitable tendency of such a course was a consolidated monarchy. While these charges were repelled by the federalists, they in their turn charged their opponents with Utopian doctrines, that could not fail in time so to weaken the government as to render it utterly inadequate to the purposes of its creation. The mighty struggle in Europe tended to increase the exacerbation of the parties.

In now referring to these by-gone events, I have no object but the fidelity of my narrative. That will be my limit. I have no disposition to rekindle those ancient animosities. The real difference between these parties, so far as I have been able to form a correct judgment, was the more or less confidence to be reposed in the virtue and intelligence of the people. The federalists acted on the principle that the government should have an inherent power capable of withstanding those temporary delusions and violent ebullitions to which all free states had hitherto been subject; the republicans, on the other hand, drawing confidence from the age, were willing to confide, without any collateral surety, every thing, and at all times, to the good sense and integrity of the people. There are those who still contend that the solution of this great problem must be left to futurity. The people of the United States have it in charge. It is a high trust, and their own fate and the fate of the human race depend upon the issue; for if free government fail here, it is lost to the world forever.

Madison's political creed placed him among the republicans. He had an abiding confidence in the people. The constitution as written was to be held sacred and inviolable; the preservation of the rights of the states to the full extent, as prescribed in that instrument, was the first canon of his creed; that the federal government should abstain from the exercise of all doubtful powers, and, if experience should manifest defects, amendments should be made in the manner provided by the constitution. These were the principles for which he contended, when a representative of the people; but after an unsuccessful struggle in congress to arrest the measures of the then dominant party, until 1797, he retired to private life. Here it may be stated as a proof of the high estimation Washington entertained for him, that he was solicited to accept the important mission to France, subsequently filled, on his declining it, by Monroe, and, on the retirement of Jefferson from the state department, that Madison should fill it; to which may be added the late developments in relation to Washington's farewell address. Though in private life he kept an anxious eye on the progress of public affairs. The alien and sedition laws, and a suspected design to involve us unnecessarily in war with our ancient ally, France, produced great excitement through the republic, and more particularly in Virginia. Madison felt as a patriot, and indeed with all the anxiety of a parent, lest these aberrations, against which he had so unsuccessfully contended, should devote the constitution, his own offspring, to a premature sacrifice, or prostitute it to the most pernicious purposes. The eyes of his countrymen, who sympathized with him in these feelings, were naturally turned to him as the anchor of their hopes. By their solicitations, I speak advisedly, for I know the very individual who conveyed these wishes to him, he prepared the resolutions of 1798, which have since become so distinguished. They were presented by Taylor, of Caroline, adopted, and addressed to the legislatures of the states; while by some they were approved, by others they were rejected with a contumely, ill becoming that courteous intercourse which no difference of opinion should interrupt, and which is so indispensable to that harmony without which our union exists only in name.

The principles maintained in these resolutions were not only combatted by many of the states, but the right of a state legislature to express its opinion on the measures of the federal government flatly denied. They were also opposed by a respectable minority in Virginia; among them was Henry, who determined to reappear in the public arena, to counteract their efforts. He was elected to the legislature of 1799 by the county of Charlotte. His retirement had been so long and so profound, that he seemed almost a messenger from the dead; which added to his great powers and great popularity, rendered him indeed a formidable antagonist. Who was to be the champion of the republicans? All agreed it ought to be Madison. I was charged with the duty of communicating to him their unanimous wish. I did so. He consented to suffer his name to be announced to the people of Orange, and his willingness to serve them, if it were their pleasure he should do so. He was elected without opposition. These great men did not meet, Henry dying in June, 1799. The celebrated report and resolutions of the legislature of that year, exclusively the work of Madison, have been so long matter of history, and the subject of so much commentary, as to require of me but few additional remarks. The resolutions of 1798 and 1799 have become the received text book of the politicians of the present generation. I am aware that, in times of great party excitement, interpretations have been given them which the author disavowed, and for which he has been accused by violent partisans with inconsistency. I allude to that portion of them which refers to the rights of the states to interpose in arrest of the constitutional measures of the federal government. The intent and nature of the interposition insisted on in these proceedings, so far as acts were concerned, was explained at the time to be an invitation to the states, and to the American people, to co-operate in a united effort through the ballot box to effect a change; for even this right at that time was stoutly denied by the dissentient states. I can truly say, that though a member of the legislature of 1798, and a member also of a small consultative meeting before the resolutions of that year were presented to the legislature—a member likewise of the legislature of 1799, the colleague of Madison, living with him in the same house, and daily in friendly and frequently confidential intercourse, I never heard a whisper of an interposition by force. The precautionary measures adopted by the legislature of that year, and frequently referred to as explanatory of our views, looked exclusively to defence, and not to aggression. Madison, like the constitution, averted his eye from that extreme case which will justify an appeal to force. This is one of the awful mysteries which we should devoutly pray may never be revealed. If, however, the time should ever come when madness and wickedness shall force upon a portion of the confederacy the necessity of abandoning the union as a lesser evil than a submission to these measures, it will have been in vain to fix the time or the occasion when this fearful step will be justifiable. In such a crisis, the constitution and its reading will be equally unavailing. These will be silent amid arms, and the only logic will be the sword.

In 1800, a majority of the American people responded in accordance with the views of these celebrated state papers; a political revolution ensued, and Jefferson, a name dear to Americans, was elected to the chief magistracy of the union. Madison in 1801 was recalled from his retirement by his appointment as secretary of state. He added much to his reputation by the ability with which he discharged the important duties of his station, and especially by his correspondence in connexion with our foreign relations. These distinguished men, Jefferson and Madison, had long been connected by the strongest ties, both private and political; amongst hundreds of others, reference may be made to the distinguished aid given by Madison to the law of religious freedom, propounded by Jefferson, and which has so deservedly given a lasting renown to his name; and Jefferson has left in his public letters a strong proof of his high veneration for Madison, by declaring that Madison had been to him a pillar of light. On the expiration of Jefferson's second term, Madison was elected his successor, though opposed by two distinguished citizens. This election was truly most honorable to himself, and most creditable to the discernment and integrity of the people. It had not been achieved by cunning manœuvres, nor by the dirty tricks of the demagogue. The people sought him out, not he the people. The election of Madison conformed to the true theory of the constitution; for, to profound wisdom he added great experience. His course had been illustrated by a frank avowal of his principles. He had rendered his country great and distinguished services. He presented that guarantee of fidelity to which I have before referred—a private character of unsullied purity; and he added, in a public man, the best of all traits, disinterestedness. In referring to the illustrious men of past time who have enjoyed the largest share of the approbation of their kind, I see disinterestedness was the leading cause of their elevation, and of its continuance. Madison, in this regard will bear a comparison with any man that ever lived, however distinguished. I remember well his having said to me that, though he had no doubt a princely fortune might be made by purchasing the public securities and the public lands, yet, having prescribed to himself as an inviolable rule on no account to engage in such traffic, he had carefully abstained from dealing in either. Such was his delicacy on this point, that he would not expose himself even to suspicion; and I submit his example as well worthy of imitation by all those who are candidates for popular favor; they may be assured it will take ready hold of the public confidence, and will be their shield and buckler in the rivalries with which they may have to contend. Such were the guarantees he carried with him into the high office of chief magistrate of this great republic. To so virtuous a man how awful must have been his responsibility—how anxious must have been his mind so to discharge his trust as to promote the prosperity of his country, and add to his own renown.

What should be the leading principles on which he was to conduct the administration of public affairs, was a question of profoundest consideration. His high character was our surety in advance, which he fully redeemed, that he considered himself as the head of a nation, and not the mere chief of a party: that, in exercising the appointing power, the pivot on which mainly our virtues and liberties depend, he would rigidly conform to the rule inculcated by his predecessor—Is he honest? is he capable? is he a friend of the constitution? rather than indulge in that detestable and insolent egotism which substitutes itself for the state, and, acknowledging no merit but a servile personal devotion, inflicts the penalties of proscription on every opponent as though he were a traitor to the republic. His magnanimity of character saved him from the degradation of prostituting his high trust to the gratification of private malice, of which he had indeed none to gratify. His appointment of Monroe, his stout, not to say violent rival for the presidency itself, to the first seat in his cabinet, may be referred to as a signal proof of his highminded and patriotic purpose. His deportment to the other departments of the government was to be characterized by that inviolable respect which was due to that equality assigned them by the constitution. To degrade them into the condition of passive tools to his own purposes, would have been to violate, in a fundamental point, his own work. Cautiously to abstain from the exercise of all doubtful authority, had been with him at all times a cardinal point, as well as to secure to the states and the people thereof their respective rights. In his intercourse with foreign nations, to cherish peace and friendly relations with every people having correspondent dispositions, and to prefer, in all cases, amicable discussion, and reasonable accommodation of differences to a decision of them by an appeal to arms. Such was the noble path he determined to pursue, most honorably to himself, and beneficially to his country: and he redeemed his every promise by his acts.

The period of his entering office was stormy, and the difficulties he had to encounter most serious. The old world was involved in hostilities which might well be termed tremendous, whether we refer to their protracted duration, or to the vast scale on which they were conducted. Britain and France, the principal parties, had all Europe besides for their auxiliaries. In this fearful conflict the neutral rights of America had been outraged by both, with such circumstances of contumely, that to have submitted to them could not fail to tarnish our national honor. The policy of his predecessor had been to withdraw our citizens from the ocean—the theatre of our wrongs: to surrender this highway, the common property of every nation, if not humiliating, was attended: with the most disastrous sacrifices. War, dreadful as it is, was preferable; but it was a real difficulty, to decide against which this measure should be taken. It was finally, after having exhausted the cup of forbearance, and after every invocation to her justice had been rejected, denounced against Britain. The opposition among her own citizens to this step was not inconsiderable: let us be charitable enough to believe it was conscientious; and hence, during the pendency of the question whether it should be declared, it was not obnoxious to a just censure; but it must ever be a matter of regret, after war had been declared—for it is a blot on our national character, that the opposition to it was carried to so criminal an extreme.

When war actually exists, the maxim of every patriot should be that of the chivalrous Decatur—"our country, right or wrong." These divisions, our fiscal embarrassments, the disuse of arms for so long a period, and the unfortunate selection of the essentially superannuated officers of the revolution, from the best of motives but from a most mistaken policy, with the hardships and perils of war, belonged to vigor of manhood. From these various adverse causes, the commencement of the war was attended with some mortifying incidents. Time, however, and the uprised spirit of the nation, gave us victory in many a bloody and well-contested field. Our navy, especially, achieved victories, which, in the language of Madison, were never surpassed in lustre, however much they may have been in magnitude; and it won itself a favor with the American people, the more fortunate, as it is the defence most congenial to our institutions, as, above all, it dispenses with the necessity of standing armies, that leprosy of republics. The war eventually closed with one of those splendid achievements which confer imperishable renown on the victors and their country. We owe this great triumph to the undisciplined but heroic militia of the west, which, directed by the brave Jackson, successfully contended with and overcame the hitherto victorious veterans of Europe. In the narrative I am giving, the means do not exist of electrifying you with descriptions of splendid victories achieved by Madison; if he had so willed, the infirmity of his constitution forbade his encountering the hardships of war: the union of the great virtues and great qualities of the statesman with the attributes of the great captain make the perfect character; but how rare the example! No man would go farther than myself in bestowing appropriate rewards on the man, whether an officer or a private, who goes to peril his life in defence of his country, against the foreign enemy or the domestic usurper; such a one is entitled to our warmest gratitude: but if a comparison be instituted between the enlightened statesman, whose ambition seeks the greatest good of the greatest number of his fellow men, and the conqueror, whose ambition conducts him through the slaughter of his kind to the winning of a name, how infinitely, in the eye of philanthropy, is the former to be preferred the latter; and yet, in looking into the history of human affairs, how adverse to this has been the decision of mankind. Is this the unalterable law of our nature? If it be, if mankind will minister to the pride of the conqueror, by humbling themselves in the dust before this bloody idol—if they consider the human sacrifices required for his altars as their due, so long will war, the scourge of man, prevail. Let us hope for better things: that the time is approaching when this idol will be broken, his altars overthrown, and, in lieu thereof, that the Christian maxim of peace on earth and good will to man will be set up as alone worthy of our devotion. Let me invoke the reflection of the admirers of military renown, by contrasting the acts, and their effects on the condition of the world, of the greatest captain of ancient or modern times, Napoleon, with our Madison's. Of the former it has been said, "the earthquake voice of victory was the breath of his nostrils." This Colossus of power, of ambition, and of crime, having crushed the liberties of his country, placed one foot on the pillars of Hercules, and sought to stretch the other to the Arctic pole: his sceptre was the besom of desolation: the pedestal of his fame was composed of the carcasses of three millions of his kind, cemented with the blood of his victims, and bedewed with the tears of their widows and orphans: his ministry seemed to be that of a ruthless instrument of vengeance to chastise and humble a guilty world. But mark his end! His mad ambition devoted his country to the horrors of conquest, in part by barbarous hordes who lived beyond civilization: he himself was precipitated to the dust. He is deserted by the multitude, that sycophant of success, whose morality teaches that while misfortune can furnish no excuse, victory, no matter how obtained, is not required to give an account of her actions. Thus abandoned, he becomes an outlaw of the civilized world, and dies a wretched captive in one of Africa's distant isles, loaded with the execrations of the widows and orphans which his ambition has made, and with the curses of a world; while Madison, disinterestedly devoting every fibre of his heart, and every attribute of his mind, to the cause of liberty, and the happiness of his kind—leading a nation through the hitherto untrodden paths of political science, like another Moses conducting his countrymen through the wilderness to the land of promise—laying the foundations of a constitution, which, if his examples and his counsels prevail, will, with the blessing of God, be immortal—finally departed in peace, when every hill and every valley of this vast republic resound with benedictions on his name, and one universal voice proclaims him the benefactor of his kind. Behold the contrast! And yet, if Napoleon had continued successful, the subject of the extraordinary delusion I am encountering would have required the sculptor and the poet to exhaust their art, in perpetuating his name, while they would have suffered Madison's to go down to the grave unwept, unhonored and unsung.

To return to my narrative. An honorable peace ensued. Among other results, in the language of Madison, "it furnished proofs that our political institutions, founded in human rights, and framed for their preservation, were equal to the severest trials of war, as well as adapted to the ordinary periods of repose." But let us not too readily apply this flattering unction. Though our institutions might be entirely safe in war, with a Madison as our chief, yet let us recollect it was in this hotbed that Cromwell and Napoleon sprung up, with unnumbered names of similar traits of character. Let it be continually present to our recollection that in the history of our ancestors, not two centuries ago, Cromwell, the general of the commonwealth, and a pretended apostle of liberty, first reduced to insignificance the representatives of the people, and then with the bayonet expelled from the hall the remaining few, and became a dictator; while, in our own time, Napoleon, amid the cries of his deluded followers—long live liberty, long live the constitution—was, on his march, to overthrow the republican government of his country, whose councils he had divided with this word; which, having achieved to-day, to-morrow, as their master, he inscribed with his sword the future slavery of his country. Man, with a few modifications, is the same every where; the same causes may be attended here with the same effects as elsewhere. What patent from the Almighty have we which exempts us from the great law of cause and effect? Let peace, then, be the object of our devout prayers, and war held as the last sad alternative, to be resorted to only when every effort at accommodation has been tried, and has hopelessly failed.

Among the most beneficent results of his administration was the standard of political morality, elevated by the force of his character to as high a pitch as the infirmity of our nature permitted.—History tells us of one of the Roman emperors who caused a herald daily to traverse his palace, proclaiming that nothing unholy should enter there—an officer entirely useless with Madison. His character was a continual proclamation to the vicious to stand afar off. They shrunk abashed from so much purity. They felt that there was a daily beauty in his life that made them ugly. No barometer is so infallible by which to test the condition of a republic, as the success or the disgrace of base flatterers, those pests existing in every age. If honor and merit alone find favor with power, be assured that all is well; but if that vile tribe, who fawn for the spoils of the people, are seen hovering around the precincts of the palace, and are taken into favor, ye need ask for no other evidence to convince you that there is something rotten in the state; for they are like ill-omened birds of prey, governed by the same instinct: a tainted atmosphere is the chosen element of both.

The remnant of his second term of office, after the restoration of peace, was employed in repairing the ravages of the war. Ample provision was made for its losses; as far as practicable, the wounded who survived, and the widows and orphans of those who fell, were provided for by the liberality of their country; and efficient means adopted, which, in a short time, were to cancel the debt created, in the language of the day, by the second war of our independence. Shortly before his leaving office, he addressed a valdictory message to congress, which, whether we refer to the matter or the manner, may be pronounced one of the happiest efforts of the human mind; and which, if it stood alone, would place him on the platform of equality with any patriot or any sage that all time has produced. But let it speak for itself.

"The period of my retiring from the public service being at little distance, I shall find no occasion more proper than the present for expressing to my fellow citizens my deep sense of the continued confidence and kind support which I have received from them. My grateful recollections of these distinguished marks of their favorable regard can never cease; and, with the consciousness that, if I have not served my country with greater ability, I have served it with a sincere devotion, will accompany me as a source of unfeigned gratification.

"Happily, I shall carry with me from the public theatre other sources, which those who love their country most will best appreciate. I shall behold it blessed with tranquillity and prosperity at home, and with peace and respect abroad. I can indulge the proud reflection that the American people have reached, in safety and success, their fortieth year as an independent nation; that, for nearly an entire generation, they have had experience of their present constitution, the offspring of their undisturbed deliberations, and of their free choice; that they have found it to bear the trials of adverse as well as prosperous circumstances—to contain, in its combination of the federate and elective principles, a reconciliation of public strength with individual liberty, of national power for the defence of national rights, with a security against wars of injustice, of ambition, and of vain glory, in the fundamental provision which subjects all questions of war to the will of the nation itself, which is to pay its costs, and feel its calamities. Nor is it less a peculiar felicity of this constitution, so dear to us all, that it is found to be capable, without losing its vital energies, of expanding itself over a spacious territory, with the increase and expansion of the community for whose benefit it was established.

"And, may I not be allowed to add to this gratifying spectacle, that I shall read in the character of the American people, in their devotion to true liberty, and to the constitution which is its palladium, sure presages that the destined career of my country will exhibit a government pursuing the public good as its sole object, and regulating its means by the great principles consecrated in its charter, and by those moral principles to which they are so well allied: a government which watches over the purity of elections; the freedom of speech and of the press, the trial by jury, and the equal interdict against encroachments and compacts between religion and the state; which maintains inviolably the maxims of public faith, the security of persons and property, and encourages, in every authorized mode, that general diffusion of knowledge which guarantees to public liberty its permanency, and to those who possess the blessing the true enjoyment of it: a government which avoids intrusion on the internal repose of other nations, and repels them from its own; which does justice to all nations with a readiness equal to the firmness with which it requires justice from them; and which, whilst it refines its domestic code from every ingredient not congenial with the precepts of an enlightened age, and the sentiments of a virtuous people, seeks, by appeals to reason, and by its liberal examples, to infuse into the law which governs the civilized world a spirit which may diminish the frequency, or circumscribe the calamities, of war, and meliorate the social and beneficent relations of peace: a government, in a word, whose conduct, within and without, may bespeak the most noble of all ambitions—that of promoting peace on earth, and good-will to man.

"These contemplations, sweetening the remnant of my days, will animate my prayers for the happiness of my beloved country, and a perpetuity of the institutions under which it is enjoyed."

Thus terminated on the 3d of March, 1817, the presidency of Madison, and with it his public life, save a few months of service in our convention in 1829; but its effects were forever to endure. The union cemented by his counsels, the constitution the peculiar offspring of his zeal and wisdom, so long as they endure, will be the pedestal on which will stand the lofty column of his fame.

It was my fixed purpose to avoid mixing up the memory of Madison with the wretched politics of the day; but I am so far driven from my purpose as to be compelled, from the sacredness of the trust which has been assigned me, to vindicate his memory from the aspersions which recently have been thrown upon it in asserting that he approved of the prominent measures pursued in the late course of public affairs. You who have been favored with his confidence distinctly know that such an assertion is a calumny, and, so far from having the least shadow of a foundation, is directly the reverse of the truth. You also know his often expressed wish was, that his quiet in the evening of life should not be disturbed by his name and his opinions becoming the subjects of partisan warfare. While, therefore, he freely but confidentially communicated with his friends on public measures, he abstained with strangers. He was content that his views, whatever they might be worth to his countrymen, might be inferred from the whole course of his life, and from his recorded opinions.

On the termination of his political life he hastened to private retirement, the place of his nativity, and the object of his warmest affections; and which he assured me he had never left at any time but with deep regret, when called off by his public duties. Whatever of fame he had deserved and enjoyed in public life, his happiness was complete only in retirement. He had, in 1794, formed a matrimonial connexion with one of the most attractive and amiable of her sex, who devoted herself so undividedly to his happiness, that she seemed to live only for him, and whose most anxious care was to anticipate his very wish. With a fortune sufficiently opulent to dispense a liberal and elegant hospitality, his house became the resort of the eminent native citizens and enlightened foreigners who came to visit him as the most distinguished of his contemporaries, and listen to his words, so full of wisdom, occasionally enlivened by anecdotes of men and things, which he was wont to tell with a happiness peculiar to himself. There came, also, his neighbor and his friend; with the less intelligent of these he seemed anxious to veil his superiority, and, by kindness and affability, to elevate them to a feeling of equality with himself; and, quick to discern the bent of their minds, he gave to the conversation a congenial direction; and it may be justly said that no one left him without having had the opportunity of becoming a better and a wiser man.

His time not given to his friends was employed in reading, in an extensive correspondence, and in preparing a work which, if I mistake not, will be eagerly read, both in Europe and America. It is the journal of the convention of 1787, that prepared and recommended our constitution. It presents not only all that received the sanction of the convention, but every proposition submitted, with the argument of the mover, whether successful or otherwise. With what profound interest will the statesman trace our organic law to its spring head; with what curiosity will he investigate the first crude suggestion which, elaborated by great minds, resulted in that beautiful symmetry which they finally obtained! Especially it will be most gratifying to him to see in what shape was first proposed that peculiar feature of our government, which so happily blended the conservative principles of a confederacy with the application of the powers of the government to individuals. This forthcoming work will furnish him the means of his gratification.

Madison was distinguished for a serenity of temper, which under no circumstances, in public or private, did I ever see disturbed. Cheerfulness was a predominant feature in his character; and frequently he indulged in a playful attic wit, always without a sting; it was the rose without the thorn.

And, above all, as partaking of the divine purity, I never heard him speak ill of any one. With these personal qualifications, and most happy in his domestic relations, he performed every duty of life with a scrupulous fidelity, as well from a sense of duty as the kindness of his nature; distinguished for his filial piety, whose amiable offices, fortunately for his affectionate spirit, were prolonged to the ninety-seventh year of his venerable mother, and were richly repaid by her repeated declarations that he had never given her cause of regret. He was a devoted husband, a kind brother, a warm friend, a good neighbor and an indulgent master. Many of you were at his funeral; you must have seen his slaves decently attired in attendance, and their orderly deportment; the profound silence was now and then broken by their sobs—they attended the procession to the grave. There are none of us, I fear, who have not drank of the cup of affliction, heavily drugged by the untimely bereavement of a dear child or affectionate companion; such will but too well remember, that so long as the remains continued on earth, the tie that connected us seemed not entirely dissolved; but, while standing on the verge of the grave, and seeing the corpse deposited, and hearing the pious man give utterance to the fearful sentence "dust to dust," whose fulfilment by some friendly hand flung back its hollow and mournful sound, how it pierced our souls; how we felt that the separation was now final—that all was gone. At this part of the service it was not only the body servant, who was standing directly by me, that, by his sobs and sighs, showed how severely he felt his bereavement in the loss of a kind and indulgent master, but the hundred slaves gave vent to their lamentations in one violent burst that rent the air; methought it ascended to heaven, and was heard with joy by the heavenly host, as a redeeming item in that great account which he, in common with all the sons of Adam, had to meet. And I derived consolation at the moment from a belief that if, in that great account, slight blemishes here and there, from the inexorable law of our nature, were to be found, this alone would, in the eye of mercy, be sufficient to blot out the unfriendly character that bore record of his infirmity, to be remembered no more.

Scenes like this give us the true character.—Most men in public seek to act as to escape censure; but it is in the secrecy of private life, where there is no human eye to see, or, seeing, no tongue dares to tell, that the heart, stripped of all disguise, and indulging its propensities, appear to good or ill in its nakedness. Most happy must he have been over whose remains such testimony is furnished, that in his private as in his public life, all was well. What felicity had Madison in his unusually extended age; he had survived all the fathers of the revolution, as well as of the constitution. To him, as was so happily expressed by the great western orator to another illustrious patriot now among the dead—to him was given the high privilege of standing amidst posterity, witnessing their unexampled prosperity, to which he had so largely contributed, and to hear his name daily associated by them with the benefactors of his kind. Thus fortunate and thus honored, his mind in the full enjoyment of its faculties, while sitting in his chair, without a pang or a groan, on the 28th of June, sunk he to eternal rest. All that was mortal of this great and good man sleeps with his fathers, while his disembodied spirit, we humbly but confidently believe, is in the bosom of his God. In the fulness of our hearts we may well exclaim, our Elisha is gone! Did he let fall his mantle? on whom? where is Elisha? Echo answers, where?

People of America, behold your Madison!—Though delineated by a feeble hand, such are the strong and beautiful features of the original. It is hoped this attempt to portray them has not entirely failed.

Let us conclude by supplicating the Great Disposer of events to sanctify this marvellous model of human purity to the most beneficent ends; that it may stand forever as pole-star of the moral and political world, that the rising youth may resort to it, from whence to draw the eternal oracles of virtue, patriotism and wisdom; that statesmen may keep his example forever before their eyes, and learn thence how contemptible are distinctions won by fraud or violence, when compared with the inappreciable fame of Madison; especially that his successors in that high office, to which so much of the happiness of unborn millions is confided, may, like him, in every of their acts, take the constitution as their guide, their country, and nothing but their country, for their end; and, above all, that the American people may be made sensible that the sacred trust committed to them can be preserved only by following in his footsteps; that, like him, they may get knowledge and practise virtue; and thus calling down the blessing of heaven, our union, our constitution and our liberties may endure forever.

FRANCE AND SWITZERLAND.

The French papers have for the last two or three months, adverted frequently and at some length to difficulties existing between France and the Swiss canton of Berne, but hitherto we have not been able to find any satisfactory explanation of the cause. It was understood to have some relation to parties under political suspicion, living in Switzerland, whose expulsion was desired by France, but farther than this we have hitherto been unable to make discovery. Among our Paris journals received by the Independence, we have found documents, however, which disclose the origin of the trouble; an origin paltry enough, to become the subject of such grave controversy between two enlightened nations.

It seems that an Italian, named Augustus Conseil, was employed by the police of Paris to act as a spy upon certain political refugees, living in Switzerland, and to this end was furnished, immediately after the attempt of Alibaud, with money, a passport under the assumed name of Napoleon Cheli, and instructions to repair to Berne, where he was directed to ingratiate himself with the political refugees, by pretending to have been concerned in the attempts of Alibaud and Fieschi. To facilitate his operations, he was told that instructions would be forwarded to the duke de Montebello, the French ambassador in Switzerland, to demand from the Swiss vorort the expulsion of Augustus Conseil as a conspirator with Fieschi, leaving it to the discretion of Conseil to bring himself within the cognizance of the Swiss authorities, if necessary for the successful accomplishment of his mission. Of course the identity of Napoleon Cheli with Augustus Conseil would not be discovered, unless that personage should himself think proper to reveal it in the prosecution of his espionage.

Unluckily, however, by some unaccountable blunder, it seems that the French police neglected to apprise the duke de Montebello of this arrangement; he was instructed, indeed, to demand the expulsion of Augustus Conseil, and informed that Conseil and Cheli were one and the same individual, per passport—but he was not advised that this latter fact was only to be communicated to the Swiss authorities in case of necessity, and under the direction of Conseil himself. Consequently, the duke, on the 19th of July, 1836, addressed a note to the council of state of the republic of Berne, informing them that Conseil, under the name of Cheli, had procured a passport for Switzerland, that he was implicated in the affair of Fieschi, and professed the most dangerous revolutionary opinions, and demanding his immediate arrest and expulsion from the limits of the confederacy. It should be observed that Conseil was expressly instructed, before he left Paris, not to present himself at the embassy in Switzerland.

The demand of the duke de Montebello was communicated to the several cantons on the 23d of July, and on the 6th of August the department of justice and police of the republic of Berne gave orders to the direction of the central police, in case of the arrest of Conseil to make the fact instantly known to the French ambassador, in order that he might take measures for his removal.

On the 10th of August the prefect of Nidau was informed that a suspicious character was among the arrivals at the principal inn; the passports of the strangers, three in number, were accordingly examined, and disclosed the names of Berthola and Migliari, Italians, and of "Francis Hermann, native of Strasbourg, merchant, travelling in Switzerland on affairs of commerce;" this last bearing the attestation of the French embassy, dated November 15th, 1835, and signed "le charge d'affaires de France, G. de Belleval." The date of this paper is important, as will hereafter appear.

On examining the papers of the pretended Hermann, two other passports were found; one dated at Ancona, April 22, 1834, bearing the name of Augustus Cheli Conseil, the other dated at Besangon, August 4, 1836, and bearing the name of Corelli.

Conseil, alias Corelli, alias Hermann, was arrested in compliance with the requisition of the duke de Montebello, and immediately declared that he was in the service of the French police. A preliminary investigation took place, and on the 20th of August an act of accusation, or, as we should call it, indictment was found against him, on the charge of using false passports. It appeared from his own declaration that in pursuance of his instructions, he had, on the 10th of July, applied to the police of Berne for a permit of residence, representing himself by the name of Conseil, as a political refugee from France, implicated in the affairs of Fieschi and Alibaud, that the permit had been denied him, and he had been ordered to leave Berne, but that he had nevertheless, remained until the 22d of July: that he had contrived to make acquaintance with certain Italians, political refugees, and had endeavored to persuade two of them, count Berthola, and a Venitian named Mataxa, to join the "societe de Familles," then recently founded at Paris, as an auxiliary to that of "The Rights of Man"—thus exceeding his legitimate province of spy, and entering upon that of an inciter to political offences for the purpose of informing.

It also appeared that dreading the researches of the police in Berne, he left that place on the 22d of July, and went to Besangon, where he arrived on the 24th, and immediately wrote to Paris for instructions. On receiving them he went to the prefecture, where the passport bearing the name of Corelli was given him, with orders to return to Berne, and apply for farther instructions to the French embassy. On the 6th of August he arrived at Berne, and on the evening of that day applied at the embassy for instructions. The moment he presented himself to the duke de Montebello the latter told him of the demand that had been made for his arrest and expulsion, on the 19th of July—of the awkward position in which all parties were placed by this contretemps—and of the necessity for his immediate departure from Berne; to which end, the duke said, he would give him a passport under another name, with which he must endeavor to make his escape from the researches of the Swiss police. For this purpose he was directed to come again to the embassy on the next evening.

In the meantime the four Italians with whom Conseil had formed an acquaintance, had become suspicious of his real character, and devised a plan to ascertain the truth. They invited him to breakfast with them at a cabaret but little frequented, on the morning of the 7th, locked the door of the room, declared their suspicions, and demanded the key of his trunk. It was given to them and his papers seized, by which the fact of his being a spy was abundantly established.

Upon this, or rather while one of the four was gone to examine the trunk, Conseil, who seems to have united the qualities of fool and knave, made a full confession to the Italians, not only of his connexion with the French police, but also of the embarrassment into which his presence at Berne had thrown the duke de Montebello, and the plan devised by the latter to get out of it, and agreed that two of them, Berthola and Migliari should go with him to the embassy in the evening, and wait at the door until his business with the duke was finished—they were determined not to lose sight of him, if they could help it.

At 9 o'clock, P. M. Conseil went to the embassy, and saw M. de Belleval, the duke's secretary, who, after some conversation, prepared and gave him the passport bearing the name of Francis Hermann, and falsely dated November 15, 1835, although in fact made out on the 7th of August, 1836. With this passport M. de Belleval also gave him money, and a list of eight persons in six different Swiss towns, whom he was especially instructed to watch over, they being political refugees.

From the hotel of the embassy Conseil proceeded at once to join the Italians, and communicated to them, in full, the instructions he had just received, showed them the money de Belleval had given him, and solemnly pledged himself never to betray either of the eight whom he had been specially directed to surveiller. Notwithstanding this promise, however, the Italians resolved to "expose the true character of Conseil, and it was through information communicated by one of them, (Migliari), that Conseil was arrested.

Such, very considerably abbreviated, is the history of this affair, given officially, by the committee to which the matter was referred for investigation and report by the Swiss diet; with this statement the committee gave the evidence on which they assume the acts to be established, and which certainly appears conclusive, but as it would occupy more than another column, we have omitted it.

The Swiss vorort of course is highly indignant at the deceptive course pursued by the French ambassador, in order to make the police and government of the cantons auxiliaries of the French police in a system of espionage; and out of this feeling, together with the consequent refusal of the Swiss authorities to act against political refugees at the requisition of the French ambassador, their determination to punish Conseil for his violation of the police regulations of Switzerland, (travelling with false passports, &c.) and their loud complaints of the bad faith and misconduct of the duke and his secretary M. de Belleval, have grown the disputes, negotiations, criminations and troubles which have figured so largely among the political occurrences of the times. FOREIGN CHRONICLE.

A sale of property for church dues was lately attempted near Birmingham, England, but placards having been stuck up previously, calling upon the friends of liberty to attend and see justice done but not to bid, the church wardens and auctioneers were obliged to postpone the sale indefinitely, and on retreating were pelted with stones and jostled in the most rude manner. So much for persons being required to pay for a worship which they do not attend.

There is a hill in the neighborhood of Tre Mador Carnarvon, Wales, called Moelly-guest which, on one side presents a profile likeness of the duke of Wellington. The height of the hill is 1,000 feet, and the angle at which the elevation rises is such as to produce the appearance of a person lying on his back with his head resting on a pillow. There is a similar hill in New Hampshire, called the Profile mountain, one of the White mountains, and one at Calton hill, near Edinburgh, where a rocky precipice, viewed from the south of Holyrood palace, presents a likeness of the hero of Trafalgar, a monument to whose memory stands not far above, on the crown of the hill.

M. Biot. The learned and scientific M. Biot has been delivering some very remarkable lectures at the college de France. He has proved, that by means of polarized rays, it is possible to ascertain the chemical action which takes place between bodies held in solution, in various liquids—an action which—has not yet been discovered by less delicate means. This is a new branch of science, created as it were by this great natural philosopher, from which the most important and curious results may be expected.

The most brilliant display of gas in Europe will be that of the Greenwich railway to London bridge.—This track, which it will be recollected, runs on high arches over the street, is shortly to be lighted.

A project is on foot to supply London with sea water for bathing and other purposes. A plan for this purpose has been submitted to the directors of the Thames Haven Dock company, according to which pipes are to be laid along their rail way, which being nearly level, will require but a small force to transmit a sufficient quantity of water to supply the demands of the metropolis.

Slave ships captured. The British sloop of war Versal, arrived at Halifax on the 20th ult. with a Portuguese brig, called the Foriex, as a prize, which had on board 484 slaves. The sloop of war had previously captured two vessels, with 684 slaves on board.

A goodly sized head. Dr. Klippstein, a celebrated German geologist has lately discovered near Alzei, a little town of the Rhine Hesse, on digging twenty-eight feet beneath the soil, a head of the huge antediluvian animal called the "dinotherium giganteum," in perfect preservation. The head was six feet long and three and a half feet broad! A shoulder bone was found near it, supposed to have belonged to the same animal.

The increase in the annual amount of British exports in eleven years is said to have been twenty-one millions four hundred and seventy-seven thousand and fifteen pounds sterling. The time selected for the comparison is 1831 as contrasted with the year 1819.

The city of Edinburgh is bankrupt. It is indebted the national exchequer and to private creditors to the amount of between £600,000 and £700,000.

The damage done by a recent hail storm in the vicinity of Salisbury, England, is estimated, according to the claims of the sufferers themselves, to be £7,243, or $35,000.

In the accounts from France it is stated that the falling off, of the wheat crops the present year has not been equalled in that country since 1815.

Teas. The delivery of teas during a single week in London, exceeded 500,000 chests.

It appears that the extent of Texas and the neighboring provinces comprises nine hundred and one thousand square miles, or one hundred and ninety-two millions two hundred and forty thousand English acres; of this amount one hundred and sixty-five square miles, or one hundred and four millions five hundred and sixty thousand English acres belong to Texas, (proper).

Murder of priests. An old priest, who lately arrived in England, having made his escape from Catalonia, Spain, gives a most horrible picture of the present condition of that unhappy country. He states that seven parochial priests had been murdered at Matiomengo.

The French government have determined upon using the iron in preference to the brass cannon.

Numerous family. An Irish paper mentions a man residing in the Claddah, Galway, who had his thirty-eight child baptised on the 5th September.

A friend of Joseph Bonaparte has contradicted (very indignantly and by authority) the report that the ex-king had received permission to visit Corsica; and says that he never has applied and never will apply for such permission.

The Paris papers announce that the king will soon pardon and set at liberty more than 60 persons confined for political offences. Among them will be perhaps the prisoners at Ham.

A clock maker of Boulogne has successfully applied the elastic force of compressed air, to the propelling of clock machinery.

An antique—a bull's head—equisitely carved in some unknown metal, supposed to be the famous Corinthian brass of the Romans, the composition of which has been lost for many ages, was dug up, lately, in Burgundy.

The health of M. Martin du Nord, minister of commerce, is completely re-established.

There is a clerk in the French war department, who, in various battles, has received no less than 75 wounds, and has been twice trepanned for fractures of the skull. His name, oddly enough, is Laguerre—in English, War.

Sixty-six persons committed suicide in Paris, during the month of September.

At a dinner given by count Mole, on the 6th of October, count Pozzo di Borgo and sir Robert Peel were guests. The dinner was given in honor of the king's birth-day. On that day he was 63 years old.

Five vessels of war have sailed from Toulon for various ports in Spain and Portugal, to protect the French consuls, and afford assistance or a place of refuge to French residents, in case of trouble growing out of the revolution.

The banking interest of Madrid has advanced about £300,000 to the government on the security of the forced loan.

Orchestral instruments. To give a proper effect to full symphonies or overtures, it requires at least thirty violins, eight violas, eight violoncellos, six double-basses, two flutes (or flute and piccolo), two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, bass horn or serpent, a pair of kettle drums and sometimes a side drum and triangles, making a total of about seventy instruments; we believe that this is about the strength of the Philharmonic band.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

According to the National Gazette, ninety resignations of officers have taken place in the army since the 1st of July last.

The circumstances as detailed in a Memphis (Tenn.) paper attending a cesarian operation lately performed near that city, are of an affecting character. The mother was a young and lovely woman, who had been married not quite a year—her husband was arrested on a charge of forgery and confined in the county jail, three miles from the place of their residence—as soon as the harrowing fact was communicated to her, she instantly left home for the prison in a gig, drawn by an almost untamed colt, from which she was flung, and instantly killed. Surgical aid was fortunately near at hand, and from the womb of the young, and ill-fated mother, was extracted a healthy female infant.

The mail going north, says the Richmond Compiler, is about to be expedited. It will arrive at that city from the south at half past 3, A. M. by this arrangement passengers will reach Washington at half past 4 o'clock, P. M. where the cars for Baltimore can be taken, they arrive at the latter city about 8 in the evening, thus making the trip from Richmond to Baltimore through in a day. Two daily lines are now in successful operation between Richmond and Washington.

An assessment lately made on the real and personal property in the city of New York shows a grand total of assessable means of $327,988,780, of which the portion of real estate is $253,901,191, and of personal $74,787,589, being an increase of $20,183,824 over the assessments of 1832 and 1833.

Captain Bradshaw, of the ship Lagoden, has brought to Salem a specimen of pumice stone, probably thrown out by a volcanic eruption under the water near the coast of California. He sailed for about 20 miles through a space where the top of the water was thickly covered with these stones.

Twenty-five cent spurious Mexican pieces are now in circulation in New Orleans. The engraving is bad, and the counterfeit can easily be detected. It appears that a number of those pieces were manufactured at the north, of pure brass, and shipped to Mexico, there to be finished off with a little quicksilver.

At a late board of the assistant aldermen of the city of New York a resolution was adopted to apply to the general government for the establishment in that city of a branch of the United States mint, and that their delegates in congress use their efforts to promote the object.

The Boston lyceum on Tuesday evening the 1st inst. commenced its fall campaign, with an audience of 2,500 persons, and an introductory address by the hon. Daniel Webster. This performance was a masterly essay on the progress of popular knowledge, philosophical, profound and every way worthy of the orator; but at the same time happily adapted to the audience and the occasion which called him out.

It is stated that the damage to vessels in and off the harbor of Chicago, during the late gale, is estimated at from $150,000 to $200,000. This is ascribed to the supineness of the government in not making the necessary appropriations for the improvement of harbors on Lake Michigan at a seasonable time.

Early pledges. A German in Cecil county, Md. aged sixty-three, but who rejoices in a wife aged seventy, has lately been presented by his spouse with a pair of twins!

A regulation has been recently adopted by the university of N. Carolina by which any native of the state of suitable talents and moral conduct, may, if too indigent to defray college expenses, be admitted, at the discretion of the faculty, to the recitations of the classes free of tuition fees; and also be admitted to such rooms of the college as may not necessarily be occupied by those students who pay.

Rain and snow. A storm of rain began at Boston on Wednesday evening the 4th inst. accompanied with a pretty strong easterly wind. Yesterday morning it began to snow, and continued till afternoon. At one time the flakes were "thick and heavy," but most of it melted in the course of the day.

Powder mill blown up. On Friday afternoon of last week, the powder mill in Southwick, Mass. belonging to Messrs. Tyron & Co. was blown up so as to be a complete wreck. The laborers narrowly escaped, having left the mill only three or four minutes before. Loss estimated at about $8,000.

The legislature of Arkansas has fixed the salaries of the government officers as follows, viz.—salary of governor, 2,000; secretary of state, $700, auditor, $700; treasurer, 600; prosecuting attorney, $300; judges of the supreme court, $1,800; circuit judges, $1,200.

The frigate Macedonian having been reconstructed was launched on the 1st inst. from the Gosport navy yard, amid the firing of cannon from the Java frigate, and the cheers of a vast concourse of spectators.

The Cleveland (Ohio) Advertiser of the 28th ult. says—"About two o'clock this morning, another attempt was made to blow up the bridge connecting this and Ohio city, which we regret to say, was attended with more success than the former one. It seems that a hole had been made in the solid stone abutment wall, on the Ohio city side, in which was placed a keg of powder, which exploded, throwing a portion of the wall into the river; some of the stones forcing their way up through the plank flooring of the bridge.—The frame work of the bridge is not materially injured, and it is still in a passable state. The shock was so violent as to awaken all those residing near the bridge. Three men were seen by a resident of Ohio city to run past his house, soon after the explosion, from the bridge toward the centre of the city, but there was not light enough to identify them."

For several days previous to the 4th instant, a destructive fire has been raging in the mountains west of Haverstraw, N. Y. Great damage has been done to the wood, timber and fences, and in some instances barns and dwellings have been destroyed.

The People's bank at Bangor has been selected by the secretary of the treasury as a bank of deposit.

A farmer in the neighborhood of Springfield, Ohio, recently excavated thirteen human skeletons, while digging a cellar on the edge of a small prairie. They were probably the remains of Indian "braves," who have fallen in battle.

An ingenious mechanic of Albany has invented what he calls a "milkometer," to test the quality of milk, and tell how great a proportion of chalk, water or lime, it contains. Such an instrument is very much needed.

Coal at home. It is said that excavations have been made in the vicinity of Newburgh, for the purpose of discovering coal, with success. Specimens have been obtained which warrant the belief that a full supply of anthracite of the best quality will be found upon the borders of the Hudson.

The work is to be resumed with vigor by a mining company possessing a large capital.

From a record of the thermometer during a week in October last, the editor of the New York American is led to expect a mild winter this year. It is to be hoped that his anticipations will be realized, but thus far, there has been with us no good reason to form similar opinions. Our autumns usually are much less various in their temperature, and on the whole warmer than the present. Our impressions are not derived from the same accurate sources as those of the New York American, and may be erroneous.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶The hon. Martin Van Buren, vice president of the United States, arrived in Baltimore, on his way to the seat of government, on Thursday last. Thomas W. Veazey, governor of Maryland, arrived in Baltimore on the same day.

¶It will be seen by page 185 that Mr. Linthicum, of Anne Arundel, another of the recusants, has gone into the college, making, in all, twenty-three members who have qualified. It is probable that other members will qualify to-day, and a senate be chosen forthwith.

The following notice from the Marlboro' (Prince George's) Gazette, shows the temper with which the governor's proclamation has been responded to in that section of the state.

Pleasant Prospect, Nov. 14th, 1836.

Fellow soldiers: The governor of Maryland in his proclamation of the 8th inst. (after calling upon the civil officers, "calls also upon the military officers and citizens to hold themselves in readiness," &c). Under this clause, I, as major of the 2d cavalry district, call upon you, as good and true lovers of your country, to meet at the court house in Upper Marlboro' on Saturday next, the 19th inst. at 11 o'clock, A. M. to organize as volunteers and join with me and offer our services to the executive in case of necessity, in the present critical period of our beloved state.

JOHN CONTEE, major of cavalry.

GEN. GAINES' LETTER to a committee of the citizens of Mobile, who invited him to partake of a public dinner, is inserted in the present sheet. In it he indignantly repels the charges which have been recently preferred against him, and condemns the disposition which has been manifested to prejudice his case, &c.

M. PAGEOT, charge d'affaires from France to the United States, with his family, accompanied by M. SALIGNY and M. MONTHOLON, who reached New York a few days ago in the packet ship Sylvie de Grasse, has arrived in Washington.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. The presidential election has terminated in all the states, with the exception of South Carolina, which votes by the legislature—we have not, however, received the official returns from a single state, and must defer our detailed exhibit of the vote in each, until they are received. The following will suffice for the present.

From Maine we have but few returns. There is no doubt but that the state has gone for the Van Buren ticket by a large majority.

New Hampshire has gone for the Van Buren ticket by a small vote.

In Massachusetts 109 towns had been heard from which gave 23,733 votes for Everett, (W.) and 21,220 for Morton, (V. B.)

Congressional election. In the Suffolk district, Richard Fletcher is elected by 4,622 votes. The opposing candidate, Amasa Walker, had 2,895 votes and there were 13 scattering.

In the 2d district, consisting of the south part of Essex county, Stephen C. Phillips is re-elected by a majority of 226 votes.

In the 3d district, consisting of the north part of Essex county and a part of Middlesex, Cabal Cushing is undoubtedly re-elected.

In the 4th or Middlesex district, Mr. Hoar has probably lost his election, and Mr. Parmenter, the Van Buren candidate, is elected in his place.

In the 8th district, Mr. Hastings, the whig candidate, is supposed to be elected by about 500 majority over Mr. A. H. Everett.

In Connecticut the Van Buren majority is stated at 620 and at 694. The vote for members of congress will not vary much from the above. The vote for the recent amendments to the constitution was nearly unanimous.

Vermont has gone for the whig ticket by a large vote.

New York. The last number of the Albany "Argus" received contains returns from all the counties in the state except three, which give a Van Buren majority of 26,471. The vote for the Van Buren candidates for governor and lieutenant governor, will be nearly equal to that received by the electoral ticket.

VOL. LI.—Sis. 12.

The "Argus" says that the house of assembly will consist of about 96 republican members and 32 whigs, and that republican candidates have been elected in six of the eight senatorial districts—in five of them by great majorities.

The following is given as the result of the congressional election as far as heard from.

1st district, Thomas B. Jackson; 2d do. Abraham Vanderveer; 3d do. C. C. Cambreleng, Ely Moore, Edward Curtis, Ogden Hoffman; 4th do. Gouverneur Kemble; 5th do. Obadiah Titus; 6th do. Nathaniel Jones; 7th do. John C. Brodhead; 8th do. Zadock Pratt, Robert McClellan; 9th do. Henry Vail; 10th do. Albert Gallup; 11th do. John I. De Graff; 12th do. Samuel Russell; 13th do. John Palmer; 14th do. James B. Spencer; 15th do. John Edwards; 16th do. Arphaxed Loomis; 17th do. Henry A. Foster, Abraham P. Grant, R. B. Miller, (24th congress); 18th do. Isaac H. Bronson; 19th do. John H. Prentiss; 20th do. Amasa J. Parker; 21st do. John C. Clark; 22d do. Andrew D. W. Bruyn, Hiram Gray; 23d do. William Taylor, Bennet Bicknell; 24th do. William H. Noble; 25th do. Samuel Birdsall; 26th do. Mark H. Sibley; 27th do. John T. Andrews; 28th do. Timothy Child; 29th do. William Patterson; 32d do. Millard Fillmore; 33d do. Charles F. Mitchell. The 30th and 31st districts not heard from. Whigs in italic.

The congressional election in the city of New York resulted as follows:

Whigs.	Van Buren.
Hoffman, 16,421	Cambreleng, 16,416
Curtis, 17,474	McKeon, 15,896
Wagner, 14,588	Moore, 16,617
Wheeler, 15,936	Lee, 16,157

Messrs. Hoffman, Curtis, (whigs), Moore and Cambreleng, (Van Buren), are elected. The present members of congress from New York city are all friends of Mr. Van Buren.

The New York Journal of Commerce says, the following persons are elected to the assembly from the city.

Whigs.	Van Buren.
J. I. Labagh,	Thomas Hertell,
George Zabriskie,	F. B. Cutting,
Henry Andrew,	C. P. Clinch,
Clinton Roosevelt,	Thomas W. Tucker,
Robert Townsend, jr.	Thomas G. Tallmadge,
Anson Wills.	J. M. Valentine.

There is one vacancy, which is to be supplied by a new election. It was occasioned by a tie between Mr. C. Paterson, (W.) and Mr. Stoneall, (V. B.) Relative to the disputed vote supposed to be for Thomas C. Paterson, there was a candidate named Thomas C. Pinckney, and as the vote was a written one and blotted, it could not be ascertained whether it was for Paterson or Pinckney.

The vote in the city for governor stood—Marcy 16,561; whig 16,340. Van Buren majority 1,116. James Buel 15,971. Marcy's majority, 590. On the electoral ticket, the average Van Buren vote was 17,456. Gullick, the whig candidate for register, was elected over the regularly nominated V. B. candidate by a large majority.

New Jersey has chosen Harrison electors by a majority stated at from 500 to 1,000.

In Pennsylvania from returns official, and from papers published in the respective counties, and given as official, it appears that Van Buren's majority is about 4,291. The state of parties in the convention is not yet satisfactorily ascertained—but neither party will have a majority of more than one vote.

Delaware. The State Journal of the 18th inst. says the majority of the Harrison electors in this state is precisely 583.

In Sussex, the majority is 587

In Kent 167

In New Castle. Van Buren majority 141

Harrison majority 583

Virginia. Returns from ninety-one counties and cities, composed in part of majorities only—give the following result. Whig 16,292, Van Buren 20,861.

North Carolina. The Raleigh "Register" and other papers place the Van Buren ticket about 1,200 ahead in fifteen counties, comprising some of the strongest Jackson counties in the state.

Georgia. Nineteen counties had been heard from which give—for the White ticket 8,154, Van Buren 6,106.

In Kentucky the returns show a considerable majority in favor of the whig ticket.

In Ohio the whig majority is stated at from 5 to 7,000.

Indiana. The returns from this state are very imperfect, but both parties consider them favorable.

GEORGIA. The legislature of Georgia assembled at Milledgeville on the 7th inst. Robert M. Echols was elected president, and J. T. Lamar secretary of the senate; and Joseph Day speaker, and Joseph Sturges clerk of the house of representatives. On the 8th instant the governor delivered his annual message, which contains an interesting narrative of the Creek war, and shall have a place in the next "REGISTER."

THE EXPRESS MAIL commenced running on the 15th inst. The offices at which the express mail will be opened are New York, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore, Washington, Alexandria, Fredericksburg, Richmond, Petersburg, Raleigh, Fayetteville, Columbia, Augusta, Milledgeville, Macon, Columbus, Montgomery, Mobile and New Orleans. The letters intended for this mail must be marked "express mail," and they, including public despatches, will be charged triple postage. No free letters or letters containing money, or letters (not public despatches) exceeding half an ounce in weight, or letters for Philadelphia, will be sent by the express mail.

Slips from newspapers, not to exceed two columns of the paper, in each case, may be sent free from one newspaper publisher to another, in exchange.

From the Globe of Thursday.

Express mail. This mail commenced running on Tuesday last. It left Philadelphia at half past two A. M. and reached Baltimore fifteen minutes before ten, being two hours and three quarters less than contract time.

It left Baltimore at one P. M. and arrived in Washington at twenty-five minutes past four, being thirty-five minutes less than contract time.

It arrived from Fredericksburg, Va. at five minutes before two P. M. and left for the south at half after four P. M.

Joseph Mahan is the contractor between Philadelphia and Baltimore, and Messrs. Hammit, Hutchins, Weart and Steele, from Baltimore to Fredericksburg, Va. The promptness of these gentlemen in making their arrangements, and the spirit with which they have commenced the service, argue well for the success of the enterprise, and the advancement of their own reputation. It is hoped that a few days will put it in our power to speak with equal commendation of all the contractors on the line.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO. The New York papers announce that Mr. Gorostiza has embarked, with all his legislation, for Mexico.

The New York Courier des Etats Unis, of Saturday last states that, having in vain insisted upon the withdrawal of the United States troops from the territory of Mexico, Mr. Gorostiza had no alternative left.

The Courier promises, in its next number, a copy of the last despatch of Mr. Gorostiza, and, in the mean time, publishes this important and decisive extract:

"The note of Mr. Dickens left the undersigned no hope. The explanations given to him in the name of the president convinced him, moreover, of how little Mexico has to expect from the United States, since her most sacred rights and dearest interests are sacrificed to the shadow of an imaginary danger. Mexico is insulted and wronged out of pure precaution.

"Under such discouraging circumstances, the undersigned would be wanting in his duty, if, as representative of Mexico, he failed to use the only means left him to express at least how much he is wounded by the wrongs done to his country by the United States; he therefore declares, upon his own responsibility, that, from this moment, he considers his mission at an end."

VACANCIES IN CONGRESS. In Pennsylvania James Black, of Perry county, has been elected to congress, from the thirteenth district, in place of Jesse Miller, appointed first auditor. In Connecticut gen. Orris Holt, (V. B.) has been elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Andrew T. Judson, (V. B.) Horace Everett has been re-elected to congress, from the state of Vermont, and F. O. J. Smith from Maine. The two latter failed at the first election, in consequence of not having a majority of the whole number of votes.

JUDGE WHITE AND A NATIONAL BANK. The following letter was addressed by judge White to col. A. A. Kincannon of Lincoln county, Tenn. in answer to a letter from him requesting the judge's opinion respecting the power of congress to charter a national bank.

Jackson, Sept. 19, 1836.

Dear sir: Your letter dated the 14th instant was handed to me on the evening of the 15th, when on my journey to this place, and I had no convenient opportunity of answering it till my arrival here.

I conceive the question of rechartering the late bank of the United States now at an end. I was opposed to the act granting the charter in the year 1816, when the bill was before congress, and so wrote to Mr. Blount, the then representative in congress from my district. I have been uniformly opposed to it ever since, and have repeatedly expressed the opinion that congress had no power to charter a bank to do business within the limits of the states, and if such power did exist it would be impolitic to exercise it.

The reasons for these opinions I have on more than one occasion publicly assigned, and will now only add that they have not undergone any change.

A national bank, founded on the public funds, has been sometimes spoken of, and may yet be in contemplation. To such an institution I am equally opposed. Indeed were such an institution created, and put under the control of the treasury department, it would, in my opinion, put the liberty of the country entirely at the discretion of the executive of the United States, to which I could never consent.

I flatter myself that if any have entertained doubts as to my opinion at present, on the subject of the bank or a bank, the above statement will remove them. Very respectfully, your obdt. serv't.

HUGH L. WHITE.

Col. A. A. Kincannon.

THE MONEY MARKET. The Boston Atlas of Monday last says:—We are authorised to state, which we do with the greatest satisfaction, that the banks of this city have united in an arrangement by which they will use their best efforts to afford all the relief in their power to the mercantile community under the existing severe pressure in the money market. We understand that they have agreed to discount to an amount which cannot fail to effect this important and highly desirable object.

NAVAL. The changes, notices, &c. as ascertained at the navy department, during the month of July, 1836, are as follows: The vessels attached to the Mediterranean station are, the frigates Constitution, Potomac and United States, the sloop John Adams, and the schooner Shark. To the West India station, the frigate Constellation, the sloop Vandalia, St. Louis, Warren, Concord, Boston and Natchez. To the coast of Brazil, the sloop Erie. To the Pacific, the frigate Brandywine and schooner Boxer. The vessels cruising in the East Indies, are the sloop Peacock and the schooner Enterprise.

The Constitution was at Gibraltar the 20th April, at Mahon 6th May, and sailed from Toulon for Naples on the 1st of June. The Potomac, the John Adams, and the Shark, also sailed from Toulon for Naples on the 1st of June. The United States was spoken on the 22d June, lat. 37, 47, N. long. 46, W. She sailed from New York for the Mediterranean on the 12th of June. The Constellation, commodore Dallas, and the St. Louis, captain Rousseau, were at Pensacola on the 16th July. The Concord was at Tampa Bay, on the 16th July. The Warren sailed from Pensacola on the 24th of June for Tampico and Vera Cruz. The Grampus sailed from Pensacola on the 24th of June for Tampico and Vera Cruz. The Vandalia was, at the last accounts, cruising on the coast of Hayti and Venezuela. The Boston sailed from Boston on the 10th July, and the Natchez will sail from this port for the West Indies in a few days. The Erie was at Rio on the 24th April, and was about to sail for Buenos Ayres, via St. Catharines and Montevideo. The Ontario arrived at New York on the 24th June, from Rio, whence she sailed on the 22d of April. The Brandywine arrived at Valparaiso on the 19th of March. She was still at Valparaiso on the 6th of April. The Vincennes arrived at Norfolk on the 6th of June. The Porpoise is about to proceed from Boston on special service for the examination of the southern ports of the United States. The Peacock and the Enterprise, were at Batavia Roads on the 15th of February, 1836.

The following notice in reference to the mails is published in the Globe:

"The mails for the Mediterranean can be forwarded by a store ship, (Constellation) to sail from Norfolk for Port Mahon about the 15th August.

For the Pacific, by the packet, as usual, on the 10th of August, from New York, via Kingston, Jamaica.

Navy department, July 30, 1836.

The United States frigate Potomac was spoken on the 1st of October in the straits of Gibraltar, bound home by the way of Africa and the West Indies—officers and crew all well.

Captain Whitney of the bark Gaspar, at Boston, from Canton, June 1, reports at Macao, United States schooner Boxer, captain very sick.

The United States ship Peacock, and U. States schooner Enterprise, arrived at Canton on the 27th of May, and was expected to sail about the 1st of July on a cruise. Died, on board the United States ship Peacock, February 22, 1836, William Lewis, (black), seaman; March 1, Charles Fisher, (black), seaman; April 10, Daniel K. Thomas, seaman; April 12, Sam. Waggoner, marine; May 1, Henry Mount, marine. The sickness prevailing on board the ship is dysentery.

The United States ship Warren arrived at Norfolk on Wednesday the 9th instant, after a two years cruise on the West India station—officers and crew all well.

DEATH OF LIEUT. CAMPBELL. Intelligence has been received by the Horatio at N. York from Canton, of the decease of lieut. Archibald S. Campbell, commander of the United States schooner Enterprise, who died at Macao, June 3d, and also of the demise of Mr. Roberts, United States commercial agent, who died on the 11th of June.

THE WINNEBAGOES. The Galena Advertiser of the 22d ultimo, states that governor Dodge, the commissioner for that purpose, had failed in his negotiation with the Winnebago Indians, for a further cession of their lands to the United States. The same paper says:

"We further learn that on Monday evening last, Mr. Paquette, long and favorably known as an Indian trader and interpreter, was shot by a son of Whirling Thunder, a prominent chief of the tribe."

The Belmont Journal gives the following account of the death of Mr. P. from an eye-witness. "Some of the Indians instigated, it was said, by a family of half breeds, named Greenough, propagated a report that Mr. P. had acted treacherously in his capacity of interpreter. Indignant at having his correctness questioned, the deceased pursued several of the family above alluded to, all of whom fled before him, until he was some considerable distance from the place where the treaty was being held. While returning from the fruitless pursuit, his murderer emerged from a copse of wood, and ordering him to stand, avowed his intention of shooting him. The deceased deliberately bared his bosom, and remarking that he feared not to die, bade him fire. The ball of the Indian passed through his heart, and he almost instantly expired. The author of the deed, with stoical indifference, expressed a perfect willingness to expiate his offence with his own life. Mr. Paquette, we are informed, was a man of noble and generous qualities, and had scarcely an enemy in the world. He was in our service during the Black Hawk war, and distinguished himself by his cool and collected courage in every emergency."

ATTEMPTED REVOLUTION IN CHILI. By an arrival at Baltimore from Valparaiso, we learn that ex-general Freise, formerly president of Chili, fitted out an expedition at Callao, composed of the ship Montaguada and the war brig General Orbegoso, manned chiefly by deserters and disappointed Chilians, amounting in all to about 80 men, and on the 7th of July sailed for the island of Chiloe, in the south part of Chili, for the purpose of effecting a revolution against the existing government. It was Freise's intention to touch at the island of Juan Fernandez, and there release and take into his service the convicts placed there by the Chilean government—but on their passage up, the crew of the ship Montaguada rose on their officers and confined them in irons to the deck, and brought the ship into Valparaiso on the 5th or 6th of Aug.

and gave her up, with the officers on board, to the Chilean government.

This information caused great alarm at Valparaiso and St. Jago; all business was at end, and a revolution expected by many. The Chilean government took very strong and energetic measures to counteract Freise. An embargo was laid on all the ports in the north of Chili on the 30th July, which lasted until the 20th Aug. at Valparaiso, but was still kept on at the other ports. Gun boats were fitted out for the protection of Valparaiso harbor, and martial law proclaimed. Troops were immediately despatched south, and all the naval force put in requisition and despatched in pursuit of Freise, who at the last advices had made good his landing at Chiloe.

Business had begun to resume its usual activity after the embargo was raised and tranquillity was restored at Valparaiso. It was generally believed in Valparaiso, and also by the Chilean government, that the government of Peru had secretly assisted Freise in this expedition against Chili, and it was thought by many that there would be a war between Chili and Peru. A great many vessels were detained at Valparaiso during the embargo.

THE NIGHT DEFENDED. The New York Star publishes the following communication from capt. Brown, of the brig Barbara, recently arrived at that port from Malaga:

While the brig John L. Hudgens, captain Turby of Philadelphia, was lying in the port of Malaga in September last, one of her crew deserted and went on board the English man-of-war brig Jasseur, capt. Hackett, also lying in the same port. The man, returning for his clothes, was detained on board the brig from which he had deserted, by the mate, the master being on shore. A boat from the Jasseur, with a midshipman, was sent for the man; but the mate refused to give him up. Immediately another boat with 8 or 10 men under charge of a lieutenant, was despatched, when he was seized by force, and, together with his clothes taken on board the English vessel. The mate entered a complaint to our consul, George P. Barrell, esq. who promptly sent him, with his vice consul, in charge of a note to the commanding officer, on board the man-of-war. No attention whatever was paid to either of these gentlemen, or the note, and although a request was made to see the first lieutenant, who was below, he would not come on deck, and they were suffered to remain nearly half an hour, when they returned on shore. Thus the affair remained during the day, and as the Jasseur was on the point of sailing, another note was sent to captain Hackett by the United States consul, which was not answered; but Mr. Barrell was informed by the first lieutenant that captain Hackett was undecided about giving up the man. Mr. Barrell then, as a dernier resort, despatched another note to captain Hackett, with orders for the bearer to wait for an answer, stating that unless the man was returned on board the American brig with all his clothes in a given time, he would despatch a messenger to Madrid, and lay the case before the American ambassador. No answer was given; but within the time specified, the man with his baggage was returned on board the vessel whence he had deserted, and the Jasseur left the port.

In consequence of a desire to manifest their "unqualified approbation of the energetic manner in which Mr. Barrell resented the insult offered the American flag, by the commander of the English brig-of-war," the American residents at Malaga, together with the masters of forty American vessels then in port, wrote him a letter of approbation, and invited him to dinner, which he, however, declined, assigning, as a leading motive, "a confident opinion that a public dinner given to him just at that moment might result in the ruin of the commander of the brig, and a full belief that the officer in question did the act in a moment of thoughtlessness, and not premeditated design, and that he deeply regretted it."

BRITISH REVENUE. London, Oct. 11. The official returns of the revenue for the quarter ended last night, show a considerable improvement in the receipts of the customs upon the year and quarter, as compared with the corresponding periods of 1835. The increase is £1,758,705 upon the year, and £999,790 upon the quarter. In the excise there is a decrease of £145,346 upon the quarter, but an increase of £606,976 upon the year. The joint increase under these two heads is therefore £2,365,681 upon the year. The produce of the stamps, too, has increased by £73,537 upon the quarter, and £291,215 upon the year; and the post office has proved more productive by £27,000 upon the quarter, and £90,000 upon the year. The assessed taxes have decreased £20,233 upon the quarter, and £63,290 upon the year.

In the miscellaneous taxes there has been a falling off of £10,273 upon the quarter, and £24,204 upon the year. The increase upon the whole year, as compared with the last, is £2,727,693, and upon the quarter £1,026,459. The amount of exchequer bills which will probably be wanted for the service of the current year is fixed at £3,335,071.

PARTIES IN AMERICA. The London Quarterly Review, for September, quotes the following language from a recent writer upon America:

"In the absence of great parties, the U. States abound with lesser controversies, and public opinion is divided into a thousand minute shades of difference upon questions of very little moment. The pains which are taken to create parties are inconceivable. In the United States there is no religious animosity, because all religion is respected and no sect is predominant; there is no jealousy of rank, because the people is every thing, and no one can contest its authority; lastly, there is no public misery to serve as a means of agitation, because the physical position of the country opens so wide a field to industry, that man is able to accomplish the most surprising undertakings with his native resources. . . . But since ambitious men find it difficult to eject a person from power upon the mere ground that his place is coveted by others, they are obliged to create parties; and in this disturbing process lies their chief talent. It is owing to this cause that the domestic controversies of the Americans appear to a stranger so puerile, and often totally incomprehensible. He knows not at first whether to pity the people who busy themselves with such arant trifles, or to envy the happiness which enables them to discuss such things seriously. But in process of time he discovers that they have all a definite object. One party labors, and labors in vain, to limit the popular authority; the other, with triumphant success, seeks to extend its influence."

WHALE FISHERY. Mr. Parmenter has published a directory for the town of New Bedford, Mass. and to give additional size and interest to his volume, he has made out a list of vessels sailing from different parts of the United States, in the whale fishery, in which are mentioned 158 ships and barks, 5 brigs and 3 schooners, belonging to the ports of New Bedford; 35 ships and barks belonging to Fairhaven; 2 barks and 2 brigs from Westport; 3 ships and barks and 5 brigs to Rochester; 9 ships and barks to Falmouth; 8 ships and 1 brig to Edgartown; 1 ship from Holmes Hole; 71 ships and 1 bark from Nantucket; 8 ships and 2 brigs from Fall river; 4 ships and barks from Plymouth; 1 brig and 1 schooner from Provincetown; 4 ships and barks from Dorchester; 5 ships from Lynn; 8 ships, 5 barks, 1 brig and 2 schooners from Salem; 4 ships from Newburyport; add to these 1 brig and 4 schooners from Nantucket, and we thence perceive, that from Massachusetts alone there are engaged in the whale fishery 321 ships and barks, 19 brigs and 10 schooners—in all, 350 sail.

From other ports in the United States, we have the following enumeration: from Portsmouth, N. H. 3 ships; from Portland, Me. 1 ship; from Newport, R. I. 11 ships and barks and 2 schooners; from Bristol, 16 ships, 2 brigs; from Warren, 15 ships, 2 brigs; from Providence, 2 ships; from Stonington, Conn. 9 ships; from New London, 33 ships and barks, 1 brig; from Bridgeport, 2 ships; from Mystic, 3; from Norwich, 1; from E. Haddam, 1 brig; from Newark, N. J. 2 ships; from Sagharbor, N. Y. 25 ships, 1 bark; from Greenport, 4 ships; from New York city, 2 ships, 4 barks, 1 brig; from Newburg, 3 ships; from Poughkeepsie, 4 ships, 1 bark; from Hudson, 9 ships, 1 bark—These, including one or two ships from Wilmington, Del. make 140 ships and barks, 7 brigs and 2 schooners. Grand total, from the United States, say 400 sail, averaging 300 tons each: aggregate tonnage, 120,000—number of seamen, about 12,000.

The list must be incomplete; as for example, one or two vessels are allowed to Wilmington, Del. whereas the Wilmington company has, we believe, four ships "on the seas." [Philad. U. S. Gaz.]

METEORS OF THE 12TH AND 13TH INSTANT. From the New York American. The annual recurrence of this phenomenon being a subject of much interest, and one in which observation from year to year can alone decide the question, the undersigned kept a careful watch on the night of Saturday and morning of Sunday last, and is gratified in being able to announce the reappearance of this phenomenon with considerable brilliancy.

During the evening but few meteors were observed, but from 8 o'clock until near dawn, successive flashes were observed in the east, supposed by some to be lightning. At 9 o'clock, a very beautiful auroral light was seen of a pinkish hue. This continued for a short time only, though a general luminous appearance in the north remained during the whole night.

About 2 o'clock in the morning, several meteors were seen to dart across the Great Bear, and from this time constant watch was kept until dawn.

From 2 till 3 o'clock 93 meteors were counted, some being small, but the greater number of great size and brilliancy, resembling a rocket both in the explosion and trail left behind them; their trails lasting in some instances for nearly two minutes.

With two or three exceptions the course of the meteors was divergent from a point in Leo, dec. 20° R. A. 150° nearly. The place of this point was fully confirmed during the night.

From 3 till 4 o'clock 150 meteors were counted, and 300 in all were enumerated; after this time we kept no account of the number, though many more appeared.

From the situation of the observer it is probable that more than half escaped notice.

Several were seen in the clear light of dawn; and Jupiter, Venus and Mars, all shining with great brilliancy, were alternately outshone by these transient rivals. The night was one of uncommon beauty and mildness, and the opportunity for observation remarkably fine. No doubt now exists in the mind of the observer as to the distinct and peculiar character of this phenomenon; for, though an attentive observer of such matters, he has never seen any thing bearing the slightest resemblance to this display, except on the night of November 12th and 13th, 1832, when he had the good fortune to observe the same appearance while at sea, off the harbor of Pernambuco, one year before the far famed "shower of stars" in 1833, generally supposed to be the first time of its appearance.

G. O. S.

The meteors. The "meteoric shower" was noticed this morning, but was far inferior to what has been described on former occasions. At half past three, there were a few light clouds in the south east, from which flashes of lightning were seen in rapid succession—the stars were brilliant, occasionally obscured, in part, by thin floating vapor. At eighteen minutes before four o'clock, a large meteor darted from the north; it was quite luminous, and in size apparently equal to one-half the full moon. This was succeeded by many smaller meteors, and twenty-three were counted by me, during an hour and a half; several were seen by other persons in the room, which escaped my notice. During this time, one was observed of great brilliancy, having a luminous train apparently a yard in length. The lightning continued the whole time, and there was considerable appearance of aurora borealis.

SOLIDIFIED AIR. At a late meeting of the academy of sciences, a chemist named Thilorier exhibited some carbonic acid gas, changed to the state of a solid substance. This experiment has been performed on a small scale already, but in this instance several pounds were produced. The agents employed to effect the result are cold and compression; the chemical energy thus developed may be judged by the fact, that half a pound of quicksilver placed in contact with the solidified gas, was frozen in a few seconds into a solid mass which required a heavy blow from a hammer to break it. M. Thilorier obtains this solid carbonic acid in an enormous cast iron cylinder, capable of resisting the pressure of sixty atmospheres. The degree of strength is of course needed to resist the tendency of the solidified gas to dissolve and pass again into the æriform state. By allowing a small quantity to escape through a minute aperture, it is even to diffuse itself in the form of a snowy vapour; this vapour being directed in a jet into a box of tin unites, and forms a mass which may be pressed together like common snow, and so transferred to a vessel of glass. In this form the gas was presented to the institute by M. Dulong, to whom M. Thilorier successively furnished several masses obtained by his apparatus in a laboratory adjoining the place of meeting. This must be a dangerous amusement.

The same learned body has had under examination a newly invented writing paper, the peculiarity of which consists in its sensibility to the action of chemical agents, so that any attempt to expunge or falsify the writing, would necessarily, discolour the paper and thus betray the design. In the course of the discussion it was mentioned that the same subject, the inalterability of manuscripts, had engaged the attention of the academy five years since. The plan then proposed was to use a fluid made by suspending the common Indian ink in acidulated water. This simple expedient, however, has never been adopted, principally because the ink thus obtained is less fluid, and not so well adapted to the employment of metallic pens as the article in common use. The ink, therefore, remaining the same, the question remains how to accomplish the object in view by a modification of the paper. For this purpose, besides the article above mentioned, it has been suggested to use a flagre paper in which are impressed, by means of a cylinder very fine lines, and delicate drawings, which disappear when any attempt is made to falsify the writing—some samples of which were submitted.

OUR CONSULS ABROAD. Among the objects well worthy the attention of congress, but which have been lost sight of, or rather have been borne down by the superior importance of the struggles between the advocates and opponents of prerogative power, during several years past, is the regulation of the duties and compensations of the consuls of the United States in foreign countries. The attention of our readers was invited to the subject some months ago, by a writer who understood it well.—The republication of the following notice, on the same subject, which appeared in the Baltimore Patriot, some time ago, may, it is thought, advantageously revive it in the minds of the legislators of our country. [Nat. Int.]

"American consuls in foreign countries. Some of our late travellers in Europe complain, as it appears, that the American consuls exact a fee for a certificate verifying passes, although these consuls receive no other compensation than such fees, and those relating to merchandise; and though it would be scarcely possible the officers of police should be able to verify the signature of the American minister at Washington, or of any other authorized officer, out of the place at which the passes may be presented. Much has been said of the great vexation caused by exhibiting passes at so many towns and places as are visited by our travellers, because they have not been accustomed to the practice at home, which is, however, the real cause why they are seldom molested or cheated in their journeys among a dense population of strangers, ready enough to inflict greater vexations than that complained of, if they were not subjected to such a measure of police. There is no doubt that a better plan would be, to pay our consuls, at least in all the principal seaports, competent salaries, and a smaller fee in other places; for, by the vexations alluded to, the man of science, or artist, who may have but a short time to travel, or little money to spare in procuring information abroad, may be compelled to stay at home, an imperfect judge. Another consequence of our present system is no less burdensome, and that is, the consuls of other nations in the United States, though they cannot exact fees of their own countrymen, being paid salaries by their own governments, take the same fee of us here which their countrymen pay to American consuls."

AN OLD CONSUL."

HORRIBLE ACCIDENT. On Monday week the store of Otis C. Bolster, esq. in Ramfoid, was blown up by a cask of powder being set on fire.—

Mr. Bolster had just been getting a stock of goods in his store, and among the articles was a cask of powder. His customers had been trying the powder, and had left some particles upon the top of the cask. Mr. Bolster's boy, nine years old; in order to amuse himself, and in the absence of his father, took a coal of fire, and thus set the particles in a blaze. Two other young lads were also in the store. The whole cask of powder immediately ignited. Half of the store was blown into the Androscoggin, and the other half into the street, the roof tumbling down in the middle. Mr. Bolster's boy was immediately killed. One of the other young lads had his arm broken, and the third was badly burnt. The goods in the store were greatly damaged. The accident will be very sincerely regretted, as Mr. Bolster is highly respected throughout the county of Oxford. [Portland Ado.]

THE RUSSIAN SOLDIER. The Russians when disciplined become excellent soldiers. They are locomotive machines, which may be moved in any direction at the will of the officers. The Russian soldier has no opinion of his own—his passive obedience and ability of suffering under protracted physical inconveniences, are almost unexampled. He conceives it to be his duty to obey his officers under any circumstances, regardless of peril, or even death. Many anecdotes might be related to illustrate the blind obedience of the Russian soldier.—The following is from a work entitled Resources of Russia:

"Peter the Great, at an interview with the kings of Denmark and Poland, hearing them boast of the superiority of their soldiers, instead of disputing the point with them, proposed an experiment, which was immediately assented to, and which was, to order a grenadier to jump out of a third floor window. The king of Denmark tried the experiment on one of his bravest and most loyal soldiers, who on his knees refused compliance. The king of Poland waived the trial altogether, conceiving it to be hopeless; when Peter ordered one of his soldiers, the least promising that could be picked out, to descend the window. The soldier merely crossed himself, touched his hat according to form, boldly marched to the window, and had already one of his legs out, when the emperor stopped him, and told him he was satisfied. The kings were astonished, and each made the soldier a present of 100 ducats, requesting Peter to promote him to the rank of officer. The Czar answered that he would do so to oblige them, but not to reward the soldier; for all his soldiers would do as much, and by rewarding them in the same way he would have no soldiers at all."

Sir Robert Wilson, in his "Campaigns in Poland," relates that on one occasion a detachment, being ordered by prince Potemkin to take possession of a particular post, was met on the way by another detachment in full retreat, and bringing the information that the post was already pre-occupied by a numerous enemy, and that to advance was certain death. "Prince Potemkin must look out for that," exclaimed the gallant band, and proceeded to destruction; for not a single man escaped.

NATIONAL TYPOGRAPHICAL CONVENTION. The Globe of the 9th inst. says:—"Agreeably to the notice previously given, the members from the respective societies assembled at the City Hall, in this city, on yesterday, at 10 o'clock. They proceeded to organize the convention, by the appointment of Mr. Wm. Holliday, of Baltimore, as president; J. L. Brown, of New York, as vice president; and Wm. W. Curran, as secretary."

CLEVELAND AND OHIO CITY. Serious disturbances have arisen in consequence of several attempts to destroy the Columbus street bridge, which connects the two places. On the 1st inst. an assault was made by a mob on the Ohio city side, who began cutting away the timbers. The sheriff and citizens of Cleveland interposed and prevented the total destruction of the bridge. During the affray the sheriff was knocked down by a club, after which fire arms were resorted to, and several wounded on both sides, one man dangerously.

GOVERNOR MARCY'S FARM. A correspondent of the Troy Whig says that seventy-one masted vessels, five steamboats and sixteen tow-boats were counted aground on the overslaugh, on Wednesday afternoon.

"The bar, or overslaugh, in the Hudson, a few miles below Albany, is called by the papers 'Marcy's farm,' from the circumstance of Mr. M. having, when he was in congress, opposed an appropriation for removing this impediment to the free navigation to Albany."

SLEEPING WITH THE AGED. It is said by Copland, in his Medical Dictionary, that children are apt to sustain a loss of vital power, by sleeping with the aged. The writer of the article to which I refer, at the commencement of his remarks on this point, relates the following anecdote, and adds that he has met with several similar cases:

"I was a few years since consulted about a pale, sickly and thin boy, of about five or six years of age. He appeared to have no special ailment, but there was a slow and remarkable decline of flesh and strength, and of the energy of all the functions—what his mother very aptly termed a gradual blight. After inquiring into the history of his case, it appeared that he had been a very robust and plethoric child up to his third year, when his grandmother, a very aged person, took him to sleep with her; that he soon after lost his good looks, and that he had continued to decline progressively, ever since, notwithstanding medical treatment. I directed him to sleep apart from his aged parent, and prescribed the tonics, change of air, &c. and his recovery was rapid."

The opinion of this writer, as we happen to know, is very generally received; but for ourselves, we have many doubts of its correctness. We know indeed that sleeping together, under any circumstances whatever, were it not somewhat difficult to avoid it, is not very desirable. For it is not the lungs alone which contaminate the air, and this too, at a most rapid rate. The skin performs, in some small degree, the same office with the lungs, and renders the air unfit for respiration, as may be easily shown by placing a lighted candle under the bed clothes, where a person has been sleeping, in which case it will be extinguished. But though we know all this, we are quite at a loss to understand why the practice of sleeping with the aged should be much more pernicious than that of sleeping with young people.

Much of the evil which results to mankind from sleeping together might be prevented by having bedsteads made wider than is usual. Thus we might at least avoid breathing the air which our neighbor had but a moment before ejected, poisoned, from his lungs; for before it could reach us, it would become mixed with a portion of better air from the surrounding atmosphere.

WIFE. There is no combination of letters in the English language which excites more pleasing and interesting associations in the mind of man than the word wife. There is magic in this little word. It presents to the mind's eye a cheerful companion, a disinterested adviser, a nurse in sickness, a comforter in misfortune, and a faithful and ever affectionate friend. It conjures up the image of a lovely and confiding woman, who cheerfully undertakes to contribute to your happiness—to partake with you the cup, whether of weal or woe, which destiny may offer. This word wife is synonymous with the greatest earthly blessing; and we pity the unfortunate wight, who is condemned, by fate's severe decree, to trudge along through life's dull pilgrimage without one.

THE COUNT DE SURVILLIERS. The Courrier de Etats Unis of Saturday last, gives the following extract from a letter written by Joseph Bonaparte on the 29th of September, to a friend in the city of New York.

"My sister is now in Paris, but she has rejected all advances made to her. Do not believe a word of the story put forth in the Paris journals, about my voyage to Corsica, under the permission of Louis Philippe. All these paragraphs respecting my family are miserable inventions. You will sooner see me in New York than in Corsica, or any other part of France, so long as a Bourbon sits upon the throne."

The present movements of the Bonaparte family may be explained by the following note from a Paris paper:

The Diari di Roma contains, under the date of Dec. 9, a judicial edict or order, given at the request of count de Survilliers, (Joseph Bonaparte), to summon the prince of Canino, (Lucien Bonaparte), the count de Saint Leu, (Louis Bonaparte), the prince de Montfort, (Jerome Bonaparte), the countess Lipano, (widow of Murat), the countess Bacciocchi-Camesada and her husband, Ludovico Polenziana, in his character of executor of the will of Mme. Letitia Bonaparte, their mother, to come to Rome, in order to be present at the opening of the will of the latter personage.

The ambassador of Austria, in full dress, and accompanied by all the individuals composing his embassy, went yesterday morning to present his respects to the illustrious sister of Napoleon.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Since the publication of our last abstract there have been several arrivals at N. York, bringing late dates from London and Paris. The chief item relates to France and Switzerland, between which governments there appears to have been a complete rupture, the causes of which are stated in an article in the last "REGISTER." The French government, after considerable discussion, determined upon an ultimatum, requiring the Swiss directory to act against the refugees, which was communicated to the directory on the 27th of Sept. by the duke de Montebello, with a long "note," declaring the diplomatic relations between France and Switzerland suspended until the ultimatum is complied with. In this note the duke pronounces the affair of Conseil a miserable plot to involve the French embassy, and his pretended confessions all a string of lies, by which the Swiss authorities have been completely duped.

The Swiss papers are not merely severe but savage upon the ultimatum of France. The Nouveliste, of Vand, pronounces it a libel, execrable for the falsehood of its assertions, the atrocity of its calumnies, and the perfidy of its intentions. The Amide la Constitution says that if the members of the extraordinary diet have common sense, however destitute of courage they may be, they will not yield to the menaces put forth in it.

The extraordinary diet is called to deliberate on the course to be pursued. The councils were summoned, in the different cantons, for the election of deputies to this diet—to meet in October. It is probable that the resolution of the directory, relative to this affair of Conseil, will be adhered to, but that a mediation by some foreign power will be authorized and suggested to France. The Swiss cannot be mad enough to go to war with France, knowing as they must, that Austria and Prussia will be against them also.

The Swiss charge at Paris had received orders from the directory to quit Paris, and had accordingly demanded his passports. Indisposition, however, would detain him (very conveniently) for some weeks.

FROM RUSSIA

We learn that the emperor had his collar-bone broken by an overturn of his carriage, but had perfectly recovered at the date of the latest advices.—By this accident his intended visit to Warsaw was prevented. Some say that instead of having his collar-bone broken by being overturned, he was shot by a Russian officer, &c.

SPAIN.

The victory of the troops under the command of Alaix of the queen of Spain, at Villarrobledo, on the 20th September, has been confirmed. The Carlists lost 1,276 prisoners, among whom were 55 officers, as also a great part of their arms and baggage. The loss on the queen's side was only 4 killed and 61 wounded. It was reported at Paris on the 8th of October that Gomez had effected his escape, with the remnants of his arm, to the passes of the Sierra Morena.

The charges d'affaires of Austria, Sardinia and Naples, and the ambassadors of Russia and Prussia, had left Madrid for their respective kingdoms—in consequence, no doubt, of the revolution. The French ambassador, count Latour Mauberg, arrived at Bayonne on the 5th, on his way to Madrid.

The Carlists made an assault upon the British legion, in line before St. Sebastian, on the 1st, but were repulsed with a heavy loss. The British steamboats fired upon the Carlists, by order of lord John Hay.

Captain Brown, of the barque Ganges, arrived at Boston, from Malaga, October 10, informs Messrs. Topliff, that 6,000 men of the Carlist army were within one day's march of Malaga when he sailed, and great consternation pervaded all ranks in that city. The shipping in harbor was crowded with men, women and children, for protection. As the progress of the Carlists had been marked by every excess, and as they wreaked their vengeance more particularly upon those places which had proclaimed the constitution or were in favor of it, the inhabitants of Malaga had every reason to fear the worst consequences, should the Carlists enter the city.—Every preparation was making to defend the place. About 5,000 militia were enrolled, but had no leaders in whom they had confidence; consequently, great alarm existed and business was at a stand.

PORTUGAL.

The late revolution, effected at Lisbon, does not seem to be approved in the kingdom generally; and it is even said that those who effected it in the capital, are now much inclined to undo their work. The Portuguese auxiliaries in Spain have refused to swear to the constitution of 1820.

The queen was suffering from illness at the date of the latest advices.

Prince Ferdinand, the queen's husband, has resigned the chief command of the army, his appointment to which had excited some discontent.

The queen has issued a decree prohibiting the bull-fights; said to be the most unpopular act of her reign.

LATER NEWS.

By the ship Poland, at New York, dates have been received to the 14th of October inclusive.

His royal highness the duke of Nemours, was to accompany the expedition to Constantine, (Africa).

The ship Pierre Corneille from Rome to Cayenne, had foundered at sea in a gale off Havre.

M. Thiers, the expremier, was shortly expected back from Italy, on account of the cholera there.

The Seine has experienced another inundation, so that the stone quays where it runs through Paris, were nearly submerged.

The Rhone at Avignon, Oct. 9th, had swollen to a frightful height. Most of that town, with the barracks, grave yard, &c. were completely overflowed, and boats were sailing in all the streets.

King William the fourth, who will be hereafter called by the name of the pacificator, has it is confidently asserted, generously offered his mediation in the difficulties between France and Switzerland. Baron Rothschild is again the principal negotiator, and has had an interview with the Swiss chieftain.

The grand council of Berne has adopted resolutions of a very conciliatory tenor, with regard to the course to be pursued by the deputies of that republic in the extraordinary diet.

Abdel Kader, the Arab chief, has again reappeared with his Bedouins at Oran, to the consternation of the French commander.

Andalusia in Spain, in consequence of the daring encroachments and the accumulating members of the rebel Carlists, was declared by gen. Espinoza, in state of siege, September 6th. Gomez was approaching on Seville, September 24th.

Portugal continues quiet.

The government of Donna Maria at Mosambique was overthrown by the insurgents in June last, but immediately after the place was recaptured by the bravery of lieut. Bosanquet, of his majesty's brig Leveret, who happened to enter the port at this juncture. The governor was reinstated, and tranquillity restored.

The celebrated Russian gen. Clatow, commander of the Cossacks is dead.

Letters from Madrid of the 10th of October, and previous state that the late result of the election will place in the chamber of procuradors a large majority of those men who under the ministry of Isturiz composed the opposition, reinforced by other members of a still more liberal cast.

Gomez at the last dates was at Montero, ready to repass the Guadalquivir to throw himself into the mountains of Toledo, in consequence of the demonstrations of the captain general of Seville, who had assembled on the 28th of September 4,000 men at Carthagena. Sanz was six leagues from Oviedo, which was occupied by 2,000 regulars and militia, determined to resist him. The Portuguese brigade was proceeding on the 2d of October by forced marches to sea.

By the recent accounts from Adrianople it appears that the plague is making terrible ravages there. About 110 die daily. According to intelligence from Constantinople of the 21st of September, there is open enmity between the ulemas and the sultan, as great, it is said, as that which formerly existed between the sultan and the janizaires. The ulemas are in a state of great irritation, and sanguinary measures against them are expected. The English fleet under admiral Rowley had arrived at Vourla.

From Vienna, under the date of October 5th, it is said that the emperor of Austria will be crowned in March, at Milan.

CHINA.

By the arrival of the barque Gaspar, at Boston, the editors of the Commercial Advertiser have received a file of the Canton Register to the 24th of May inclusive.

The Register of the 24th remarks, in noticing some recent executions of Chinese criminals, that the acquittal of a prisoner is one of the rarest occurrences—the trial, conviction and punishment, appear to be inseparable. It would be well, perhaps, if the same observation could be made, with a nearer approximation to truth than now, in our own country.

The foreign commercial residents in Canton, especially the British and Americans, are still urging the necessity of more vigorous and decisive measures by the British government, to correct the intolerance and prevent the extortions of the Chinese functionaries. There must be a blow-up there one of these days.

The Singapore papers (to the 7th of May) are still filled with accounts of piracies in the straits of Malacca, and of the endeavors to suppress them.—The Wolf captured a piratical proa on the 23d of April, off Delhi. On the 30th the British Indianman Mary Anne was attacked by a number of large proas filled with men, but succeeded in beating them off much damaged. The ship's rigging was very much cut to pieces. About the beginning of May, a government falwa (a large open boat) armed with one twenty-four pounder and four swivels, manned by forty-three Tagalas, and commanded by lieut. Elliott, of the Spanish colonial service, was unexpectedly attacked near Cape Capones, by twenty-six double-banked Malay proas, each containing about forty men armed with muskets.—Lieutenant Elliott and his forty-three natives behaved like heroes. Bearing down upon the largest proa, they gave her the full charge of the twenty-four pounder within fifty yards, and down she went; they then administered a similar dose to another, with the like effect. The remaining twenty-four took to flight, hotly pursued by the falwa, which fired the long gun sixty-two times, with terrible effect, before the proas could make good their escape. The falwa had four men killed and ten wounded.—On receiving intelligence of this gallant affair, the governor of Manila promoted lieutenant Elliott (an Englishman) to the captaincy, and liberally rewarded his crew. A letter from Manila, dated May 10th, gives a terrible account of the outrages committed by the pirates on the coasts of Pangasinan and Yloco; burning villages and destroying crops, and carrying off men, women and children as prisoners.

The principal resident British and American merchants at Canton, presented a memorial to the governor on the 23d of April, remonstrating against the extortions practised upon them by the hoppo, in the levying of duties, and the great inconveniences and losses occasioned by the fluctuations in the rates, which are regulated, it seems, pretty much according to the pleasure of the hoppo; and asking for an authentic list of the duties on importations, by which they might be guided in their calculations.

Mr. Tang, the governor, in reply, was gracious enough to inform the memorialists that "The celestial empire grants permission to the outer barbarians to trade, solely from feelings of tenderness toward far-travelled foreigners, and from a regard for the livelihood of the people of your various nations. It looks on the few hundreds of thousands of revenue [arising therefrom] as alike undeserving of contempt or of regard."

He added that he would consult the hoppo, (the official whose extortions were complained of), and let them know his pleasure at some future day.—The hoppo accordingly issued his proclamation on the 5th of May.

LATEST FROM FLORIDA.

A slip from the office of the St. Augustine Herald, dated on the 29th ult. containing the following particulars has been received at Charleston.

By an express which left Fort Drane on the 27th instant, we learn that general Read arrived at the Wythlacochee on the 22d with the steamboats Energy and Superior, under the direction of captain Wood, whose active zeal, skill and superior judgment are highly spoken of. Another steamboat, the U. States, was wrecked at the mouth of the river.

We now learn with great satisfaction, that there are a plenty of provisions and forage at the mouth of the river, and a considerable quantity at Graham's camp and more on transportation there.

General Jesur was supposed to be at Tampa Bay with 750 regulars and marines; and two companies of mounted Alabama volunteers. Captain ALVORD's company from Key West and McINTOSH's from Fort Mitchell, 4th infantry, are with general READ.

The governor is in feeble health, but he is determined to enter the field and make every sacrifice, in order to insure success. He has appointed major PIERCE colonel, and given him the command of the Creek volunteers. This gallant officer has received from the president the brevet rank of lieutenant colonel as a reward for his meritorious services.

Major PIERCE has returned from Charleston with several steamboats and schooners, which have arrived in the St. Johns with a large number of horses, &c. for the army.

The campaign will open immediately and be prosecuted with vigor. In a few days we shall hear of something decisive.

The Jacksonville Courier of the 4th inst. says:—"Mrs Jane Johns, who was so barbarously scalped a short time since in this vicinity, is convalescing rapidly. Her health is sufficiently restored to enable her to leave her room. Her suffering has been extreme, though much relieved by the praiseworthy attention and skill of Dr. Welch. She had been married nearly a year, when her husband was inhumanly butchered."

The Indians made their appearance a short time since on Key Tavinier, where they surprised the schooner Mary, captain Bethell, burnt the vessel, and slightly wounded some of the crew before they could make their escape.

Lieut. Powell, of the U. S. sloop of war Vincennes, lying at Key West, went in pursuit of them with 170 men, accompanied by the U. S. cutter Washington and eight row boats. He succeeded in coming within sight of the encampment of Indians who were cooking their breakfast, but their eyes were open, they discovered the boats in time to make their escape in the woods where they could not be pursued—but they lost their canoes and every thing they left behind, which was immediately destroyed.

CAPE FLORIDA LIGHT HOUSE.

To the editors of the Charleston Courier:

GENTLEMEN: As many misrepresentations have been made concerning the burning of the light house at Cape Florida, the undersigned feels it his duty to state facts; it would have been published at Key West, but at the time I left no paper was printed at that place. Respectfully,

JOHN W. B. THOMPSON.

On the 23d July last, about 4 P. M. as I was going from the kitchen to the dwelling house, I discovered a large body of Indians within 20 yards of me back of the kitchen, I ran for the light house and called out to the old negro man that was with me to run for the Indians are here, at that moment they discharged a volley of rifle balls, which cut my clothes and hat and perforated the door in many places. We got in and as I was turning the key, the savages had hold of the door. I stationed the negro at the door with orders to let me know if they attempted to break in; I then took my three muskets, which were loaded with ball and buck shot, and went to the second window, seeing a large body of them opposite the dwelling house, I discharged my muskets in succession amongst them, which put them in some confusion; they then for the second time began their horrid yells, and in a minute no sash or glass was left at that window, for they vented all their rage at that spot. I fired at them from some of the other windows and from the top of the house; in fact I fired whenever I could get an Indian for a mark. I kept them from the house until dark. They then poured in a heavy fire at all the windows and lantern, that was the time that they set fire to the door and window even with the ground; the window was boarded up with plank and filled up with stones inside, but the flames spread fast, being fed with yellow pine wood. Their balls had perforated the tin tanks of oil, consisting of 225 gallons, my bedding, clothing, and in fact every thing I had was soaked in oil. I stooped at the door until driven away by the flames. I then took a keg of gunpowder, my balls and one musket to the top of the house, then went below and began to cut away the stairs about half way up from the bottom; I had great difficulty in getting the old negro man up the space I had already cut, but the flames now drove me from my labor, and I retreated to the top of the house. I covered over the skuttle that leads to the lantern, which kept the fire from me for some time; at last the awful moment arrived, the crackling flames burst around me, the savages at the same time began their hellish yells, my poor old negro looked up to me with tears in his eyes he could not speak; we went out of the lantern and layed down on the edge of the platform, two feet wide, the lantern now was full of flames the lamps and glasses bursting and flying in all directions, my clothes on fire, and to move from the place where I was would be instant death from their rifles; my flesh was roasting and to put an end to my horrible suffering, I got up, threw the keg of gunpowder down the skuttle, instantly it exploded and shook the tower from the top to the bottom; it had not the desired effect of blowing me to eternity, but it threw down the stairs and all the wooden work near the top of the house, it damped the fire for a moment but soon blazed as fierce as ever; the negro man said he was wounded, which was the last word he ever spoke. By this time I had received some wounds myself, and finding no chance for my life, for I was roasting alive, I took the determination to jump off, I got up, went outside the iron railing, recommending my soul to God, and was on the point of going head foremost on the rocks below, when something dictated to me to return and lay down again; I did so, and in two minutes the fire fell to the bottom of the house. It is a remarkable circumstance that not one ball struck me when I stood up out side the railing, although they were flying all around me like hail stones. I found the old negro man dead, being shot in seven places and literally roasted. A few minutes after the fire fell, a stiff breeze sprung up from the southward, which was a great blessing to me. I had to lay where I was, for I could not walk, having received six rifle balls three in each foot. The Indians thinking me dead left the light house, and set fire to the dwelling house, kitchen and other out houses and began to carry their plunder to the beach; they took all the empty barrels, the drawers of the bureaus, and in fact every thing that would act as a vessel to hold any thing; my provisions were in the light house except a barrel of flour, which they took off. The next morning they hauled out of the light house by means of a pole, the tin that composed the oil tanks, no doubt to make graters to manufacture the county root into what we call arrow root. After loading my little sloop about ten or twelve went into her, the rest took to the beach to meet at the other end of the island; this happened, as I judge, about 10 A. M. My eyes being much affected prevented me from knowing their actual force, but I judge there were from forty to fifty, perhaps more. I was now almost as bad off as before, a burning fever on me, my feet shot to pieces, no clothes to cover me, nothing to eat or drink, a hot sun over my head, a dead man by my side, no friend near or any to expect, and placed between seventy and eighty feet from the earth and no chance of getting down, my situation was truly horrible; about 12 o'clock I thought I could perceive a vessel not far off, I took a piece of the old negro's trousers that had escaped the flames by being wet with blood, and made a signal; sometime in the afternoon I saw two boats with my sloop in tow coming to the landing, I had no doubt but they were the Indians having seen my signal, and returned to finish their murderous designs, but it proved to be boats of the United States schooner Motto, captain Armstrong, with a detachment of seamen and marines, under the command of lieutenant Lloyd, of the sloop of war Concord; they had retaken my sloop after the Indians had stripped her of her sails and rigging and every thing of consequence belonging to her; they informed me they heard my explosion twelve miles off and ran down to my assistance, but did not expect to find me alive; those gentlemen did all in their power to relieve me, but night coming on, they returned on board the Motto after assuring me of their assistance in the morning. Next morning, Monday, July 5th, three boats landed, amongst them captain Cole, of the schooner Pee Dee, from New York—they had made a kite during the night to get a line to me, but without effect—they then fired twine from their muskets made fast to a ramrod which I received, and hauled up a tail block and made fast round an iron stanchion, rove the twine through the block, and they below by that means rove a two inch rope and hoisted up two men who soon landed me on terra firma. I must state here that the Indians had made a ladder by lashing pieces of wood across the lightning rod, near forty feet from the ground as if to have my scalp volens; this happened on the 4th. After I got on board the Motto, every man from the captain to the cook tried to alleviate my sufferings. On the 7th I was received in the military hospital through the politeness of lieutenant Alvord, of the 4th regiment of United States infantry; he has done every thing to make my situation as comfortable as possible.

I must not omit here to return my thanks to the citizens of Key West generally, for their sympathy and kind offers of any thing I would wish, that was in their power to bestow. Before I left Key West, two balls were extracted, and one remains in my right leg; but since I am under the care of Dr. Ramsey, who has paid every attention to me, he will know best whether to extract it or not.

These lines were written to let my friends know that I am still in the land of the living, and am now in Charleston, S. C. where every attention is paid me—although a cripple I can eat my allowance, and walk about without the use of a cane. Respectfully, yours,

JOHN W. B. THOMPSON.

ALL SAINTS DAY IN NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans, November 2.

Yesterday being the holiday celebrated among the professors of the Catholic faith as All Saints Day, we with the rest of our good citizens, sallied forth to witness in the Catholic cemetery, the observances and ceremonies usual on this occasion. Burial grounds have often been termed "cities of the dead," but we have never seen any to which the term, could so appropriately be applied as to those of New Orleans. From the low and marshy situation of the grounds, the earth being thoroughly saturated with water, inhumation in the proper sense of the term is impossible, and recourse is necessarily had in all cases to tombs and cells on the surface of the ground for the depositing of the dead. The cemeteries are therefore laid out in regular squares, with broad gravel walks intervening and traversing the whole extent, and along these walks the tombs and cells are erected in continuous rows, often to the height of several layers or stories, presenting in reality the appearance of a city in miniature.

They are composed chiefly of brick, neatly stuccoed and whitewashed or painted, and have generally encased in the centre a black or gray tablet of polished stone with a gilded inscription. Many, however, are fronted with elegantly carved marble, and occasionally one is seen composed of marble entirely, or of granite or fine sand stone, indicating by its isolated position, superior altitude, or greater magnificence, the resting place of the mortal remains of some wealthy inhabitant of olden times. Before the approach of All Saints Day, those of the tombs which have suffered any injury from time or accident, are repaired and the whole are newly white washed or painted, and on this occasion they are beautifully ornamented with wreaths of cypress and garlands of flowers. In the afternoon, a procession of priests accompanied by a train of youths clothed in white, and bearing in their hands long flambeaux enter the sacred enclosure and offer in some conspicuous place prayers for the souls of the departed. During this service, rows of lighted tapers are every where burning in front of the tombs, and the friends of the deceased are seen engaged in deep and solemn communion, invoking the blessings of heaven upon the disembodied spirits of their relatives. The whole scene is one of great interest and solemnity, well calculated to inspire the minds of the thousands of spectators who throng along the walls with a feeling of veneration and awe.

The custom of this annually repairing and decorating the monuments of the dead, is we believe peculiar to the Catholic church, but is certainly worthy of the imitation of all sects and denominations. It is useful not only in perpetuating the monuments of those who once lived and acted their parts in the great drama of life, but it has another salutary effect upon the feelings and hearts of those who are interested. Old associations are revived, the treasured remembrances of the dead are called up, and the history of their virtues and excellencies freshened in the memory. Man is periodically reminded, too, that this is not his abiding place, that his stay upon earth is transient, and that in a few short years at most his survivors will be called upon to perform the same kind offices to his earthly remains.

In an ever active and bustling community like ours where the mind is continually employed in the multifarious pursuits and occupations of life, without one moment to devote uninterruptedly to the consideration of a future state, of the brief duration of the present existence, some solemn and deeply impressive ceremony is essentially requisite, to tear away for a time our thoughts from worldly cares, and yield them to meditations of a loftier and more spiritual character; to force upon us the humiliating lesson of mortality, and to wean us, if possible, from the absorbing attachments to earthly gains and possessions. [Be.]

THE NORTH AND THE SOUTH.

The following is an interesting sketch of the recent speech of Mr. Senator Preston, at a public meeting at Columbia, in reference to the Charleston and Cincinnati rail road, in which he took occasion to bear honorable testimony, from personal observation, to the character, the enterprise and public spirit of the north.

Mr. Preston, in his speech concerning the rail road, on Monday last drew a very striking contrast between the difference of character of the people of the northern and of the southern parts of the union, and the consequently opposite condition of the countries that they inhabit.

He said that no southern man can journey, (as he had lately done), through the northern states, and witness the prosperity, the industry, the public spirit, which they exhibit, the sedulous cultivation of all those arts by which life is rendered comfortable and respectable, without feelings of deep sadness and shame, as he remembers his own neglected and desolate home. There, no dwelling is to be seen abandoned, no farm uncultivated, no man idle, no waterfall, even, unemployed. Every person and every thing performs a part towards the grand result, and the whole land is covered with fertile fields, with manufactories, and canals, and rail roads, and public edifices, and towns and cities.

Along the route of the great New York canal, (that glorious monument of the glorious memory of De Witt Clinton), a canal, a rail road, and a turnpike, are to be seen in the width of perhaps a hundred yards, each of them crowded with travel, or overflowing with commerce. Throughout their course, lands that before their construction would scarcely command five dollars the acre, now sell for fifty, seventy-five or a hundred. Passing along it, you see no space of three miles without a town or village, and you are never out of the sound of a church bell.

We of the south are mistaken in the character of these people, when we think of them only as peddlers in horn flints and bark nutmegs. Their energy and enterprise are directed to all objects, great and small, within their reach. At the fall of a scanty rivulet, they set up their little manufactory of wooden buttons or combs; they plant a barren hill side with broom corn, and make it into brooms at the bottom—and on its top they erect a windmill. Thus, at a single spot you may see the air, the earth and the water, all working for them. But, at the same time, the ocean is whitened to its extremities with the sails of their ships, and the land is covered with their works of art and usefulness.

Massachusetts is perhaps the most flourishing of the northern states. Yet, of natural productions, she exports but two articles—granite and ice. Absolutely nothing but rock and ice! Every thing else of her commerce, from which she derives so much, is artificial—the work of her own hands.

All this is done, in a region with a bleak climate and sterile soil, by the energy and intelligence of the people. Each man knows that the public good is his individual advantage. The number of rail roads, and other modes of expeditions intercommunication, knits the whole country into a closely compacted mass, through which the productions of commerce and of the press, the comforts of life, and the means of knowledge, are universally diffused; while the close intercourse of travel and business makes all men neighbors, and promotes a common interest and common sympathy. In a community thus connected, a single flash of thought pervades the whole land, almost as rapidly as thought itself can fly. The population becomes, as it were, a single set of muscles, animated by one heart, and directed by a common sensorium.

How different the condition of things in the south! Here, the face of the country wears the aspect of premature old age and decay. No improvement is seen going on, nothing is done for posterity, no man thinks of any thing beyond the present moment. Our lands are yearly tasked to their utmost capacity of production, and, when exhausted, are abandoned for the youthful west. Because nature has been prodigal to us, we seem to think it unnecessary to do any thing for ourselves. The industry and skill that have converted the inclement and barren hills of New England into a garden, in the genial climate and fertile soil of the south, would create almost a paradise. Our natural advantages are among the greatest with which Providence has blessed mankind, but we lack the spirit to enjoy and improve them. The rich ore is beneath our feet, yet we dig not for it. The golden fruit hangs from the bough, and we lift not our hands to gather it. The cask of delicious liquor is before our eyes, but we are too lazy even to broach it. In thinking, in writing and in talking, we are equal to any people on the face of the earth; but we do nothing but think, write and talk.

HESSIAN FLY.

The annexed article relative to the habits and progress of this destructive insect, is from the pen of a gentleman in this vicinity, who carefully and minutely watched it through all its stages during the past year. We have reason to think it is a faithful narration of its history through all its stages and changes. He adverts to a probable remedy to destroy the insect before doing mischief to the young wheat, but that is in some degree conjectural. The individual who can introduce a certain and effectual remedy against the ravages of the fly, will indeed be a blessing to his species and a benefactor to his country. The subject is deserving great consideration and attention, and should awaken a spirit of inquiry among our agricultural friends at this season of leisure. [Bucks county Intelligencer.]

The fly itself is a small insect with long bluish wings, and may be seen hovering about over a wheat field in a warm day in the fall, after the wheat is up and has got into stooking—it then deposits its eggs, from one to five or six, on the lower leaf where it joins the stock. The eggs, when first laid, are about the size of a point of a pin and white; they grow until they become of the size and shape of a flax seed, when they change their color to a brown, and appear in shape and color of a flax seed. While in the white state they appear to extract nourishment from the stock of wheat, from their wounding it, the eggs continue in the flax seed state in the stock at the junction of the lower leaf, until the next spring, and every stock that has an egg in it turns to a dark green and perishes before the next spring. In the spring, after the wheat begins to grow, no eggs can be found in the live wheat, but on examining, there will be found dead stools of wheat, and on taking these up you will find the egg at the root of the stool where it was deposited, appearing like a flax seed. When the weather becomes warm in the spring these eggs hatch, and the little creature crawls up out of the ground, and begins to lay eggs on the surviving wheat close to the stock on the lower leaf, where the egg remains, going through its changes until fall, when it comes out a fly again, and commences on the new sown wheat.

The fly will lay its egg in rye, but the rye stock grows strong and fast, and bursts open the husk leaf where the egg is laid and the egg falls out and perishes. It will lay its eggs in oats and timothy, but not to do much injury. This fly is a very different insect from the fly that has lately made its appearance in New England and New York state, or the Maryland fly—in both these last cases the fly lays its egg in the grain while in the milk state, and the worm eats the milk and meal out of the grain, but in no case has the grain been eaten by the Hessian fly or found in it—but all these flies may depredate in the same field in their own way. What is the remedy? It cannot be in applying anything to seed before sowing, as the fly lives on the root or near it, instead of the ear or grain. Even good tillage has failed this last season as well as late sowing—Will not lime do it if properly applied, as a very small portion of lime is a quick and certain death to many insects? A pint of quick lime mixed with 100 bushels of wheat will destroy every weevil in it, and if blown from a fan into a barn it will destroy or drive them all out.

Lime is a certain and quick death to flees, &c., and it is said that by sowing over the grain it will destroy the egg in the grain. Supposing a farmer when he found the fly was in his wheat depositing its eggs should sow half a bushel of lime while warm after slacking upon an acre, in a still morning while the dew is on—the lime being light and fine will spread and settle down on the leaves of the wheat, and reach the egg while in the soft and white state and most likely to destroy it. Where the stubble is full of the egg, by plowing deep in the fall or early in the spring, the egg will be buried so deep that it will perish. In the fall one or two frosts will destroy most of the fly, as late sowing has in some cases. BUCKS.

THE AMERICAN PRESS.

We find the following circular in the New York Observer.

CIRCULAR.

New York, Aug. 1, 1836.

SIR: A meeting of citizens has recently been held in this city, for the purpose of considering the present condition of the American press, the prospects of our country, as likely to be affected by its influence; and the practicability and expediency of establishing a national institution, on an extended scale, for the diffusion of knowledge, in connection with pure and salutary principles, similar in its structure and design to European societies for the same purpose. A committee was appointed at that meeting to draft a constitution for such a society, and to take measures to secure extensively the union and systematic co-operation of wise and good men in every section of our country, in furtherance of the principles and objects it is designed to promote. As that committee, we take the liberty of addressing you, respectfully inviting your attention to this subject, and your counsel and aid in the great work proposed.

It is universally acknowledged that the press is the most powerful agent now acting on the human mind. That our country is to be a field where its power will be pre-eminently exerted, is equally clear: the extensive circulation of newspapers, magazines and other publications of every description, is creating among our population a general habit of reading hitherto unparalleled in the history of nations; and it inevitably follows, that individual and national character will, in a great measure, be formed by the kind of publications which gain the most general circulation among us; and that consequently the destinies of our country, and its influence on other nations, will very much depend on the direction which may now be given to the press.

The principle, adopted by the committee, is, that the universal diffusion of knowledge, imbued with the spirit of Christianity, is indispensable for bringing any people to the full enjoyment of the best civil and social institutions. And that, in a country, whose institutions depend for their prosperity and stability, not on the arm of power, but solely on the elevating and conservative influence of a pure, enlightened and well regulated public mind, where the voice of the people is supreme law, the importance of diffusing information connected with sound and virtuous principles cannot be overrated. Intelligence and Christian principle constitute the palladium of American liberty.

Among the incidental advantages that may be expected to follow from the labors of this society, will be the increased attention it will naturally excite towards the cause of education. Already a deep interest throughout our land, in the subject of universal education, based upon the principles of the Bible, has begun to appear, and the importance of a more liberal and expansive provision for the wants of our rising population is imperatively felt. The mass of uncultivated minds rising up among us, of foreign as well as of native origin, indicates the necessity of some more adequate system for the mental and moral improvement of the community.

It is known that a large proportion of our juvenile population is coming forward with the rapidity of time, to exercise the rights and perform the duties of American citizens, without an adequate culture either of mind or heart. With multitudes of such characters about to exert their influence on the state of society, what can be expected, but that they will fill our cities and villages with crime, and our whole land with the evils and sorrows attending an ignorant, vicious and unprincipled population.

In some other countries less favored than ours, may be found a far more liberal and generous provision for the instruction of the people, than exists among us, if we take into view the whole extent of our territory and the aggregate of our population; and the committee feel convinced, that the most favored portions of our land, is below the standard which is requisite for the permanent prosperity of our republican institutions. To extend, therefore, the means of diffusing widely among our people, USEFUL KNOWLEDGE, the committee cannot but regard as an imperative duty devolving on every good citizen, as a patriot, philanthropist and Christian.

In view of such considerations, it is proposed to establish a NATIONAL INSTITUTION on the plan developed in the subjoined constitution, to which the committee particularly invite your attention. They also solicit your views of the principles it involves; your opinion of the probable reception, by the community at large of publications to be issued under such sanctions; and of the sympathy and co-operation, both of a literary and pecuniary nature, in your district of country, which such an enterprise may be likely to secure.

A more extended meeting, for the consideration of this subject, the adoption of the constitution, and the organization of the society, will be held at a future day. A reply to this communication, at the earliest possible period, with your observations on the general object, and the best means of promoting it, is particularly requested. We are, respectfully,

DANIEL WEBSTER'S LECTURE.

Daniel Webster delivered the introductory lecture on Tuesday evening the 1st inst. before the Boston lyceum. The Odeon was crowded with auditors. The subject which he selected was one which his vigorous and philosophic mind was well calculated to grasp, involving some of the most important principles in political economy. He spoke of the wonderful process of popular knowledge in the present age—of the vast accession within a few years to the number of proficient in morals, politics, science, art and literature. He conceived that this hastened knowledge was not the result of a slow measured pace in the progress of society, but owing to some active causes, which have been in operation only a few years. The physical wants of mankind which require the earliest attention, are food, raiment, shelter and fuel. These must be supplied before man has leisure to attend to the cultivation of his mind. In all civilized countries, particularly in this country, the thirst for knowledge is great and increasing—and must be ascribed to some great change and improvement in the mass of mankind. Food, shelter and clothing are objects of easier attainment than formerly—and it thus appears that the rapid progress of popular knowledge is caused by the increase of the comforts, and the ability to provide for the wants of the great mass of society.

He next inquired into the causes of this rapid improvement in the condition of mankind—and ascribed them to the successful application of science to art, or in other words to scientific art, which has been so extensively brought forward within a few years to aid the industry of man. Writers on political economy have generally considered that labor is the only productive source of wealth. Any augmentation of labor must of course increase in a corresponding degree the productions of the earth, and it has been the purpose of scientific art to create an active agency which may in a philosophical view be regarded as labor. It has sought to accomplish this work by bringing in the elements to assist in performing labors which were once executed solely by man—and in this way labor-saving machines or more properly speaking labor-doing machines have multiplied throughout the land. This work of machinery should be regarded in all senses as labor, as purely as if it was the work of slaves—with this difference, that the labor-saving machines are non-consumers, having no wants to supply.—Mr. Webster stated that the aggregate amount of labor executed by means of water or steam defied all calculation. The era of this successful application of science to art was commenced by Richard Arkwright and Robert Fulton. These two eminent men succeeded in bringing theory into practice—and by dint of their untiring perseverance and skill succeeded in producing results, which have been immensely beneficial to their respective countries and to mankind. From this period may be dated the commencement of increased zeal for popular knowledge. These mighty results have changed the face of society, and the mighty agency of which we have only seen the beginning and progress is the consequence of the application of science to art.

Mr. W. spoke of the salutary effect which this agency has produced on commerce and agriculture—and of the vast wealth which it added to countries where it was duly appreciated and encouraged—the earnings by the labor of this kind of machinery, in England alone, produced on exported manufactured articles, being estimated at $30,000,000 a year. And this augmentation of the wealth and comfort of mankind is in its nature inclusive, embracing all conditions and reaching every station in society. It is beneficial to the rich and the poor—and generally far more beneficial to the poor man than to the rich. Its mighty consequences are seen in the improved condition of all classes—in their dwellings, in their modes of living and other comforts which add to their happiness.

Mr. Webster next adverted to the importance of wealth in carrying on large manufacturing establishments—and the necessity for partnerships of individuals for this purpose, under the restraints and protection of the laws. The tendency of these incorporated companies is not merely to amass property—but to diffuse it. And the present unexampled prosperity and happiness of New England may be attributed in a great measure to the diligent employment of our citizens. He also exposed in the most triumphant manner the popular fallacy, that capital is an enemy to labor—and showed that while aggregated wealth has for years been steadily employed in the application of science to art, the price of labor has been constantly increasing—and is now higher in this country, than has ever before been known—thus contradicting the favorite dogmas of the writers on political economy. Labor with us is free—and is constantly accumulating for all, owing to the enterprise of our citizens, and the skill with which capital is employed. In Europe, the laborer is always a laborer—but not so in New England. Here capital and labor are less distinctly divided. There is no class which owns all the capital, and another which owns all the labor. Industrious and sober young men, who are laborers to-day, may reasonably expect to become capitalists to-morrow.

Mr. Webster next entered into the inquiry of what effect this great accumulation of labor by means of scientific art, and the thirst of knowledge which is characteristic of the age in which we live, would have on the morals and religious feelings of mankind. He thought the effect produced must be a good one. It was against the nature of man and the order of Providence, that increased knowledge should lead to vice—and accordingly it is found that no age, but this which is so strongly characterized for the diffusion of popular knowledge, has produced such great improvements in morals. We have moral teaching multiplied from our lecture rooms, from the pulpit and the mouths of admonishing friends—from the press and from nature, whose lecture room is the whole universe. The facilities for diffusing moral and religious instruction is now very great—and we already experience its effects in the progress of the temperance reform—the flourishing state of our Sunday schools, and other institutions. This increase of knowledge doubtless gives man a higher estimate of his religious relations. Within a few years, copies of the Bible have multiplied to a great extent—missions have gone forth into all parts of Christendom, and into pagan lands—large sums have been collected for the support of the clergy, and for the erection of houses of public worship—and various other circumstances show that piety keeps pace with the increasing knowledge of the people. And it is to be hoped that religion, virtue, benevolence and philanthropy will now and at all times, here and hereafter, attend the progress of popular knowledge.

It will be seen from the above brief and imperfect synopsis that Mr. Webster on this occasion selected a subject particularly suited to his extraordinary mental powers and habits of thinking. It was treated in a masterly manner and may be said to have been every way worthy of Daniel Webster.—There were probably more than two thousand persons present at the Odeon on this occasion, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather.

DINNER TO GEN. GAINES.

Mobile, October 18th, 1836.

To maj. gen. E. P. Gaines, of the U. S. army:

The undersigned, members of a committee appointed at a meeting of their fellow citizens of Mobile, on the 24th day of March last, to offer you a public dinner for your distinguished services in the Seminole war, whilst you were allowed to conduct its operations, beg leave to tender you their friendly congratulations on your return to the bosom of your family, and to renew in behalf of our fellow citizens the assurance of their unabated regard and continuance of the high admiration and grateful sense of your services as a soldier in the cause of your country. Charged by the government of that country with the arduous and delicate trust of preserving the neutrality of the United States in the contest now waging between Mexico and Texas, in which the highest principles and the most sacred rights of man are involved, we cannot omit the opportunity which this occasion presents of making known to you our individual approbation of your military conduct, and of the high admiration with which the public is still impressed of your distinguished services in the Florida campaign, notwithstanding the many efforts which have been made to disparage your conduct both in Florida and upon the western frontier.

To the invitation which we had the honor to extend to you in the name of the people of this city, to whose freedom and hospitalities you were welcomed with so much enthusiasm, you replied that your public duties required you to postpone the acceptance to some future time. The undersigned are happy that your presence in this city now affords them the opportunity of renewing that invitation and respectfully request that you will appoint such day as may be most agreeable to you to meet your fellow citizens of Mobile round the festive board. We beg you to accept the assurances of our individual regard and high personal esteem.

JOHN F. EVERITT, JOS. BATES, JR.
F. S. BLOUNT, SAM'L A. ROBERTS,
Geo. WALTON, JOHN MILTON,
W. JEFFERSON JONES, committee.

Mobile, Oct. 25, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I should sooner have attended to the kind and cordial welcome with which you have honored my return to this place, had not the dangerous illness of my beloved wife required my constant attention near her. The distressing malady with which her life has been threatened during the last two weeks, though now apparently yielding in some degree to the judicious treatment of her physician, aided by the present season of health, with the mild and meliorating climate of Mobile, still requires my constant attention; inasmuch as to oblige me to deny myself the pleasure which I had fondly anticipated, of meeting my fellow citizens of Mobile at a public dinner to which they were pleased, through you, to invite me on my return from Florida, and to renew the invitation on the 18th inst.

I owe to the citizens of Mobile a debt of gratitude which no time, nor any change of circumstances can ever cancel, for the honors they have conferred on me, in the "freedom of the city," as well as in the prompt and efficient measures which they have taken to repel the lawless efforts of a band of political gladiators, influenced by the spirit of party, to misrepresent my conduct; because, owning as I do, allegiance to the United States, I disdain to pay homage to an intolerant party.

Hundreds of irresponsible and anonymous pens have been employed against me, to misrepresent my conduct:—First, in my campaign to East Florida—and secondly, in my recent measures to maintain the neutrality of our country, and protect from the perils of an exterminating war among our ferocious red and white neighbors of the west, the most vital, and the most vulnerable section of our national frontier.

I was first charged with disobedience of orders, and neglect of duty, in not having shut my eyes against the outbreak of war and devastation upon the frontier of East Florida, within the known limits of my department; and in having attempted to afford protection to the exposed and bleeding citizens of that frontier, who had been authorised to look to me as their protector; and in not abandoning my command to an officer far distant from me. I was thus charged by persons supposed to have some claim to military knowledge, notwithstanding they knew full well that every official act of mine in East Florida took place before the officer appointed to relieve me, had found his way to the theatre of war in Florida, within the limits of my department; the only place at which I could, upon any sound principle of military law, or without dishonor to myself and the army, have abandoned my command, or suffered myself to be relieved by a junior, or any other officer, until after I had subdued the enemy; which I had the happiness to accomplish, thanks to the chivalry of the officers and men, Louisiana volunteers and regulars, who accompanied me. This is in sober truth, the full extent of my offending in Florida, if indeed I committed offence. In this view of the subject, I feel convinced that I have said nothing more than will, whenever required by the proper authorities, be established by the concurrent testimony of every intelligent officer and soldier who served with me in Florida, and who had the means of knowing the facts connected with my measures and conduct.

My calumniators have principally, as far as I can learn, abandoned their first charges, mortified and ashamed that they ever had the weakness to array them against me; as no intelligent soldier or citizen can be found base enough to assert that it was not as much my bounden duty promptly to collect force, and fly to the rescue of the suffering pioneers of the wilderness, authorised to rely on me as their protector, though residing out of the reach of my eye, as if they had been the most fashionable of my calumniators, and living within my sight, even if it had exposed me and my young warriors to the sad dilemma of being a little hungry, or even of being quite without rations for a few days. He who enters the military service of his country, must have spent his time at school most unprofitably if he has not learned that occasional privation of food and comfort, can seldom fail to attend the labors of an active campaign; and more especially when in conflict with a savage foe.

The degrading and afflictive scenes which followed my campaign in East Florida, need no comment from me. They cannot fail to receive the attention of the people of the United States, through their public functionaries, whenever the turmoil of party struggles shall subside.

I take great pleasure in the belief that the Tennessee and Florida volunteers, aided by the few regulars now in Florida, will speedily terminate the war; and that no vain or visionary votary of European plans, will again be found to renew its horrors.

If in my humble efforts to preserve the south western frontier from the heart-rending scenes of savage war and desolation, such as have covered Florida with deep mourning—and such as must penetrate the heart and awaken the sensibilities and sympathies of every patriot of our country, I have incurred the censure of a high public functionary placed over me, I have the satisfaction to know that I have acted in strict obedience to the law of the land prescribing the oath which I have taken, and in obedience to which I have probably seen as much hard service as any man in the United States now living—an oath which requires me to bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America, and to serve them honestly and faithfully against their enemies or opposers whomsoever, and to observe and obey the orders of the president of the United States, and the orders of the officers appointed over me, according to the rules and articles of war.

I have been actuated by the same zeal in my efforts to protect the people of the western frontier, as that with which I was animated and sustained 21 years past, in the protection of the people of the great and magnanimous state of New York.

I was aware that my measures and my plan of operations, were unfashionable and unpopular, because they were drawn from the experience of such men as Washington, and Wayne, and Shelby, and G. R. Clark, and Adair, and Campbell, and Sevier, Robertson, Coffee, &c. &c. and not from the splendid systems of Napoleon, which, though admirable in Europe, during the last, and a few years of the present century, are wholly inapplicable to our purposes at the present time—more especially for our operations against Indians. My plans were, as they had long been, predicated upon the supposition that whenever there is good reason to calculate on a war with a savage foe, it is proper instantly to place between the red man and the white man an effective force—and thus to commence the work of protection, if possible before the work of desolation shall have begun. By this means protection is afforded to the living citizens, rather than, as in Florida, to the ashes of the slain. This is what I deem to be that protection which the constitution of the United States guarantees to all the people of the United States.

I am well aware that if by this kind of protection, the frontier is preserved from attack, there will always be found in our beloved land of freedom, managers of elections, and other interested men, ready and willing to swear there was no danger.

For example, suppose I had a year ago proclaimed that the people of East Florida could not be protected without two battalions being added to the slender force then scattered over the extensive frontier of that territory, separated by a wilderness of near twenty thousand square miles in extent; I should have been deemed crazy—at least by those who were unwilling to incur the expense or trouble of an occasional military movement, until the progress of the war leaves little or nothing to protect but an extended ruin—a howling wilderness! Or, if I had failed to fly to the assistance of the frontier, after hearing of the murders of December last, is it not more than probable that the persons who have been pleased to censure me, would have felt themselves equally authorised to disapprove and censure my omission?

I will only add that, if I did not hold myself always ready to risk my popularity, and my life in the honest discharge of my duty in the national defence, I should feel that I was unworthy the trust reposed in me, and unworthy of being a citizen of the United States, or a citizen of Virginia, of Tennessee, or of Mobile.

I am happy to have it in my power to inform you that my health has never been better than it has been during the last five months. I was afflicted with a bad cold for a few days during the early part of May, but I have never been confined to my tent, or to a room, five days, by sickness of any kind during the last ten years. And it was a mistake, unintentional, I am sure, that I have ever applied for a furlough to visit any springs for the benefit of my own health. I did apply for permission to accompany my wife to the springs, when I believed the frontier to be in no danger. Your friend and fellow citizen,

EDMUND P. GAINES.

"REFORM OR REVOLUTION" IN MARYLAND.

From the Maryland Republican of Saturday, 12th inst. CORRESPONDENCE.

The following correspondence between John S. Sellman, esq. one of the electors of senate for Anne Arundel county, and the other electors who were attending the college of electors at the period, was handed us for publication on Friday evening, too late to enable us to get it in our Saturday's publication—though in attempting to do so, we lost the opportunity of mailing that publication to our subscribers by the Washington mail of Friday night, which closed before we got them through the press. To gratify public curiosity, we anticipate our next publication, without waiting to make a single comment.

Annapolis, Oct. 29, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: Having qualified as an elector of the senate of Maryland, and expressed my willingness to attend the electoral college, whenever my presence might be required, I take the liberty of addressing you on the all important subject of the election of a senate. It is needless to refer to the past. The present situation of things is what I look at. From the position that parties have assumed, it is in my opinion worse than useless even to anticipate the election of a senate without a compromise of conflicting interests. The intention of this letter is most respectfully to inquire of the members of the college who are in attendance at the seat of government, whether any compromise will be offered; and if any, what is its character and the principles on which it is based.

Sincerely anxious that a senate may be elected on the grounds of an honorable compromise, whereby the honest fears and anticipations of the community may be tranquillized, I have deemed it a sacred duty I owe to a confiding people to make one more exertion to promote so desirable an object. I know of no means so well calculated as a free interchange of sentiment. In this matter I act on my sole responsibility—but with an intention of submitting my conduct to the supervision of my constituents—I therefore neither make a confidential communication—nor expect a confidential answer. Hoping from the bottom of my soul that all our state difficulties may be amicably arranged, and the great body of our constituents may be gratified, I remain, most respectfully, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

JOHN S. SELLMAN.

To Messrs. Leigh, Dalrymple, Pratt and Beall.

Senate chamber, Annapolis, Oct. 29, 1836.

To John S. Sellman, esq.

SIR: We have received your letter of this date, and although we regret that you should have adopted this mode of communication rather than a personal interview, which those of the undersigned to whom that letter is addressed were led to anticipate from their conversation with you on yesterday, we are yet not indisposed to meet you in the spirit which we are inclined to believe mutually actuates us in the discharge of our duty as electors.

It must be unnecessary to say that we are as sincerely desirous of restoring tranquillity to the state as you can be, and we assure you that there is nothing which we would not be willing to do to accomplish that object, consistently with our sense of duty and principle. In the conversation held with you last evening we distinctly understood you to disclaim all party views in desiring the information, which you then informed us you intended to ask at our hands. We were pleased to learn from you that you intended to meet us this morning with the sole view of consulting with us for the advantage of the state, and of asking of us our opinions and the opinions of our colleagues, in regard to the election of a senate favorable to constitutional reform. We stated to you in the conversation referred to, that we not only recognized your right to participate in our deliberations, but that we should be gratified to have the benefit of your opinions and advice.

We also understood you to say that you had no propositions to make, but that you desired to know from us whether a senate would be elected favorable to constitutional reform, because you believed that information upon this subject might have the effect to induce the attendance of a sufficient number of the electors to form a senate.

We now have pleasure in informing you that in our opinion (should the required electoral quorum be obtained), a senate will be elected favorable to constitutional reform, and that such would have been the case at any time since the period fixed by the constitution for the meeting of the college.

We are convinced that upon this subject we correctly state the opinions and intentions of our colleagues not only from personal conferences with them, but also from their views expressed in the address of the twenty-one electors, to the people of Maryland, as published in September last.

In conclusion we cannot refrain from expressing the hope and expectation that you will now join us in the meetings of the college, and co-operate with us in our efforts to save the state from the dangers which unhappily threaten her. With respectful consideration, we are your ob't serv'ts,

THOMAS G. PRATT,
GEORGE S. LEIGH,
RICH'D BEALL,
JAS. A. D. DALRYMPLE,
SAMUEL J. K. HANDY,
GEORGE DUDLEY,

Annapolis, Oct. 31, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 29th inst. in reply to mine of the same date, and have to express my unfeigned regret that an answer was not tendered in the same spirit in which my communication was worded. I deem it an act of justice to myself, to state that the meeting alluded to in your letter, was purely accidental, and that the conversation between us was regarded by myself as frank and unreserved. As a reference, however, has been made to it in the shape of a detailed statement, I beg leave to say, that the impression left on my mind, differs in some respect from the account of it in your letter. I did state that I was not authorized to make any propositions, but that I was anxious to know whether any compromise was contemplated—because, if any was contemplated, I might be the means of communicating it to the other eighteen gentlemen, as I was certain it would receive from them the most respectful consideration. I expressed no belief that they would attend, only my hope that under certain circumstances they would do so. It is true that a wish was expressed and acceded to, that I would meet you again on the following day, but on consideration I thought a respectful communication in writing would be better and more suited to the importance of the subject, and I therefore adopted that course, with the propriety of which I am fully satisfied. I did state that I was not influenced by party views in the adjustment of this question—the statement I again reiterate, but I am certain that I made no disclaimer in reference to any information that I might seek at your hands, because I know I have too much self-respect and regard for my own character, to seek any thing at the hands of political opponents, which could, by the most fastidious, be construed into a breach of honor, or dereliction of duty. Whatever, gentlemen, you may be inclined to believe actuated me in the discharge of my duty as an elector, I can only say I am actuated by a single and sincere desire to give stability to our institutions, to inspire a just confidence in the people, that a reasonable and satisfactory reform will be obtained, so that this great and vital question may be speedily, honorably and amicably arranged. But to produce this desirable result, I say in the spirit of candor, and under the highest obligation of duty, that it is my solemn conviction, that no electoral quorum will ever be obtained, unless some stronger assurance than that of constitutional reform, unaccompanied with a statement of what is intended to be reform, is made. The term in itself is vague and indefinite—by some it might be regarded as a restriction on the right of suffrage, while by others it might be construed as giving a representation according to population.

My temporary residence in Annapolis is entirely owing to domestic considerations. Private business will more or less occupy my attention every day, during the short time that I shall remain. Having failed, I fear, in the great object that I have so much at heart, I can see no advantage in availing myself of your polite invitation, of joining you in the meetings of the college. I remain, gentlemen, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN S. SELLMAN.

To Messrs. Beall, Handy, Dudley, Pratt, Leigh and Dalrymple.

Senate chamber, Annapolis, Nov. 2, 1836.

To John S. Sellman, esq. member of the electoral college:

SIR: We should have deemed an answer to your letter of the 31st ultimo, unnecessary, except that you appear to misapprehend both the meaning of our letter, to which yours is a reply, and the spirit with which it was written. We have not been, and we beg to assure you, that we are incapable of being "fastidious" in our consideration, or action upon a question of such momentous importance, as the one which has been the subject of our correspondence.

We think we have evinced in our reply to yours of the 29th ultimo, a temper altogether conciliatory, and a disposition to say and do every thing, consistently with our sense of duty, to remove the unhappy and calamitous position in which the government of our state now stands. Such, at any rate, has been the only spirit which has actuated us in our personal intercourse and written correspondence with you.

It is unnecessary to cavil about the relative correctness of our recollections of the conversations referred to in this correspondence. In your letter of the 29th ultimo, you say that "from the position that parties have assumed, it is, in my opinion, worse than useless, even to anticipate the election of a senate without a compromise of conflicting interests," and in yours of the 31st ultimo, you say "I did state that I was not influenced by party views in the adjustment of this question, the statement I again reiterate, but I am certain I made no disclaimer in reference to any information that I might seek at your hands." We were unwilling to believe, that you intended in speaking of a compromise of conflicting interests, to refer to party interests, or that you could suppose it possible that we could have any intention to elect to the senate persons entertaining sentiments in regard to general politics, adverse to those of the party by which we were elected.—

As we are now forced by a review of your two letters to a different conclusion, we at once without concealment, and at the same time with perfect respect, inform you that such a proposition can never be made by us, or entertained by us, if intended to be made by you. The same proposition was made by the 19 electors as appeared by their communication to the public in September last. It never would have been concurred in by the 21 electors and we candidly believe does not receive the sanction of the reflecting portion of the party to which you are attached. We sincerely regret that you still are of the opinion that "no electoral quorum will ever be obtained unless some stronger assurance than that of constitutional reform, unaccompanied with a statement of what is intended to be reformed, is made." We had indulged the hope that our assurance that a state government would at all times have been formed, and that such a senate would still be elected, if an electoral quorum should attend, would have been entirely satisfactory. We confidently believe that the impossibility of our specifying the particular features of reform which would be deemed proper by the senate to be elected by us, would be apparent to yourself and to the whole people of the state. You are aware, every man in Maryland must be aware, that no such specification could be made without assuming to ourselves the authority of forming the constitution of the state according to our views of propriety, so far at least as the action of one branch of the legislature is connected therewith, a purpose altogether foreign to that for which we were elected, and the exercise of which would, in our opinion, involve a direct violation of our official duty. We did suppose that you and those who think with you upon this subject, would not only have been willing, but would have seen the absolute necessity of leaving the adjustment of the details of the conflicting views of the different portions of the state, to the body by which the work is to be done.

When we speak of reform, we do not mean to "hold the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope;" we are ready to elect for senators, men whose sentiments, high moral worth and intelligence shall be a guarantee of their entire willingness and ability to gratify the wants of the people of Maryland in regard to reform, whenever those wants shall be properly ascertained and made known to the legislature. We have never disguised this purpose.

In conclusion therefore permit us to say that we still hope that our expectations of producing a happy result will not be disappointed, and that after all that has passed you will not withhold from us your assistance in our efforts to arrest the impending evils, because we feel the impossibility of settling in advance the many and conflicting questions, which can only be adjusted by future concessions and compromise through wise and deliberate legislation. We have the honor to be your obedient servants,

GEORGE S. LEIGH,
SAMUEL J. K. HANDY,
RICHARD BEALL,
GEORGE DUDLEY,
THOS. G. PRATT.

Mr. Linthicum, of Anne Arundel county, another of the recusants, has addressed the following to the electors with whom he united in their refusal to enter the electoral college. Should another of the recusants resolve to enter the college, the constitutional majority (24) will be complete, and a senate elected before the meeting of the legislature called by the governor's proclamation on Monday next.

Elk Ridge, Nov. 12th, 1836.

To Messrs. McGill, Wason, Quinn, Fisher, Ellicott, Bell, Vansant, Harwood, Hope, Sutton, Keene, Fountain, Evans, G. A. Thomas, Duvall, J. B. Thomas and George.

GENTLEMEN: Believing that the course we adopted in seceding from the electoral college was expressive of the wishes of a majority of the people of Maryland, but not having been sustained by that majority, and being at all times willing to submit to the will of the people, I have determined to obey this will as expressed by the votes of the November election, and shall repair to Annapolis on Friday, the 18th inst. and on the 19th qualify as an elector of the senate, and I invite you to meet me there, for the purpose of joining in making a quorum.

I am, with much respect, your ob'd serv't,

WESLEY LINTHICUM.

On Wednesday last a meeting was held in Baltimore of the persons chosen to the extending convention, which is to convene at Annapolis on Monday next. All that has transpired as to the design of this preliminary meeting is stated in the following circular. The words in brackets were erased in the original circular.

"SIR: The undersigned, nominated [appointed] delegates to a convention proposed to be held at Annapolis, on the 21st of November having had a conference with each other, are of opinion that under the present circumstances, that convention would have no power to act as a convention of the people, but that they recommend that a meeting [convention] of the friends of reform, should be held, [at the above mentioned day and place] composed of those persons who have been appointed by the friends of the cause in the several counties of the state on the 7th inst. In order, therefore, to have a free conference as to the best mode of forwarding the cause, they respectfully propose a [preliminary] meeting in Baltimore, on Wednesday next [Saturday] 19th [18th] inst. at ten o'clock, to which they invite you and hope you will concur with them in the propriety of the measure.

Meeting in St. Mary's county.

At a meeting of the citizens of Saint Mary's county, held at the court house, in Leonard Town, on Tuesday the 8th November, agreeably to notice previously given, the following proceedings were had:

The meeting was called to order by Wm. J. Blakistone. Peter Gough, esq. was unanimously appointed chairman, and William Coad, esq. secretary. Wm. J. Blakistone presented a series of resolutions, accompanied by an address. H. G. S. Key followed next, moving a preamble and resolutions as a substitute. Judge Dorsey addressed the chair, and presented several propositions. John M. S. Causin also addressed the meeting and presented several propositions. George S. Leigh and Benedict J. Heard, esqrs. made some explanatory remarks.

The several propositions were then referred to a committee of five, consisting of Messrs. H. G. S. Key, Richard Thomas, William J. Blakistone, Richard H. Miles and John M. S. Causin, who unanimously reported the following resolutions to the meeting, all of which being considered by the meeting, were unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That this meeting deeply regret the course pursued by the nineteen recalcitrant electors of the senate of Maryland, who were elected for the performance of a specific duty, which duty they have refused to perform.

Resolved, That this meeting respectfully request the said electors to retrace their steps, and unite in the election of a senate, as in the opinion of this meeting it is their duty to do.

Resolved, That this meeting approve the course pursued by the twenty-one electors in proceeding to qualify, in conformity with the constitution, and continuing to keep the college open awaiting the decision of public opinion.

Resolved, That this meeting are ready and willing to meet their fellow citizens of the several counties and cities of this state, in a spirit of friendly compromise upon the subject of state reform, in the mode prescribed by the constitution.

Wm. J. Blakistone submitted the following order, which was unanimously adopted:

Ordered, That the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the chairman and secretary, and published in the several newspapers in this state, and in the National Intelligencer and the Globe.

PETER GOUGH, chairman.

WILLIAM COAD, secretary.

MR. BRECKINRIDGE'S LETTER TO DR. WARDLAW.

Soon after the discussion, at Glasgow, between the rev. R. J. Breckinridge and George Thompson, a meeting of the Glasgow Emancipation society was held, at which resolutions were adopted, approving of Mr. Thompson's course, arguments, &c. and in no modest terms condemning America, including her clergy and institutions. Dr. Wardlaw made himself prominent at this meeting by a speech, which called forth the following letter from Mr. Breckinridge. It will be read with interest. We have seldom seen a better specimen of a man foiling his antagonist with his own weapons. In every point of view, we think Mr. Breckinridge has well and nobly vindicated his country, and acquired new honor for himself.

[Philadelphia Press.

To the rev. Ralph Wardlaw, D. D. of Glasgow:

SIR: I observed in the London Patriot, of last week, an abstract of the proceedings of the Glasgow Emancipation society on the first of this month, at a public meeting held "for the purpose of expressing the sentiments of the society in reference to the recent discussion on American slavery, between the rev. R. J. Breckinridge and Mr. George Thompson." The greater portion of the report before me is occupied with a speech made by you on that occasion, in proposing to the meeting the following resolution, viz: "That, in the deliberate judgment of this meeting, the wish announced by Mr. George Thompson, to meet publicly any antagonist, especially any minister of the gospel from the United States on the subject of American slavery, or on any one of the branches of that subject, was dictated by a well-founded consciousness of the integrity of his purpose, and assurance of the correctness of his facts; and that the recent discussion in this city between him and the rev. R. J. Breckinridge, of Baltimore, has left, not merely unshaken, but confirmed and augmented, their confidence in the rectitude of his principles, the purity of his motives, the propriety of his measures, the fidelity of his statements, and the straightforward honesty and undaunted intrepidity of his zeal." This motion was seconded by the venerable and respected Dr. Kidstone, whose speech on the occasion is but briefly reported. Other resolutions, some of similar import, some of a general character, were offered and seconded by Dr. Heugh, and Messrs. Eadie, King, McLaren and Kettle. But, above all, the proceedings bear the signature of Robert Grahame, of Whitehill, whose venerable name is dear to every good man.

These proceedings, sir, have relieved me from a state of great and painful anxiety, as to the view my countrymen might take of the propriety of my taking any notice, more or less, of Mr. George Thompson. For, while nothing is further from my purpose than to wound the feelings of any friend of that individual, it is necessary to say that, in America, every one who is not an abolitionist, or, in other words, ninety-nine hundredths of the people, consider him not only unworthy of credit, but unworthy of notice. At length, I have a tangible proof by which to make my countrymen feel that persons of the utmost respectability, excellence, and piety in Britain, not only concur in all the principles and proceedings, but partake of all the prejudices and ignorance of this individual, and openly defend his flagitious course.

From this day forth, I deem myself fully acquitted on the only part of the subject which filled me with personal anxiety. For although you have not hesitated to speak in terms sufficiently disparaging of my humble efforts to defend this truth, yet, as you have given no reasons for the judgment you have delivered, those who read for themselves may escape the influence even of your authority; and as you have been pleased to decide on the whole merits of the case, as well as on the merits of the parties involved in it, I escape, of course, from the whole blame of having damaged the truth by feeble advocacy.

In this state of the case, it cannot surprise you that I turn with delight from those who have hitherto assailed me, and address myself to you; that I avail myself of the right arising from your free and repeated use of my name, and your judgments both upon my character and acts, to speak freely in return. Let us not forget the miserable trifling of Mr. Robert Bernard Hall. Let us pass over poor Moses Roper, who, it is but just to say, has written the most modest and sensible attack yet made on me. Let us even be moderate, in having absolutely silenced the garrulity of Mr. Thompson, who begs in his last note, which has just reached me in the Patriot of the 17th instant, I have that to say which you have not only invited, but challenged me to utter, and to which I ask your serious regard.

I have manifested my deference to the judgment of a Christian people, by discussing at its bar, questions purely national and personal, into which, under erroneous pretexts, they had interfered in a manner the most vexatious. I believed they were in great error; I presumed they were sincerely disposed to do good; I knew they were really doing us, and themselves, and the world harm; and challenged and forced into the matter, I have discussed it on its mere merits, admitting you and your people to be all you profess to be, and only endeavoring to prove that we were not as evil as you made us out. So far as you and those who can influence are concerned, you have declared that you remain more firmly than ever settled in your harsh judgments of us, and your fixed purpose to follow out all your offensive courses. Nay, you plainly declare that, rather than alter a tittle of your conduct, principles, opinions or demands on this subject, you prefer that all fellowship between us and you should terminate. That argument and conclusion, then, being complete and final, we need say no more. I am content to wait and see whether the American people will, at your suggestion, change their national constitution; or whether, in the event of the adequate majority for that purpose not being attainable, they will, at the inference of your argument, break up the confederacy, to regain your good opinion.

There is, as I have said, quite another view of the whole case. You say, in the course of your speech, "if our American brethren saw any thing in us which they thought, and justly thought, was an evil of sufficient magnitude to induce their kind offices for its suppression, we ought to feel obliged by their using their endeavors to stir us up to a due consideration of it, and to practical efforts for its removal." And in the context you are somewhat pointed in enforcing this idea, as containing in it a great rule of duty. In general, we have considered the ill-doing of this delicate office more hurtful than its omission. In particular, it has appeared to us as a pretext liable to infinite abuse, and practically resorted to most by those who had least ground and least right to display it. But, sir, I can hardly, either in faithfulness or honor, abstain any longer from its use. And the main object of this communication is to point out, in the actual condition of considerable portions of the British empire, evils, which really are, or which your party has declared to be, of so palpable and so monstrous a description, that decency would seem to require you to repress them, or be very modest in rebuking others while they exist.

1. To come at once to the grand cause of outcry against us—the unhappy and indefensible existence of slavery in many of the states. Will you be so good as to turn your eyes to the map of Africa, and fix them on a spot longer than half of western Europe? At its southern extremity find Cape Town. Then find the speech of Dr. Phillip, delivered in Exeter Hall ten days after you delivered yours. In that town and neighborhood are 9,000 British slaves!! Scattered over that vast peninsula are many thousand more of British slaves!! And yet the ear of day is dull with being told that, in the British empire, there were no slaves; and the very speech that has elicited these remarks was made at a meeting on the anniversary devoted to a glorious fact that never occurred, namely, "slave emancipation in the British colonies."

2. Turn, now, I pray you, to the map of Asia, and find the vast dominions which God has lent you there, embracing a population of one hundred and thirty millions of souls. Then look over a file of papers, and read a conversation that occurred in the commons house of parliament, but a short time back, between the honorable Mr. Buxton and sir J. Hobhouse, on the subject of British slavery in India!! There you will find it admitted that "domestic slavery prevails to a great extent" in India, "especially in Bengal." There you will find proof that no direct effort was ever made to abolish it, and reasons urged by the government why it cannot now be abolished, and why treaties now existing seem to render its future abolition impossible!

3. Turn your attention, next, to the western side of the Atlantic ocean, and see nearly a million of apprentices in the West India islands; and then remember what you have yourself said and written on the subject of this system; and call to mind the innumerable declarations made weekly, up and down the country, by those who belong to your party, and who, (at the Houdsworth Anti-Slavery society, on the 3d of this month) denounced it "as aggravated slavery, under the delusive name of apprenticeship," and denounce every "proposal of government" as only calculated to excite suspicion.

Do I draw an inference at all strained when I say that the subjects of a monarch, whose dominions in three quarters of the globe are, by their own showing, and by irrefragable proofs, covered with slaves, should deal somewhat gently with other nations who may chance to be in the same unhappy condition? Do I say too much when I caution such people to be more guarded in boastful assertions, which are contradicted by the fact and the record of the case? Do I give needless offence when I beg you to remember that your parliament is omnipotent over this subject, and is therefore responsible for all the evils which exist, either through their negligence or by their consent? Alas, sir, it is an ancient habit, to be bitter against our brother for a mote, when a beam is in our own eye.

But I have more to add. We have been spoken against with great severity for neglect of the spiritual welfare of the colored population of the U. States; and you have, in an unhappy hour, said you believed and approved these hard sayings. I have in vain denied; in vain disproved them. My object now is, to show the condition of the country whose people bring and credit them, still keeping the line of duty indicated by your suggestion.

4. Let me beg you, then, to look at the condition of Lower Canada, where the Roman Catholic religion is established by treaty and by law, where annual grants of public money are made to support it, and where it has had free course, until the people are so ignorant that by statute law the grand jurors and the school commissioners are allowed the privilege of making their marks instead of signing their names, and where, according to the belief of the whole universe, except Papists, a system of idolatrous worship is guaranteed by the power of the British realm.

5. Then look over the votes in the committee of supply in the present parliament, and you will see £3,928 "for the Roman Catholic college at Maynooth," (which is just about the sum the vilified Americans pay annually to promote the religion of Jesus Christ in Western Africa, through the Colonization society), and I ask you as a Christian, to resolve the questions, which of these enterprises you deem most injurious to true religion? which you and your party have most actively opposed? and which is most under your eye and control? Heaven and earth are moved to prevent the spread of the gospel in Africa, through the Colonization society; and not a whisper is heard to prevent the increase of idolatry in your own land, through governmental patronage.

6. But a more frightful case remains. Remember that you have one hundred millions of heathen alone in your Indian possessions; then read the noble speech of the rev. W. Campbell, a missionary from Bangalore, delivered at Exeter hall, at the last annual meeting of the London Missionary society. There, sir, you will find positive proof that the horrid system of Hindoo idolatry, in all its cruelty and corruption, is upheld, partaken of, and made a source of gain by the British authorities in India! Temples are supported by the government; priests and dancing women are paid a monthly allowance out of the public revenue; magistrates are present and aiding officially at their brutal ceremonies; military officers do their peculiar honors to the abominable thing; and British functionaries collect the wages of iniquity. And now, sir, what can the eagerness of party zeal find, in all its false allegations against us, equal to the naked deformity of these facts?

7. But pass again to another portion of your wide empire. In multitudes of publications I have seen our alleged neglect of the religious instruction of the colored population of America made the basis of insinuations against the sincerity of our religious profession. If you will read the speech of Dr. Phillip, already alluded to, you will find the following sentence: "Boteman, a Caffre chief, and others, have been petitioning me for missionaries, by every messenger through whom they could convey to me a verbal communication, for the last twelve years; and I have not yet been able to send them one." Gracious heaven! what an account will the twenty thousand Protestant ministers of Great Britain have to render for the souls of these poor Caffres, whom so many of them have forgotten, to abuse their brethren in America for neglecting a population amongst whom a larger proportion hear the gospel, than of the inhabitants of the capital of the British empire.

Let us look at London, the seat of your wealth, power and civilization; the abode of your sovereign; the seat of your parliament; the see of a bishop, whose income would support a hundred missionaries. Listen to what the bishop says of so much of his diocese as is contained in the metropolis. "There are," says he, "thirty-four parishes, containing above 10,000 souls each, (omitting all notice of those which contain less), and in the aggregate 1,137,000 souls: but there is church room for only 101,682—less than one-tenth of the whole! Allow one church for every 3,000 souls, and 379 churches would be required; while in fact there are but 69: or if consecrated chapels be added, only 100." That is, above 1,000,000 souls in a single city, and that city the seat of your glory, utterly unprovided for by the nation and the established church.—Now, if we should add what is done by dissenters of all classes, and add also the destitute of the small parishes, the result might be varied a little; but still, make the best of it you can, and you are left with more people destitute of the means of grace in London alone, than in all the United States! If you doubt these statements of the lord bishop of London, consult the proceedings of the last annual meeting of the city missions; and then ponder whether the hundreds of pounds squandered on Mr. Thompson's trip to the United States, and in printing his slanders of that country, and the additional hundreds which I see Dr. Heugh urged the people of Glasgow to give him by way of "testimonial fund," might not have been fully as well laid out in sending the gospel to the British capital?

8. Besides, the accusations now made your own, on the general subjects of slavery in itself considered, and neglect of the religious instruction of the natives—the remaining charges which we have been arraigned upon—may, to a certain extent, fall under the general head of severity, injustice and deep-rooted prejudice against the blacks.—These things may be true, or they may be false. The statements and evidence on both sides are in reach of the public. You have vouched for their truth, and it is not now my design to show the contrary, but to show who they are that are so ready to magnify real errors, and to allege false crimes upon their neighbors.

9. Pray, sir, were you ever in Ireland? If you were, you saw a land fertile and beautiful; a people handsome, intelligent and active; a climate more genial than any other in so high a northern latitude; in short, every thing that should make its teeming population rich, happy and powerful. I was there; I saw hundreds of people who had no fixed abodes. I saw the majority of the houses of the lower classes to be worse than the stables and cowhouses in England; I saw thousands in rags; hundreds naked; and hundreds more naked, except a piece of a single old garment. I looked at the third report on the expediency of a poor law for Ireland, made by order of parliament, and I found that 2,835,000 souls are out of work, have nothing to depend on, and are in distress for thirty weeks every year. It is a settled, indisputable truth, that one-third of the Irish people beg their bread two-thirds of every year. And yet enormous quantities of grain and live stock, and all sorts of provisions, are exported from Ireland. And yet, in defiance of all this tremendous, long-continued and periodical suffering, there is no poor law, nor any sort of general provision by law, for the poor of that island. But there are forty-nine regiments of horse and foot, and a constabulary force of about equal magnitude, ready to stay the people's stomachs with lead at night and steel in the morning. This is the happy consummation of six hundred years of British authority! And how can you, sir, look any human being in the face, and charge his country with wrong, till you have strained every effort to redress this vast hereditary guilt? Or if you fail, how can you speak, nationally, in the hearing of earth or heaven, about human wrongs?

10. Look for the last time to the vast plains of South Africa, wet with the blood of murdered nations. Read the clear and masterly speech of Dr. Phillip, already twice referred to. "If a traveller, who had visited that country twenty-five years ago, were to take his stand on the banks of the Keiskamma river, and ask what had become of the natives whom he saw there on his former visit; if he took his stand on the rocks of the Sondago river, and looked towards a country seventy miles in breadth before him, he might ask the same question; if he were to take his stand again on the Fish river, and then extend his views to Caffraria, he might ask the same question; and were he to take his stand on the Snow mountain, called Graaf Reinet, (he would have before him a country containing 40,000 square miles), and ask where was the immense concourse he saw there twenty-five years ago, no man could tell him where they were!"—Ask lord Glenelg, his majesty's principal secretary for the colonies, and he will admit that the system of treachery, plunder and butchery, by which these brave and upright savages have been wasted in exterminating oppression, constitutes perhaps the most degrading of all the chapters of the history of mankind! It is a chapter written in the tears and blood of slaughtered tribes, and is hardly yet dry upon the paper that records it for the execration of posterity! It is a chapter that had not been fully enacted when you were concocting plans and arranging agencies by which to make illustrious the benign sway of universal freedom, justice and benevolence in your monarchy—and to brand upon our republic reproaches which all coming generations could not efface.

But why need I multiply particulars? When these things are set right, and you seek from us another list, we will say to you concerning your polity, in nearly all its parts, things which you will then be better able to hear. We will point out how you may establish real freedom amongst yourselves, and thereby show your acquaintance with its sacred principles; how you can make your laws just, equal and humane, and thereby manifest in practice your devotion to principles commended for others. At present, such a proceeding could only irritate, and is the more readily forborne, because it is not as an American or a republican, but as a Christian, my mission brought me to you. The assurance, too, that the party with which you act is, in point of numbers, a very small minority of the British nation, makes me the more willing to adhere to this view of my duty. Indeed, it is chiefly because your party has much of its strength in that sect to which I was more particularly sent, that it seemed clearly necessary for me to take part at all in these discussions.

I readily admit that time, patience, sacrifices and much labor, are needful for the redress of the evils I have pointed out. I know that the present generation is not responsible, in such a sense, for most of them, as past generations have been. I am convinced that multitudes of Englishmen deplore, and would gladly remove them. I am satisfied that it is by the silent influence of example, and the kind and clear exposition of general principles, rather than rude and harsh personal or national assaults, that we can do you good, in these or similar cases. And I gladly declare my belief, that the Christians of America, as such, can and ought to hold Christian intercourse and sympathy with the Christians of Britain, notwithstanding that the British nation may be responsible in the matters alleged; and that we can and ought to do it—without perpetual vituperation and insult, even for what is true—not to say without gross perversions of the facts and merits of the case. Such, sir, are my views of the subject. I deeply regret that yours are so widely different. And I humbly beseech you to imagine the whole course of your proceedings and arguments—embracing of course the mission of Mr. Thompson, and his conduct since his return—made ours, and our case made yours; and then decide what would by this time have been the feelings of your people towards us, if we had treated you as you have treated us. I declare, in the presence of God, my firm belief, that if things go on much longer as they have progressed for the last two years, there will not be found on earth men more estranged from each other than the professors of religion in the two countries. I have already witnessed the spectacle of a part of the religious press in England urging forward the government of the country to an intervention, if necessary, with arms, against the progress of liberty in Texas, upon the false and ignorant pretext that the government of the United States, unless prevented by force, would possess itself of that country, and introduce slavery there!—The people generally of America are long ago roused to the highest pitch of indignation against your proceedings in this whole business. You have now reduced the Christians of that country to a position, where, if they act with you, or admit your previous statements or principles, they become, on your own showing, infamous! You may now behold in the preceding statement the posture in which all the world but yourselves have viewed you during all this terrible affair!

Was it ignorance of your real condition, or was it ignorance still more gross of ours, or was it national vanity and prejudice, or was it all these unitedly, that impelled the abolition party in Britain to pursue the course they have adopted? It is not my desire to give offence, and I will not, therefore, attempt to decide. Your party profess to have full and accurate information about us; though it is very odd that, at your meeting, Dr. Heugh moved and Mr. Eadie seconded, and your "very numerous and highly respectable meeting" unanimously voted, that our national constitution contained a very important principle, which is not only not in it at all, but which the very discussion you were pronouncing on, ex cathedra, proved not to be in it! Well-informed gentlemen, not to say just judges, should be more cautious. It does not become me to say that your party are ignorant of the condition of their own country; but if they knew the facts now commended to their notice, it is not easy to reconcile their singular disregard of them, with their rampant benevolence on the other side of the water; and if they were unacquainted with them, they had better stay at Jericho till their beards be grown. Upon the delicate and painful subject of national prejudice, it is difficult to speak properly at all; but especially so to gentlemen whose passion lies in surmounting all prejudice whatever. The John Bull newspaper is said to represent the views and feelings of the extreme high church and tory party; the Record is the reputed vehicle for low church sentiments; the Patriot, I am told, stands in the same relations to the congregational dissenters, embracing both Baptists and Independents, who are generally whigs and radicals; the Times, which, from its great ability, must always wield a vast influence, is considered the organ of the Independent conservative interest. I am very likely to be mistaken; but I have tried to inform myself of your condition—and this is what I learn. Be so good, sir, as to read any editorial article in either of these papers, for the last four months, in which it was necessary to express opinions or feelings in regard to the United States, and you will at once catch my present drift. But to aid such as have neither time nor opportunity for such a review, excuse the following sample from a late number of the last named paper: "In short, this is just the wretched 'colonization scheme,' to which those pious slave owners, the Baptists, Independents and Presbyterians of the United States, have betaken themselves, as a plaster to their consciences, rank and rotten with hypocrisy; and though that holy American humbug may command a congenial support from the canting zealots of liberty and lashes, hallelujahs and horse-whippings, bibles and brutality, missions and murders, religious revivals merging in slave auctions, and love feasts terminating in Lynch law," &c. &c. It is but justice to say that I have seen equal grossness only in the John Bull, and in Mr. Thompson's speeches, to some of which latter this has a most suspicious resemblance. It is my duty also to declare, which I do with sincere pleasure, that the present foreign secretary of the king (lord Palmerston) and the journals which speak the sentiments of the government, are by far better informed, and more candid in regard to American affairs in general, than any others whose published views have come to my knowledge.

I may, in the end, be permitted to suggest that perhaps too much has been said in relation to the existing and prospective intercourse between the churches of the two countries; and, possibly, too much consequence attached to it by myself, as well as others. I have uttered the sentiments of those who sent me, in their name, and endeavored to enforce them by such considerations as appeared to me just and appropriate. But I am not aware of any thing having transpired which would justify the supposition that America, or her churches, looked for any advantage which was not likely to be reciprocal, in being permitted to hold this intercourse. Still less can I conceive that any one could be justified in demanding of our churches, as conditions of it, not only adhesion to moral principles which we reject, but the procurement of political changes which are impossible. Yet, if I comprehend the drift of all British abolitionism, it stops not a whit short of this.

It was the world, more than America, we sought to benefit. We had no purpose of attempting a revolution in Britain; nor did it enter into our conceptions that the revolution in America, of the most terrible event, would be dictated to us in terms hardly supportable. It was the benighted heathen for whose good we were laying plans; and the thought of personal advantage, or honor, or enjoyment, to any portion of ourselves, had never place for a moment, nor even ground for exercise; and, therefore, we must needs be proof against all discriminating threats. It is quite gratuitous for the sects of England to decline receiving our delegates, except they be abolitionists—which many individuals and some public meetings have recommended—which the Baptists, if I am rightfully informed, have virtually done, and which seems nothing beyond the compass of your argument.

Indeed, this aspect of the case is so very far from the one which the facts exhibit, that I am greatly surprised that wisdom, if not kindness, did not prevent its presentation. For I believe no delegate who has gone from Britain to America has been assailed, in public and private, on any of the great evils at which I have hinted in this communication, as every delegate who has come from America to Britain has been assailed on the subject of slavery. I believe, too, you would search in vain in America for any man who had received from any sect or institution in Britain any token of respect or esteem; while it will be equally hard to find in Britain any man amongst any sect to which any delegate from America has ever come, who is not indebted to us for all the consequence he has derived from literary and theological distinctions denied to him at home, but bestowed by the kinder or more discerning spirit of strangers!

For my own part, without intending to commit the folly of depreciating a great nation, I am obliged to say that the thing which surprised me most in England was the universal ignorance which prevails in regard to America; while the thing which grieved me most was the almost equally universal prejudice against us.

You do not know us. You have little sympathy with us. You do us wrong in all your thoughts.—In regard to all these points, I believe there is but one mind amongst all Americans, not being abolitionists, who have been in England. And if you have been pleased to express the hope that I would return to America materially changed in many of my views and principles, I have only to say in reply, that, so profound is my sense of the false estimate you put on every thing national, as between us and you, my visit to England has opened a new source of devotion, in gratitude to God that he permitted your ancestors to persecute ours out of it.—So little impression of the kind you expect has all that I have been forced to hear in England against my country and my brethren produced, that when I return to embrace again those beloved men, I shall revere them more, as I measure them by all I have known elsewhere; and when my weary feet touch that sacred land, I shall rejoice in the very "dust and stones thereof," as more precious than the pearls of all lands beside!

If I may not call you my fellow Christian without offence, I can at least sign myself your fellow sinner,
R. J. BRECKINRIDGE.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

From the (Ravenna) Ohio Star.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Ravenna, Oct. 15, 1836.

DEAR SIR: The leaders of the Van Buren party are every where circulating reports that our distinguished citizen, general Harrison, while a member of the general assembly, voted in favor of a bill to sell poor debtors into slavery. This is the last and most malicious slander invented to render general Harrison unpopular with the people, and it ought to be refuted before it shall poison the public mind.

I have been informed that you were a member of the legislature during the pendency of the bill in question before the legislature, and that you are acquainted with the origin, nature and history of the bill. If such be the case, I should be happy to receive a communication from you upon the subject, as it would enable me to subvert the cause of the people in this country, in the great contest now going on between the people and the office holders, by vindicating the conduct and reputation of an individual, who, both as a statesman in the halls of legislation, and a soldier upon the tented field, has expended his time, money and energies in behalf of his country. Very respectfully, yours,
WM. S. C. OTIS.

Hon. Elisha Whittlesey.

Canfield, Oct. 17, 1836.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 15th was received last evening. You refer to the slanderous reports in circulation, charging general Harrison with having voted to sell poor debtors, "and having been a member of the house of representatives, you ask me to state what was the origin, nature, object and history of the bill in question."

I never knew there was a bill to sell, "poor debtors," nor any provision in a bill for that purpose.—The persons who first gave circulation to the slanders knew their statements were false.

I am obliged to leave home immediately, in conformity with an arrangement made last week to attend to business, which will probably detain me several days, and I cannot go as fully into the history of the bill as I would if time permitted.

If the public, however, will not be convinced that the accusation is basely false by the clear and lucid statements made by gen. Harrison, about the time when a similar charge was brought against him, it will not be convinced by any statement that any other person can make, nor by the record itself. The 1st session of the 19th general assembly commenced on the 4th of December, 1820. At that time property possessed, perhaps, less value than at any other period of our history. Land had fallen to a nominal price, and the produce of the farmers was valueless beyond the quantity consumed here. Emigration was at a stand, and there were no markets abroad, and, if there had been, the expense of transportation to any eastern or northern market would have been greater than the value of the produce.

That legislature found the state in debt about $30,000, and, from the great scarcity of money, an unusual defalcation in the payment of taxes.

The penitentiary system was in operation, but so far from the convicts maintaining the institution, no more than 10,925 62 was received from that source when the auditor made his first report.

The more aggravated offences (less than murder in the first degree) were punished in the penitentiary, which left a very numerous class to be punished by imprisonment in the county jails, and by fine.

Most of the counties were deeply involved in debt, and their orders were selling for from fifty to seventy-five cents on the dollar, and, by being demanded, were put on interest at their full amount.

It was in this state of things, and in this condition of the county, that the "act entitled an act supplementary to the act for the punishment of certain offences therein named," was brought forward, discussed and finally passed. "An act for the punishment of crimes," was passed at the same session.

The question was presented to the members of the legislature whether they should further tax their constituents to sustain convicts in idleness, or put it within their power to maintain themselves, and, if they would not willingly do it, then to vest discretionary power in the court of common pleas to compel them to do it.

I voted for the section in the house, which general Harrison and Mr. Baldwin voted against striking out in the senate. I thought I was right then, and I am convinced now of having been in an error.

I have thus far in life acted on the principle that labor is not disgraceful to any person. And if it is not to a man who has violated no moral municipal law, I have not been able to perceive why it is to a person who is polluted with crime.

By looking into the act, it will be found that the sixteenth section permitted the person who should be sentenced to pay a fine under its provisions, or under the provisions of the act to which it was supplementary, to discharge the fine by labor on the highway in the township in which the convict resided.

The seventeenth section authorized any two judges of the court of common pleas to put a convict, sentenced to imprisonment alone, to hard labor, and for that purpose to take him from jail, and to direct that he be so secured as to prevent an escape.

These sections formed a part of the law as it passed, and yet no exception is taken to them.

The sixteenth section merely permitted the convict to labor on the highway to pay his fine, when the nineteenth section, as it went from the house, authorized the court, in its discretion, to make it a part of the sentence, that the sheriff might sell the labor of the person at public vendue to pay his fine. The section was draughted on the principle that, if the court should find a case where they thought it would be safe to take a man from jail and let him labor to pay his fine, it might so direct. The court could not determine what his labor would be worth. The labor of one man might be worth fifty cents, when the labor of another man might be worth two dollars a day. The sheriff ought not to determine the price, for he might put the convict to work with a friend at a less compensation than his labor was worth. The convict was the one most deeply interested in having his labor put up at sale, and hence the provision that the sale of the labor should be after ten days' advertised notice, and at public vendue. To secure the rights of the convict, and to prevent a purchaser from tyrannizing over him, he was to be placed on the footing of an apprentice.

A court cannot liberate a convict from jail to pay his fine, without being authorized by law, notwithstanding he may himself most ardently desire it. I justify the section on the ground, first, that if the convict should wish to be liberated, to work to pay a fine, he should be permitted to do it; and, secondly, if he should be unwilling, but able to work, he should be compelled to do it, in suitable cases.

I will not tax a man who has to work daily to maintain himself and family, to support a stout healthy man in jail, under the idea that a convict is too much of a gentleman to labor. The tendency is mischievous enough to permit a gentleman dandy to live on the hard earnings of others.

The object of the section was, humanity towards the convict, and justice towards the community and himself.

The law, in its tenderness as well as in its justice and policy, has fully provided for the protection of an apprentice in all his rights. A convict is not disgraced by having his rights protected by a similar law. Very respectfully, yours,

E. WHITTLESEY.

Zanesville, Tuesday evening, Nov. 1st, 1836.

To gen. W. H. Harrison:

The undersigned a portion of your fellow citizens of the county of Muskingum, had expected to yield you a warm support at the coming election of president of the United States, under the impression made by various public declarations that you are a politician of the old Virginia school.

In your address, this afternoon, you were understood to say that you had supported the tariff and internal improvement system, and that you are still in favor of it. If it were your intention to declare yourself favorable to the compromise law, which is now in existence, and which calmed that agitated state of our country, to which the American System gave rise, we concur with you altogether, and shall be happy if such be the fact. But if it be your opinion that the American System should be revived, and that a tariff should be laid for the purpose of protecting manufactures, and making internal improvements, instead of raising a revenue merely sufficient to meet the wants of the government we cannot concur with you.

Acting under the influence of that freedom of inquiry, which you so eloquently urged in the close of your address, we respectfully ask an explanation of your views on this subject, Zanesville, 2d November, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I had the honor, this moment, to receive your communication of yesterday. I regret that my remarks of yesterday were misunderstood in relation to the tariff system. What I mean to convey was, that I had been a warm advocate for that system, upon its first adoption, that I still believed in the benefits it had conferred upon the country. But I certainly never had, nor never could have any idea of reviving it. What I said was, that I would not agree to the repeal as it now stands. In other words, I am for supporting the compromise act, and never will agree to its being altered or repealed.

In relation to the internal improvement system I refer you for my sentiments, to my letter to the hon. Sherrod Williams.

I am, in great haste, with great respect, your fellow citizen,

W. H. HARRISON.

TEXAS.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT, TO THE FIRST CONGRESS OF THE REPUBLIC OF TEXAS.

Fellow citizens of the senate and house of representatives:

The assembling of the elect representatives of a free and sovereign people, within the late department of Texas, is an event that calls for the warmest gratulations of every patriot heart. But mutual felicitations alone, would be inadequate to express the high sentiments that ought to pervade our bosoms on this solemn and interesting occasion. Hotter and loftier feelings become us; for it is meet that we raise our thoughts and our thanksgivings to that omnipotent Being who rules the universe, directs the affairs of empires, and guides the destiny of all.

Among the many revolutions that have varied the political condition of men, few have exemplified more clearly, than that in which we are now engaged, the controlling supervision, and the high approbation of a beneficent Providence. We have realized by actual demonstration, that "the battle is not always with the strong." The enemy came upon us, a well marshalled host—with great vigor and might: but he was repelled by a mere handful of patriots, and the flush of his confidence, inspired by numbers, was turned to paleness and trembling. It therefore behoves us, in the spring-time of our national existence, to lift up our hearts with devout gratitude to the God of battles, that peradventure He may continue his blessings and vouchsafe to us a happy issue to all our labors.

On you, fellow citizens, members of the first congress of the republic of Texas, labors of the most arduous, the most interesting, and the most important character devolve. To you is committed the beginning of legislation; and as you shall lay the foundation, so will be reared the superstructure.—On you, therefore, rests the high responsibility of giving political character, and moral reputation, to one just born into the family of nations. The present generation will feel and exhibit the impress of your doings, and our prosperity will transmit it to generations unborn. I pray, therefore, that in all your deliberations, you may be so guided by a spirit of wisdom, of justice, and of truth, that when the star of Texas shall culminate in all its brightness, it may shed forth a glorious and beneficent light. And whether she takes her situation among the illustrious constellation of the north, or revolve on her own axes and within her own sphere, that she may display, not only the goodness of God, but the wisdom and prescience of her early legislators.

On me rests the duty of presenting to your considerations a brief exhibit of our present political condition; and to suggest such measures as may be best adapted to supply the wants, secure the well-being, and develop the resources of our beautiful country. In the execution of this task, there is much to excite embarrassment and apprehension; but more to animate our hopes and foster a spirit of perseverance. Many difficulties have been overcome, and many remain to be subdued. But a sincere devotion to the public weal, will easily surmount them all; and Texas will soon be enabled to assert a legitimate claim to be received among the nations of the earth.

The government ad interim, over which I have the honor to preside, has hitherto conducted its labors under every imaginable difficulty. At the institution of that government, the forces of the enemy were rapidly advancing into the country, with an imposing array. The means of repelling the formidable invasion were not of sufficient power to inspire general confidence, and many families had abandoned their homes and were fleeing from the approaching devastation. The entire settlements from the Nueces to the Colorado had been broken up, and the fall of the Alamo, where the gallant Travis and his brave associates consecrated their lives to the liberty of Texas, had spread dismay even to the line of the Brazos. Our military force in the field was greatly inferior in numbers to that of the host which was marching against us; and were it not that there was a vast discrepancy between the military capacities of the opposing armies, the subjugation of Texas would have appeared inevitable. But that discrepancy had constituted an important ground of confidence in the secession, that it was worthy of all estimation; for it was a discrepancy not of military prowess, but of moral attributes and of political knowledge.

The administration which had been organized at the town of Washington, deemed it expedient to change its location to Harrisburg, from which point it could possess an easier access to foreign countries, from whence our chief supplies of munitions were to be obtained, and a more direct supervision of the naval and other maritime concerns. Such removal was accordingly effected with in a few days after the government was created.

At this gloomy period, the financial affairs of the country were in a condition more deplorable than its military equipments. The commissioners, Messrs. Austin, Archer and Wharton, appointed by the late provisional government, had negotiated a loan for two hundred thousand dollars, and another for fifty thousand, with sundry individuals in the city of New Orleans. It was doubtless the best arrangement that could be made at that period. Mr. Robert Triplett a principal subscriber to each of the above loans, presented himself to the government of Harrisburg. Twenty thousand dollars had been paid in on the first loan, and the whole of the second was advanced. The ratification of these loans had been submitted to the convention, and by them was referred to the executive government.—On inspecting the terms of the loans, some of the conditions were considered inadmissible. The exclusive right to an immediate location of the scrip, was a privilege, which it was believed would cause infinite dissatisfaction in the country, and be especially obnoxious to the volunteers of the army; the nature of whose service, would seem to preclude any right of priority of location in others. For no species of public service is considered more onerous, or more entitled to recompense, than that which is rendered in the field of battle. Under these impressions, we proposed to Mr. Triplett a modification of the loans, and agreed to reduce the price of the land, or rather to make a donation of thirty-two leagues of land, to be distributed pro rata among the stockholders, in consideration of a relinquishment of the right of priority of location, conceded to them, by the terms of the original contract. The modification was accepted by Mr. Triplett for himself. He was not vested with authority to bind his co-lenders; but he expressed an opinion that they also would accede to it. From the first loan, the government confidently anticipated a fiscal aid of some importance, in the then pressing emergency, but as the sequel will disclose, they were unhappily disappointed. Mr. Triplett, on his return to the United States presented his modified contract to his associate stockholders, and to our surprise they unanimously voted against its reception, and declined advancing the residuum of the loan.

Some disappointment resulted from the decision of the lenders; and the government felt the inconvenience of an illusory anticipation. A new proposition has been made to the lenders, to adjust the amounts advanced, on the principles of the modified contract, but no definite answer has been had to that overture. The presumption is, that it will not be accepted, and that the settlement of the whole transaction will devolve on congress, for I have long since determined to submit the whole matter to your decision.

The result of this negotiation afforded conclusive evidence of the impracticability of anticipating the wants of the country, by ordinary loans. Some other course was necessary, and the government resolved to issue scrip for land considering the public domain as the most available and the least objectionable source of public revenue. Accordingly, the agent appointed in New Orleans, Thomas Toby, esq. a gentleman who had already made considerable advances on account of the government, and had manifested a warm sympathy in our behalf, was authorized to issue scrip to the amount of five hundred thousand acres of land, to be located on the public domain of Texas; and to dispose of it, at the established minimum price of fifty cents per acre. He has subsequently been empowered to extend his issues to one million of acres.

The finances of the country is a subject of vast importance, and will commend itself to the early and serious attention of congress. The adoption of a plan for a permanent and certain revenue is indispensable; and I trust your combined intelligence will suggest such a system as will answer the great purposes intended, and will afford a general satisfaction to your constituents. The principal points to be observed in drawing contributions from the people, for the support of the government, are equality of burden, and facility and cheapness of collection. Unequal taxation is one of the most odious features of despotism.

A number of patriotic citizens have voluntarily executed their bonds for various sums, and tendered them to the government, with a view to relieve the present exigencies of the country. These bonds, amounting in the aggregate to one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, have been transmitted to the agents, Messrs. T. Toby and Brother, by the quarter master general, and a hope is entertained that they will prove a present convenience.

Duties on imports and in some cases on exports, constitute a convenient and economical mode of supplying the public necessities, and are less onerous to individuals than almost any other impost. They therefore form a part of the financial resources of all countries. The idea of a free international commerce is a modern improvement, that reflects great credit on the philanthropy of the present age; and it is much to be regretted that the entanglements of ancient institutions, and the inveteracy of confirmed habits, have prevented its adoption by the principal nations of the earth. While these oppose it by cordons of custom houses and ponderous codes of revenue laws, it would be vain and ineffective, for a nation just springing into existence, to attempt its practical establishment. When the abundant intrinsic resources of our country shall be fully developed, then it may be the peculiar glory of Texas, to invite the kindred nations of the earth, to an unembarrassed intercommunion of their diversified products. The effect of such a system, on the peace and happiness of nations, and on the comforts and enjoyments of individuals, would transcend all that has heretofore been accomplished, by the straightened and selfish spirit of commerce; and that spirit, parsimonious and jealous as it is, has done much to meliorate the condition of man, by dispensing the munificent and various benefactions of Providence, to and from the remotest climes. The institution of a tariff is a matter of great delicacy, requiring a minute attention to the smallest concerns of domestic life. An excessive or disproportionate charge, upon one necessary article of merchandise, would violate the grand principle of equalization; and I trust you will be enabled, so to order the assessments, so as to avoid that evil. The experience of the nation from which we have seceded, affords abundant testimony of the pernicious consequences of an overcharged tariff. An exorbitant rate of duty, not only defeats itself, by presenting allurements to evasions of the law, but it has a tendency to demoralize a valuable portion of the community. It is one of the most interesting purposes of legislation, to purify and elevate the standard of moral sentiment among the people.

The military organization of the country is defective in many respects, and will require your early attention. The law offering a bounty in lands to volunteers, expired by its own limitation, on the first of July, and since that period a number of volunteers have arrived in the country to aid in its defence. Common justice would seem to require, that the same remuneration be conceded to them, that is rendered to their predecessors in the chivalrous enterprise, for they were doubtless actuated by similar motives, and stimulated by similar inducements.

From the present aspect of our foreign relations, we have every reason to believe that a farther accession of these generous champions of liberty, may be desirable, and arrangements are made which I trust will be adequate to all our wants in this respect. But I would recommend to your consideration the propriety of withholding all inducements to enlistments for short periods of time; for it is very apparent that a volunteer for three or six months can scarcely be familiarized with the ordinary duties of a camp, before his term of service expires. The continuation of the land bounty system, is perhaps expedient, but it is also desirable that it be made as effective as possible, in the grand purpose of its creation.

The report of the secretary of war will inform you of the present condition of the army. Its numerical strength has been fluctuating on account of the frequent accessions and discharges of volunteers under short enlistments. A more permanent establishment will obviate this, with many other and more serious evils.

The army has suffered, and is still suffering some privations; but considering the very limited financial resources of the government, their supplies have been as abundant and as regularly administered, as could reasonably be expected. The executive government has been anxiously and assiduously intent upon rendering them as comfortable as possible, and if occasional failures have occurred, they are attributable to inevitable circumstances. The quarter master general has been sent to New Orleans, for the purpose of facilitating the procurement of supplies from that quarter. The approach of winter admonishes us of the great necessity of obtaining comfortable clothing, and ample provisions for our gallant troops, whose exposures in the tented field, will command your earliest and most active solicitudes. Orders to a large amount have been transmitted, for provisions, clothes and other requisites; and a hope is entertained that an adequate supply will be speedily obtained. But orders had previously issued of a similar character, and owing to the want of means, they have resulted in disappointment.

The present condition of the navy, is by no means commensurate with the importance of that arm of the public defence. The defect of means has restrained the executive government from effecting any actual increase of its strength. Some efforts have been made to improve its organization. Conceiving it of importance that an immediate and responsible commander-in-chief should be created, who was himself a practical man, and practically engaged in the service, I appointed, with the advice and consent of the cabinet, Charles E. Hawkins, esq. a gentleman whose gallantry and nautical science, would grace any service, to that high office, with the rank of commodore. The operations of the navy have been as efficient as could have been expected. They have prevented any depredations on our coast, by the enemy, and have expelled his maritime forces from the gulf. The want of one or more vessels, of a larger class than any in the service, is sensibly felt, and no efforts should be untried, to accomplish the important acquisition. One brig of 18 guns, in conjunction with our present force, would secure to us the command of the gulf, and greatly facilitate the operations of our own army, while it would enable us to embarrass every military operation of the enemy.

The judicial department of the government is in a very imperfect state. By the constitution, the old system is abolished and an entirely new judiciary created: but it was not considered advisable, by the executive government, to make any further innovation upon the established courts, than necessity imperiously demanded. The courts were closed to civil business, and they were thought to be adequate to the conservation of the public peace of the country. But I am apprehensive that opinion is illusory, and that a more energetic administration of criminal justice, is indispensable. The increase of crime, is an inevitable concomitant of population. Under the existing system, there was no tribunal in the country, vested with maritime jurisdiction, and consequently, none competent to adjudicate questions, arising from captures on sea.—Some prizes had already been taken, and it was due to the character of the navy and of the country, that a regular and lawful disposition, should be made of them. The government, therefore, concluded to appoint a district judge for the district of Brazos; within which, it was probable, all prizes taken, would be brought, or to which they could easily be transported. I accordingly appointed Benjamin C. Franklin, esq. to that office. It remains for the wisdom of congress to determine how soon the new organization shall be perfected.

The recent and much lamented decease of the honorable Bailey Hardeman, whose devoted patriotism and inflexible integrity are well known, and who has been with me through all the vicissitudes of the times, deprives me of the pleasure of presenting to you a regular report from the treasury department. The principal intelligence in my power to convey, you will find in the auditor's expose, herewith transmitted. The importance of filling the vacancy in that interesting department of the government, induced me to invite to it, Bernard E. Bee, esq. a gentleman of high character, to whom I had previously designed tendering the office of secretary of state, to which office I have nominated him.

The post office department, created by the late provisional government, ceased its operations soon after the advance of the enemy within our settlements, and they have not been resumed. The great importance of instituting the means of transmitting intelligence throughout the country, scarcely involves a question: and I doubt not you will render an early attention to this interesting subject. The want of such means has been seriously felt by the present administration.

It will be recollected that the powers conferred on the government ad interim were extraordinary; that they comprised the plenary attributes of sovereignty, the legislative and judicial functions excepted. The circumstances under which that government has been administered have been equally extraordinary. Sometime, when Texas was a moving mass of fugitives, they have been without "a local habitation," and scattered to the cardinal points; again they have been on Galveston island, without a shelter, and almost without subsistence; and never have they been in circumstances of comfort and convenience, suitable to the orderly conducting of the grave and momentous business committed to their charge. That errors should have been committed, and that duties should have been omitted, under such circumstances, will not surprise those who have an honest consciousness of their own fallibilities. But that those extraordinary powers have not been perverted to any sinister purpose; to the damage of the country; to personal aggrandizement; or to the creation or advancement of a party, or to the success of a speculation; I assert with a modest but a firm and assured confidence.

Soon after the battle of San Jacinto, the executive government commenced a treaty with the captive president of Mexico. The negotiation was protracted to the 14th of May, when two treaties, one open, the other secret, were executed between this government and the president Santa Anna.—Copies of those treaties are herewith transmitted. Some stipulations of the treaty, regarding the negotiation as one, have been complied with on the part of the Mexican president; and this government essayed to execute that engagement which relates to his transportation to Vera Cruz. The treaty was made in good faith, and was intended, on the part of this government, to be faithfully executed. But a highly exasperated popular commotion, aided and sustained by the interposition of the army, imposed an absolute necessity upon the government to suspend their compliance with that article of the treaty and to remand the captive president to his confinement. General Santa Anna was subsequently confined to the custody of capt. Wm. H. Patton, who had been despatched by the army for the purpose of taking him in charge; and from that period he has been regarded as the prisoner of the army. The civil government has exercised no control over him, and has felt no official responsibility in relation to his person.

The battle of San Jacinto is one of those illustrious events which not only throw a grace of intense interest into the pages of history, but sometimes determine the fate of nations. It was a triumph not only of arms, but of soul: not of mere animal power, but of intellectual and moral impulse. The relative numbers of the combatants, was of minor importance; for had the enemy possessed three times his actual superiority, the result would have been the same, or somewhat more brilliant.—It was feeling, determination, an indomitable resolution to conquer, that achieved the conquest.—Such feelings are the highest possible exemplification of patriotism; and acts of a high and magnanimous patriotism, constitute the best and strongest claims to a nation's gratitude. It has become a proverb and a reproach, that republics are ungrateful. Let not the unkind censure fix itself upon Texas. The heroes of San Jacinto afford you a happy opportunity, to falsify the proverb and repel the reproach; and I recommend to your consideration the propriety of making a suitable expression of the public gratitude, by donations of lands, to the officers and soldiers, who had the proud gratification of participating in the glories of that memorable day.

Young as we are in existence, we have accumulated a debt of gratitude which all the goods in the world can never cancel. The generous exertions that have been made in our behalf, by many citizens of that glorious land from which we claim a common parentage; the active sympathy they have manifested in our cause and our sufferings; the many and valuable benefits they have conferred upon us, constitute obligations which nothing in our power to confer upon them, can cancel. The best and most acceptable requital we can make is an abundant evidence that their sympathies have been worthily bestowed; that the fruits of their liberality have been appropriated to the diffusion of the great principles of '76; and that our generous benefactors have contributed to the establishment of an enlightened, liberal and virtuous government, in a delightful region of the earth, where recently the spirit of despotism, reigned in all the gloomy majesty of an interdicted solitude.

There is a multitude of other subjects that would naturally present themselves to the legislators of Texas. But they belong to your successors; while to us, pertains the arduous task of adjusting the controversy with Mexico. The hand of Providence has been prodigal in its dispensations to our favored land. In its agricultural capabilities, it is unexcelled. Its campaign surface, invites the construction of rail roads and canals, in all directions; and future explorations will disclose inexhaustible mineral wealth, comprising gold, silver, copper, lead and iron. All these will constitute subjects for future legislation. But at present, the defence of our country and the achievement of our independence, are absorbing and paramount subjects, to which all the functionaries of government and all patriotic citizens, should devote their most strenuous and indefatigable exertions. It will, notwithstanding, be apparent to your discernment, that some internal improvements may be advantageously effected.—The establishment of regular ferries at the rivers, and the erection of bridges over many rivulets and bayous, would greatly facilitate the military operations of the country, and conduce to the general convenience.

It cannot be disguised that the principal sufferings and losses incident to the war, have been sustained in very unequal proportions, by the citizens of the country. The population of the Colorado, and west of it, and of the Brazos, have experienced all the miseries of a successful invasion, by a foe whose watchword was death, and whose purpose was extermination; while other and populous sections of the country have been comparatively exempt from molestation or inconvenience. Many citizens have suffered an entire devastation of their personal goods; others have had their dwellings destroyed by the enemy; others, again, have seen theirs given to the flames by their own countrymen, for purposes connected with the public defence.

War is a national calamity, and ought to be undertaken and prosecuted only for national purposes. It would seem equitable, that the positive destruction of property, accruing from the war, should constitute a national loss, and not be borne exclusively by a few individuals, whose locality happened to be made the theatre of carnage and devastation.—The citizens of the Brazos were contending not for the independence of the Brazos, but of Texas; and the inhabitants of Texas generally, were as deeply interested in the contest as themselves. The sound of the enemy's trumpet has never disturbed the quietude of some regions, while the trampling of his armies has carried desolation and ruin over the fair surface of others. It belongs to the wisdom and the justice of congress to determine whether compensation shall be made for losses thus incurred.

By an unhappy concatenation of circumstances, the public mind has been attracted to one object of deep and exciting interest. The Anglo-American settlements in Texas, commenced about fifteen years ago, when our estimable fellow citizen, Stephen F. Austin, the pioneer of pioneers, first disturbed the deep solitude of the Brazos, with the hum of civilization. For several years, difficulties and disasters, privations and sufferings, were the common allotment of the settlers. The apparent munificence of the government, had conceded to them large portions of land; and the lands were intrinsically valued; but presently they were of little worth. The early settlers regarded, rather their children than themselves, anticipating the rewards of their painful migration to a wilderness. Their titles were made perfect, according to the best tenure of all earthly possession; they were derived directly from the government, in whom the property resided. To invade the sanctity of those titles, and to cancel rights, consecrated by so many sufferings, would be a refinement in iniquity that would have caused a blush of compunction to suffuse the countenances of the Gracchii.

I trust that this congress, and all others that may assemble in Texas, will promptly and decisively put the seal of their reprobation upon all sinistral and unrighteous speculations in the public domain. But the moment the legislature of a country attempts, with an unhallowed hand, to violate the just and vested rights of individuals, government ceases to be a blessing, and civil society is divested of half its guarantees.

In the course of your labors for the public weal, you may experience trials and vexations that will be calculated to discourage your hearts, and infuse disgust into your minds. Your best exertions and most elaborate productions may receive reproach, instead of approval; and your motives may be impugned when they are pure as the snow of the mountain top. But let not these things dishearten you; it is but "the rough brake that virtue must go through." Banish from your council all party spirit and political intrigue; and armed in the panoply of an honest patriotism, move forward in the path of duty, and onward to the goal of our country's redemption. And may the Almighty Ruler of the universe give you wisdom to discern, virtue to choose, and firmness to pursue the right and eschew the wrong. And then your labors will redound to the essential and permanent benefit of your country, and will so establish your own fair fame, that the voice of jealousy and the tongue of vituperation, shall not prevail to sully its brightness.

SANTA ANNA'S PROTEST.

From the Texas Telegraph of October 4.

TRANSLATION.

Office of the private secretary of the president of the republic of Mexico, general-in-chief of the army of operations.

I, Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, president of the republic of Mexico, and general-in-chief of the army of operations against Texas, do appear by means of this official document before the government, ad interim of the people of Texas, in order to show to them by this, that I am resolved to publish to the civilized world the following protest.

I protest against the violation of the faith engaged in the agreement made between me and the government of Texas, signed the 14th May ult. and commenced verbally with the general-in-chief of the army of Texas, Samuel Houston, and T. J. Rusk, secretary of war; wherein the following is stipulated.

I protest 1st. For having been treated more like an ordinary criminal than as a prisoner of war, the head of a respectable nation, even after the agreements had been commenced.

I protest 2d. For the treatment as prisoner of war, and ill usage received by the Mexican general, Adrian Wall, who had come into the Texian camp with a flag of truce, under the safe-guard and word of honor of general Houston, and with the consent of the members of the cabinet.

I protest 3d. Against the non-fulfilment of the exchange of prisoners, stipulated in the 9th article, inasmuch as up to the present time, not even one Mexican prisoner of war, has been set at liberty, notwithstanding the liberty given to all the Texians in possession of the army under my command.

4th. Because the "sine qua non" of the 10th article, as follows, has not been carried into effect; which is, "that I shall be sent to Vera Cruz," "when the government shall deem it proper;" whereas the president himself and the cabinet of Texas, being convinced that I had punctually fulfilled all my engagements, viz: that the Mexican army, 4,000 strong, should retreat from the position it occupied on the Brazos to beyond "Rio Grande;" that all the property should be given up, also the prisoners of war—had determined on my embarking on the Texian schooner of war, the Invincible, in which I finally did embark on the 1st June instant, after addressing a short farewell to the Texians, wherein I thanked them for the generous behaviour and offered my eternal gratitude.

5th. For the act of violence committed on my person, and abuse to which I have been exposed, in compelling me to come again ashore, on the 4th instant merely because 150 volunteers, under the command of gen. Thos. A. Green, recently landed on the beach at Velasco from New Orleans, had with insult and with threats requested that my person should be placed at their disposal; which took place on the very day that the government received from gen. Filasola the answer that he had strictly fulfilled that which had been agreed upon. I repeat that I protest against the president and cabinet's condescension in issuing their orders for that measure, thereby making a show of me before these men, as in former times was done with the chiefs of conquered nations, considering them as trophies of their victories; with this difference, that in my case, a solemn treaty already existed.

Finally, I protest against the violence kept up towards me, by being placed in a narrow prison, surrounded with sentinels, and suffering all the privations which absolutely render life insupportable, or tend to hasten death; and finally, for being uncertain in regard to my future fate, and that of the other prisoners, notwithstanding a solemn treaty.

Under these circumstances, I appeal to the judgment of civilized nations, to the conscience of the citizens who compose the cabinet, and, above all, to the Supreme Ruler of mortals, who has placed the existence and happiness of—the faith of treaties and punctual fulfilment of engagements. God and liberty.

(Signed) ANT. LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

June 9, 1836.

To his excellency, president D. G. Burnet.

PRESIDENT BURNET'S ANSWER.

Executive department, Velasco 10th June, 1836.

To his excellency, the president, general Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna:

EXCELLENT SIR: Your communication of the 9th inst. purporting to be a protest to be published to the civilized world, has been presented to me.

The government of Texas cheerfully recognize to your excellency, the right to make known to the world every grievance and injustice that you may have experienced at their hands. I admit that this government has been constrained, by the influence of a highly excited popular indignation, to deviate for a season, from the terms of that article of the treaty, made between this government and your excellency, which relates to your transportation to Vera Cruz. And in making this admission, I profess a profound mortification, for it does not belong to the spirit of this government to make even a slight deviation from its solemn engagements. But the causes that have produced the constraint under which the government have acted, are not unknown to you, and I should regret to believe that you were incapable of giving to them a just appreciation. The citizens and the citizen soldiers of Texas, have felt and do feel a deep, intense and righteous indignation at the many atrocities which have been perpetrated by the troops lately under your excellency's command; and especially at the barbarous massacre of the brave colonel Fannin and his gallant companions.—How far your excellency participated in that abomination and inglorious slaughter, I am not disposed to conjecture; but it is both natural and true that the people of Texas impute it to your excellency's special command.

When the government of Texas solemnized the treaty of the 14th ult. with your excellency, they did it in good faith, and they intended religiously to observe every stipulation of that treaty. Your embarkation on board the armed schooner Invincible, was an effect of that intention; but your excellency has had too much experience in the waywardness of popular excitements, not to feel the necessity which prompted your subsequent debarkation and the postponement of your stipulated departure.

1st. Your excellency "protests, firstly, for having been treated more like an ordinary criminal than as a prisoner of war, the head of a respectable nation, even after the agreements had been commenced."

I do not precisely comprehend the character of the treatment objected to, and would have been pleased to have had the specifications. If your excellency alludes to the accommodations which have been assigned to you, I would reply that I have cheerfully subjected my own sick family to many hardships, in order to render to your excellency the best accommodations in our power. That we are at present destitute of the ordinary comforts of life, is mainly attributable to your excellency's visit to our new country; and on this account we feel less regret that you should partake of our privations.

2d. Your second protest, relating to the treatment experienced by the Mexican general Adrian Wall, involves some facts which I do sincerely deplore, but for which this government is not strictly responsible.

Your excellency is sensible that we have done all in our power to guarantee the safe return of general Wall to the Mexican camp. But our orders have been contravened by the commander of the Texian army, at a remote distance from the seat of government. The reasons that have actuated that officer, have not been fully detailed to us—but we are informed that they are predicated on some alleged imprudence of gen. Wall, whose good discretion, we know, has not been very conspicuously manifested during his stay amongst us.

3d. The third article of your protest is "against the non-fulfilment of the exchange of prisoners stipulated in the 9th article, inasmuch as to the present time, not one Mexican prisoner of war has been set at liberty, notwithstanding the liberty given to all the Texians in possession of the army under my command."

Your excellency seems to have a more minute intelligence on this subject, than has come to my knowledge, for I have no official information of a single Texian prisoner having been given up under the treaty. Some of the intended victims, the companions of the murdered Fannin, having happily effected their escape and safely arrived amongst us; but these cannot be considered as liberated in the sense of the treaty: whereas, this government has gratuitously discharged several Mexican captives, and defrayed their expenses to New Orleans, the destination which they solicited.

4th. The fourth clause of your excellency's protest has been antecedently answered in part. Your excellency's recollection has betrayed you into an error when you say, "the president himself, and the cabinet of Texas, being convinced that I had punctually fulfilled all my engagements," &c.

This government were convinced that your excellency had complied with some of your stipulations, and this conviction aggravates the mortification, which the late events have inflicted upon them. But they were not informed that "all the property had been given up;" or that any of the prisoners had been restored, as your excellency vainly imagines. On the contrary, we are advised that large herds of cattle had been driven in advance of the retreating army, and that a few only of the slaves that had been abducted were returned.

It is due to your excellency to say, that the government confidently believed that these restorations would be effected as early as a proper convenience would admit. But I am induced to advert to another fact, in relation to which it would be difficult to extend the same charitable exculpations to the officers of the Mexican army. It has been reported that the walls of the Alamo at Bexar, have been prostrated, and that the valuable brass artillery attached to that fortress, have been melted down and destroyed.

There were many painful and pleasing and glorious reminiscences connected with that Alamo, which renders its wanton dilapidation, peculiarly odious to every Texian spirit; and your excellency need not to be informed that the destruction of it was an infraction of the armistice, and a violation of the treaty.

5th. In reply to your excellency's fifth protestation I remark, that the painful circumstances which induced the government to direct your debarkation, on the 4th instant, have already been adverted to in a spirit of frankness and of self humiliation, which a consciousness of error alone could extort. It were superfluous to repeat the causes which induced this government to vary its discretion in regard to the time they should deem the departure of your excellency to be proper. I am not sensible of any act of "violence and abuse" to which you were exposed, that was not necessarily concomitant on your return to shore.—Your excellency has acquired too great a celebrity in Texas, not to be an object of curiosity with the multitude; but I believe you will bear testimony to the magnanimity, which restrained a tumultuous and highly exasperated crowd, from offering any indignity to your person. If such outrage had been committed, it would have been promptly chastised. "The president and cabinet" entertained no intention of "making a show" of your excellency, whose condition, as a prisoner of war, has invariably commanded their highest veneration, and towards whom they have exhibited every attention that was computable with their official duties, and within their power to bestow.

6th. Your excellency's final denunciation is probably the result of excited feeling. While you are detained as a prisoner, it is inevitable that the ordinary precautions be observed. I am not apprised that more than this has been done. Your excellency is not ignorant that the members of this government are remote from their own homes and are very indifferently accommodated; that the seat of government is not permanently located, and therefore no public buildings have been erected. To these facts you will find no difficulty in attributing your being placed in "a narrow prison;" and your excellency knows that the room you occupy is more commodious than that which constitutes both my office and my only family habitation. It is vividly fresh in my recollection, that about two months ago, the best accommodations this new government had enjoyed were broken up, when the army under your excellency's immediate command conflagrated the town of Harrisburg.

With high considerations, I am your obedient servant, (Signed) DAVID BURNET.

FOREIGN CHRONICLE.

Among the officers who accompanied Santa Ana on his last Texas campaign, was general Arago, a brother of the celebrated astronomer of the same name. The latest accounts mention his death at Mexico, the consequence of the fatigues and hardships to which he was exposed. He was formerly an officer in the French army, but accompanied Mina to this country in 1816. His efforts contributed to deliver Mexico from the dominion of Spain. He was director general du genie. He died at the age of 47 years, regretted by all who enjoyed his acquaintance.

Russia. The emperor of Russia has ordered a levy of soldiers throughout the whole Russian empire, with the exception of the province of Bessarabia. It is to consist of five recruits out of every thousand males. If the accounts from the Circassian frontiers of Russia are to be relied upon, there must be a considerable drain of troops in that direction, as the Circassians and other mountain tribes are at present in arms, and carrying on a vexatious and desultory warfare with Russia.

New silver mines have been discovered at Tcherapanook, Krakook and Riddersk, in Russia. The veins are said to be numerous and rich. The smelting houses at Zialoust are already employed in extracting the metal, for which, hitherto, Russia has been tributary to Sweden and England. The emperor takes great interest in this new produce of the country.

We learn that at the imperial mint of Constantinople, there are being secretly coined a quantity of pieces of money bearing the profile of sultan Mahmoud, which will be brought into circulation in Turkey at the Feast of Bairam.

The Austrian admiral, count Dandolo, and the imperial internuncio have been allowed the extraordinary privilege of visiting the interior of the old seraglio.

Noury Bey, a lieutenant colonel in the sultan's infantry, has taken his departure from France for Constantinople, having acquired a great insight into the military art and science at the French colleges and barracks, where he has been permitted to seek instruction. He takes with him a large collection of plans, charts and military works.

An agent had been sent by Don Miguel to Paris to sell two diamonds belonging to that prince. Having disposed of them to a jewellery of that capital for 90,000 francs, he has returned with the money to Rome.

It appears from the report of the Manchester Statistical society on the state of education in the borough of Liverpool, read to the British association, that in a population of 230,000, the number of children in the schools, including 6,000 under five years of age, is 23,183, being fifteen thousand five hundred more than the returns made to government.

The New Orleans Bulletin has received information by the brig Octavia from Havana, that a revolution had broken out in St. Jago de Cuba. Governor Tacón had ordered two ships of war from Havana for that port to aid in suppressing the rebellion.

Letters from Smyrna, of the 2d September, represent the fig crop to have been almost totally destroyed by the unusual severity of the last winter, not being estimated to give (according to reports from the districts in which they grow) over 4,000 to 5,000 quintals, or 400,000 to 500,000 lbs. equal to 25,000 drums, for the whole supply of the English, French, Austrian, American and other demands, and that prices would consequently rate enormously high. The crop would also be backward, and not be ready for shipment before the latter part of September.

The opium crop would also be materially short, say not over 100,000 lbs. and 130 piastres, or $4 25 per lb. on board were demanded by speculators who had monopolized it, and advanced in cash on account of the purchase 5,000,000 piastres.

Captains and consignees of vessels were consequently directing their attention to wool and other articles for return cargoes, some of them without waiting for the fruit, and others to the Black Sea for return cargoes of wheat and rye.

A curious case. A German journal records the singular pathological phenomenon of the suspension of the beating of the heart for the space of several weeks. The pulsations could not be distinguished even by the stethoscope. No explanation is given of this remarkable case.

Gas. There had been a tremendous explosion of the gas works in the Old Kent Road, England. The flash of flame streamed althwart the sky like a blazing comet, and the noise of the explosion was like the roar of a peal of artillery. Several men were killed.

Napoleon and the twelve apostles. The Cabinet de Lecture gives the following anecdote of Napoleon:—Having entered one of the cities of Italy, the church wardens recommended to him the reliques of their church. "Sire, will you deign to take our apostles under your protection?" "Your apostles! are they wood?" "No, sire." "Of what are they, then?" "Of silver, sire." "Of solid silver?" replied Napoleon quickly; "yes, I shall help them to fulfil their mission; it has been ordained that they should go throughout the world, and they shall." Having said so, the emperor sent the twelve apostles to the mint at Paris.

Singular incident. A few days since, a horse, in Mayfield, in Sussex, being annoyed with flies, kicked his hind foot into his mouth, in such a manner as to require the aid of a blacksmith ere the limb could be extricated.

Some of the soldiers who took part in the attempt at insurrection which was made at St. Petersburg immediately after the death of Alexander, were asked by an officer what they understood by the word "constitution," which they were vociferating. "Constitution means the wife of the grand duke Constantine."

Expedient for supplying vacancies in a legislative body. The constitution of Norway prescribes a singular mode of keeping the parliament or storting always full. The number of members consists of 95, and each town and district elects as many substitutes as representatives, so that in case of the illness or death of the one, his suppleant is sent for and takes his seat.

Painting on glass. It is stated that M. Stalars, a young artist at Lille, in France, has discovered in some ancient manuscripts directions for painting on glass, which reveal the secret of this art as practised in ancient times, and so long lost. He has tried the method, with results which it is said are highly satisfactory.

Vesuvius. At Naples, on the 23d September, some inconsiderable eruption of lava took place from the crater of Vesuvius. The flames rose at times to a great height, but the moonlight hindered them from being clearly distinguished.

Cure of lock jaw. Among the horses exhibited at the West Suffolk agricultural show, was a fine cart mare, the property of colonel Rushbrook, which was some time since seized with locked jaw, and was perfectly cured by pouring cold water along the back from a watering pot, without intermission, for a considerable time; the application being recommended by an eminent London veterinarian. This affection has been generally considered incurable.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

Appointments by the president. Charles D. Arfwidson to be consul for the port of Stockholm.

James A. Bayard to be attorney for the district of Delaware, in the place of George Read, deceased.

The Miltonian, (printed at Milton, Northumberland county, Pa.), of Saturday the 5th inst. says:—"We stop the press to say that one of the most severe storms of wind and rain, that ever was known in this part of the country, occurred this morning about three o'clock, blowing down houses, trees, &c.

The court of inquiry, of which major gen. McComb is president, assembled at Frederick, Md. on Monday last week, and adjourned to the 25th inst. The Frederick Herald of Saturday last, says: "The following officers were present—major general Macomb, brigadier general Brady, major gen. Scott, capt. Cooper, capt. Thruston. Summonses, we understand, have been issued for witnesses."

Population of Fall River. The population of this town has recently been ascertained to be 7,008. The number of children between 4 and 16 years, who have attended school a part of all the year past, is 2,052. The number who have not attended school any part of the year, 260. Number of public schools in town 14. Number of private schools 6. Amount appropriated by the town for public schools $3,500.

Value of one vote. Three towns in Connecticut have reported a tie in their returns of votes.

The frigate North Star arrived at Portsmouth on the 12th of October, from South America, having on board 1,300,000 dollars in specie.

A man is to be seen daily going about the streets of Philadelphia, selling a pamphlet entitled "Four years experience in the state prison, written by myself."

Mail robbery. The entire mail from Cleveland, Ohio, to Erie, was stolen from the boat of the stage on the night of the 2d inst. and no traces of it have yet been discovered.

United States. The territory of the United States contains two and a half millions of square miles, and is capable of accommodating at least five hundred millions of inhabitants.

The U. S. mint is about to issue fifty cent pieces of a new and beautiful coinage.

Bread stuffs. On Thursday (last week) there were received into the port of N. York 9,539 bags of wheat from London, Odessa and Hamburg, and 1,549 bags of rye.

Governor Marcy, of New York, has appointed the 15th of December, as a day of thanksgiving in that state.

The Albany Advertiser of Saturday last, states, that the cashier of one of the principal banks in Boston has absconded, and it is stated that he is a defaulter to the amount of nearly one hundred thousand dollars. He had speculated extensively in eastern lands.

The southern papers speak of the hon. John C. Calhoun as president of the great southern and western rail road company.

Short passage. It is stated in the London papers by the Westminster, that the packet ship Sheffield, captain Allen, had arrived at Liverpool in fifteen days from New York. If this should prove correct, that favored ship will have made three passages from New York to Liverpool in forty-seven days.

Maine granite. The exchange at Albany is to be constructed of a light colored granite from Penobscot, Me. This state abounds in granite, having some of the finest and most abundant quarries in the world.—The granite lately discovered at Kennebunkport proves to be of the finest quality, and in color and durability is vastly superior to the far-famed Quincy granite. The effect of heat upon the two has been tested by professor Cleveland. Specimens of each were heated to 750 degrees, and then cold water thrown upon them; the Quincy cracked, the Kennebunk remained firm. They were heated a second time, and water again thrown upon them; the Quincy split, the Kennebunk remained uninjured. The latter is of a darker color than the former, and as a building material is considered preferable both for its durability and color.

Judge Strong, of Massachusetts, in a recent case, has decided that no one has a right, when making a division fence, to run half the same on the lot of the neighboring owner; it must be wholly on the land of him who makes it, unless constructed by mutual consent.

New Orleans, November 1. Within the last two weeks somewhere high five thousand passengers have arrived in our city, and our streets are consequently again thronged with new faces. Among this great number, for so short a time, we are happy to learn that there are more than five hundred mechanics; these and a thousand more are much wanted, for wages are exorbitantly high.

Mr. Phillips the distinguished merchant at Boston, stated at the Charlestown lyceum a few days since, that there were now 450 ships absent from this country engaged in the whale fishery. They employ upwards of ten thousand men, and cost, with their outfits about $12,000,000, and are estimated to be worth, when their voyage is completed, $20,000,000.

Compliment to our manufacturers. We learn from the New York Express that "Mr. J. C. Bedenberg, of Newark, New Jersey some time since executed an order from England, for a buggy. The gentleman to whom it was sent was much delighted with it, and informed his correspondent here that a friend of his was also so much pleased with it, that he has ordered a fac simile to be built there, cost what it would. A handsome compliment to Yankee workmanship and ingenuity."

The ceremony of breaking ground on the Central canal, took place at Evansville, Indiana, on the 2d instant. A large number of persons were present, and the day was closed by a ball.

Monument to bishop White. The model of the monument proposed to be erected to the memory of bishop White in Philadelphia, says the New York Courier, represents the venerable prelate in the act of confirming a young female, whose figure is beautifully meek; while that of the bishop stands remarkably firm and well, with all the dignity and mildness which were so peculiarly the characteristics of that truly good man.

Blind choristers. The choir of singers at the rev. Mr. Young's church, in Summer street, is composed entirely of the pupils of the excellent institution for the blind, in Pearl street; six males and six females. Their performances are highly creditable to them. They commit to memory the several hymns to be sung through the day, and sing them without the slightest variation from the text, with a remarkable clear and distinct pronunciation. They are paid a fair salary, and thus are these children of charity enabled to assist in one of the most pleasing parts of the worship of their God. [Boston Trans.]

Delaware. The Wilmington Journal of the 15th instant says—It is understood that the legislature of this state will be convened by the governor at an early day, (probably in the latter end of this month, or beginning of December), to make the proper legal provision for the portion of the surplus which will come to this state, early in January.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

—A translation of Mr Gorostiza's note on closing his diplomatic relations with this government, copied from the Baltimore American, is published in the present sheet.

MARYLAND. It will be seen by the journal of the proceedings of the electoral college (page 199) that a new senate was elected on Saturday last, and that the electors, having completed the duty assigned to them by the constitution, have adjourned. The "21" were joined by Messrs. Thomas and George of Queen Ann's, Fountain of Caroline, and Linthicum and Sellman of Anne Arundel, who voted blank ballots.

We would do injustice to our feelings if we did not congratulate the state and the country upon the peaceable issue of this vexed question, which at one time was pregnant with most mischievous consequences to our social relations and the political character of the state. For no question has occurred for a long time past, not even the famous, or rather infamous, proceedings which preceded and consummated the bank riots, which created so much acerbity of feeling among those holding opposite opinions, or caused so much distrust among the friends of our civil institutions. The "experiment" was a bold but rash one—and now that the causes which induced it and the excitement it produced have ceased to exist, we think those who were its honest advocates, will themselves rejoice that their efforts were unsuccessful. As they cannot be ignorant that they would have established a precedent dangerous to enlightened republicanism, and enabled demagogues hereafter to accomplish the most nefarious private purposes under the plea of promoting the public good. And such "revolutions" once begun, the day would not be far distant when constitutions would be as readily changed as the officers whose duty it is to enforce their provisions.

In free states the law of force is not the instrument of reform. Its theatre is in those countries where tyranny is felt in its efforts to degrade the mind and oppress the body, and the chains of the people are made visible by the light that breaks upon them from the nations by which they are surrounded. In such there is no hope for the progressive power of intelligence. But in this country there are no evils that the public intelligence cannot overcome. Its prerogative is as boundless as our limits, and its power is progressively increasing. It is gradually sweeping before it all that is opposed to its influence, and would soon have added the constitution of Maryland to its trophies, without an accessory. That instrument is like a leper, whose plague spots were daily becoming more apparent to the people, and none would have dared to have resisted its purification, if it had not been seized by the hand of violence. That act changed the current of the public feeling, and produced a result which will be hailed as another triumph of the principles of free government and our love for constitutional law by the friends of liberty throughout the world.

The following are the names of the twenty-one electors who entered the electoral college and qualified as such immediately after their election, and remained in session until a senate was elected.

Solomon Dickinson,	George S. Leigh,
George Dudley,	W. D. Merrick,
George Vickers,	Henry Brawner,
William W. Lake,	Thomas G. Pratt,
Thomas H. Hicks,	George W. Duvall,
James P. Gale,	James Kent,
Wm. Williams,	J. A. D. Dalrymple,
Sam'l J. K. Handy,	Ephraim Gaiher,
Thomas A. Spence,	Andrew Bruce,
Henry Franklin,	Richard Beall,
Benedict J. Heard,

The following are the names of the gentlemen who refused to enter the college and qualify:

Charles McGill,	Robert Wason,
Casper Quynn,	John Fisher,
Washington Duvall,	Ephraim Bell,
George Ellicott,	Joshua Vansant,
Thomas Hope,	Samuel Sutton,
John Evans,	George A. Thomas,
Robert T. Keene,	Sprigg Harwood,

Messrs. Wesley Linthicum, Marcy Fountain, J. B. Thomas and Enoch George entered the college on Saturday last, and qualified as electors. John

S. Sellman, esq. another of the recusants, qualified some time since. See the journal of the proceedings of the college, page 199.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. We present in a subsequent page all the returns of interest received since our last. Those from Vermont, Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland only, are official.

MARYLAND LEGISLATURE. The delegates elect assembled at Annapolis on Monday last, in compliance with the call of the governor in his proclamation, and on the following day the house was organized by the election of B. L. Gantt, esq. of Prince George's, as speaker; G. G. Brewer as chief and Eli Duvall as assistant clerks; Benj. Seegar, J. C. Talbot, R. L. Mackall, W. E. Nicholson and R. W. Carter, as committee clerks; G. J. Grammer as sergeant at arms; and John Quynn as doorkeeper.

The members of the new senate had not all arrived at Annapolis; and the governor will delay his message until it is organized. Nothing of interest had transpired in the house.

THE GEORGIA CAMPAIGN. Brigadier general Wool has issued a general order, dismissing the Tennessee volunteers, for the present, their services being no longer required against the Creeks. Having engaged to serve for six and twelve months, they are notified that they must hold themselves in readiness for another summons, if necessary. The officers have written in answer, that they will be ready.

FOREIGN NEWS. There has been an arrival at New York from Liverpool, by which the editors of the New York Commercial Advertiser have received London papers to the 24th and Liverpool to the 25th of October. The following are the principal items of interest.

Parliament was opened, pro forma, on the 20th of October, and farther prorogued to Thursday the 8th of December.

The prisoners of Ham are at length released.—Messrs. Peyronnet and Chantelauze first applied to the king for remission of their sentence, which was immediately granted; M. de Ranville then followed their example, with the like result; and prince Polignac, at the solicitation of his lady and the British minister, has had his doom changed to banishment from France, under the full weight of his condemnation and sentence of civil death.

Spain. The intelligence from Madrid is to the 15th of October. The most important item is an account of the defeat of Gomez, the Carlist chief, by the royal forces under Alaix and Espinosa, near Lucena, on the 13th. Some of the London papers express doubts, but the report is strongly confirmed by the fact that Gomez had sent a flag to Alaix, with offers to negotiate, of which there is no question. General Alaix refused to hold any terms with Gomez, seized the bearer of the flag, and sent him a prisoner to Madrid. The report was that the Carlists lost 2,000 killed and prisoners in the engagement.

Espinosa had entered Cordova, where Gomez appears to have made but a very short stay. Sanz (Carlist) was pushing on for Leon, followed by gen. Peon's first division and the Portuguese auxiliaries.

All quiet at Madrid, and a renewal of hope and confidence. Count Latour Mauberg, the French ambassador, arrived on the 14th. Nothing important from Navarre, or the frontier. The Carlists were exerting all their energies to procure forage and provisions.

Switzerland. The extraordinary diet, convened for deliberation on the controversy with France, held its first session on the 17th of October, at Berne. Nothing was done save the appointment of a committee to receive the instructions given by the several cantons to their deputies in the diet, and report thereupon. The diet adjourned, to meet again when the committee should be ready to report. A majority of the committee is said to be of the radical party, and disposed to be very "uppish" toward France.

APPOINTMENT BY THE PRESIDENT. William Frick, to be collector of the customs for the district of Baltimore, vice James H. McCulloch, deceased. [Globe.]

THE CITY BANKS. The Express of this morning contains a severe attack upon our city banks, and capitalists having money to lend, which some of the merchants have requested us to copy. We hardly know what to say upon the subject. It is a very difficult matter for us to believe the charges preferred in the Express—certainly to any thing like the extent to which they go. If they are true, those concerned deserve the severest expression of the public indignation. If untrue, no time should be lost in disabusing the public mind, and vindicating the character of the banks. We copy the following as a specimen of the charges to which we refer. If the Manhattan bank has aught to say in reply, our columns are open. [N. Y. Com.]

"Did or did not the cashier of the Manhattan bank, demur at paying a treasury draft for $80,000, in favor of the Fulton bank, after the same was certified by his teller; and until he was threatened, not only with a protest of the draft, but also with a protest of the bank? And was or was not, the reason for his demurring, that he had loaned, directly or indirectly, so much of the government money at 2 or 3 per cent. per month, that he could not pay said treasury draft without exposing himself to be called on for more specie than he could meet? Let him answer all and singular."

SPECIE CIRCULAR. From the "Globe" of Monday.—We extract the following from the last United States Gazette:

End of the humbug.—The St. Louis Republican says: "We have understood that a treasury circular has been issued to the disbursing officers of the U. States—in the west at least—directing them not to draw upon the deposit banks for gold or silver, except in cases in which it is absolutely necessary."

The public will be pleased again to take notice that the whole of the above statement is another opposition humbug, as we learn that no such treasury circular has ever been issued. [Globe.]

The public will please "to take notice" that this affected denial by the official is a mere evasion, deceptive, if not intended to deceive. It is a fact, which the official paper may deny if it chooses, but is not the less an undeniable fact, that a circular has been issued to disbursing officers of the United States, directing them as above stated. The equivocation consists in the denial that a treasury circular has been issued to this effect. The circular has not been issued by the treasury, but by the heads of the official bureaus, to whose orders the disbursing officers are subject. The substance of the statement of the St. Louis paper is, beyond doubt, true. [Nat. Int.]

DREADFUL EXPLOSION. The powder mill at Acton, owned by Messrs. Stanley, Reed & Co. Boston, and containing 2,500 kegs of powder, blew up, says the Lowell Courier, on Wednesday, at 9 A. M. The bodies of four of the workmen, who were killed, were found horribly mangled. The mills had been in operation but a few weeks.

EXTENSIVE BANK ROBBERY. We learn from the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser that the vaults of the Oneida bank at Utica, N. Y. were entered on Sunday night last, and the sum of one hundred and eighty thousand six hundred dollars extracted therefrom, besides about six thousand dollars in notes and checks. The money stolen consisted of notes on the banks of Rome, Albany and New York, and the other safety fund banks in this state, with about $6,000 on banks in the eastern states.

In order to effect the robbery, six locks had to be unbolted, five of which were effected by keys and the other broken open.

The directors offer a reward of $6,000, for the recovery of the money and the arrest and conviction of the thief; or $2,000 for the arrest and conviction of the thief alone.

The above is the bank (chartered last winter) about which so much has been said in relation to the unfair distribution of the stock.

THE PRESIDENT'S HEALTH. The Globe of Tuesday last says—Two nights ago the president was taken with a cough, which was succeeded by a considerable bleeding from the lungs. He had suffered for some time previously with severe pain in his side. He was relieved from both unpleasant symptoms, in some degree by the lancet. Night before last the hemorrhage from the lungs recurred, and was again stopped by the same process and other applications. He is now extremely weak, from the effect of the disorder and remedies, but is better, and considered by his physicians in no immediate danger. Many years ago he was affected in the same way, and recovered without serious injury, or even a long depression of his health.

On the following day the symptoms of the president's disease were such as to indicate a speedy recovery, the effusion of blood having ceased—and the Globe of Thursday states that his health continues to improve.

DISTRESSING SHIPWRECK AND LOSS OF LIFE.—The ship Bristol, Allen, master, from Liverpool bound for New York, was lost on F. r Rockaway beach, about five miles from the latter city, on Sunday morning last, and two seamen, three cabin and about sixty steerage passengers perished. The ship was off Sandy Hook, at 9 P. M. on Saturday night, with her lanterns out as signal for a pilot, at which time the gale had just commenced. No pilots, however, were out, and the ship had to stand off; at a quarter before 4 A. M. on Sunday morning, the ship struck on Far Rockaway, and distressing to relate, at day light, although within half a mile of the shore, no relief could be afforded to the distressed passengers and crew, who were clinging to the shrouds. All day they remained in this situation, the surf being so high that none could approach her. At about 11 o'clock, P. M. the sea abated and boats went to her relief, and succeeded in taking off the captain, a portion of the crew, and some of the cabin and steerage passengers. The remainder of the passengers and crew had perished before assistance arrived.

In connection with this loss of life, the N. York American calls public attention to the fact, that it was occasioned by the negligence of the pilots, who, on account of the monopoly they now enjoy, are not attentive to the performance of their duties. Here was, says the American, a ship within five miles of her port, and making every exertion to procure a pilot, and yet no pilot was to be had, and the gale coming on, caught her so much in shore that it was impossible to claw off—and the result was, her destruction, and that of many human lives.

MEXICO AND CUBA. A correspondent of the N. Y. Courier and Enquirer, writing from N. Orleans, says that on board the last British packet that put in at Havana on her way to Vera Cruz, were two Mexican commissioners, sent to negotiate with governor Tacón for a renewal of friendly relations between Mexico and Cuba; that governor Tacón at first refused them an interview, but they subsequently obtained permission to land, and were received by the governor; that the interview lasted only half an hour, and that the commissioners then went on board the packet again, and sailed for England, whence they will go to Spain. The rumor was, that they solicited leave to enlist three hundred sailors for the Mexican navy, but that governor Tacón referred them peremptorily to the government of Spain.

The same letter states that governor Tacón has sent home (to Spain) his resignation; and that the creoles and free blacks of the Islands are preparing for a revolution, which may cause a rising of the slaves, and much bloodshed.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO. From the New Orleans Bulletin, Nov. 7. The departure of Mr. Gorostiza from Washington is ominous we fear of a rupture in the friendly relations heretofore subsisting between this country and Mexico, than which nothing could be more injurious to the commercial interests of the union, and of New Orleans in particular. The position of general Gaines is assigned as the cause of the general dissatisfaction.

The extensive and valuable trade hitherto carried on between this country and the Mexican provinces has already been much interrupted by the disturbances in Texas, and the breaking out of a war would not only suspend this trade at once, but create for us a rival elsewhere, that it would be impossible afterwards to overthrow. Havana is already securing much of the trade formerly belonging to this city, and in the event of war England would use all possible exertions to cut us off entirely.—She has now control in a great measure of the moneyed concerns of that country and has long been desirous to engross the whole of their commerce. Nothing but the good understanding which formerly existed between Mexico and the United States, has prevented the accomplishment of their wishes, and they will hail with pleasure the present indications of a misunderstanding as affording them the opportunity so long desired.

What can we gain by a war with Mexico? We could not invade the country or possess ourselves of any portion of her territory. She has no commerce that we could cripple or spoil, and no navy that we could seize upon. The result could only be a system of non-intercourse, and who would be the losers by this? England would supply her in her own ports with all she comes now to buy of us, and the extensive manufactures of our country, which now find a market there would be shut up for want of employment. Many of the most extensive commercial houses in all our large cities would also be ruined because of the great importance to their trade with Mexican dealers. Serious consequences might likewise result in the moneyed arrangements of the union by the suspension of the continual influx of specie now coming from Mexico.

The exports of coarse cotton goods and of provisions alone, to Mexico, in the year 1835, amounted to near one million of dollars, besides the great value of other domestic exports, while the profits resulting from the sale of our imports to Mexican purchasers are immense.

New Orleans has enjoyed much of this latter trade and the loss of a portion of it during the last year has been severely felt by numbers of our merchants; but the consequences of a war would prove absolutely ruinous to many of them.

If there be no real necessity for the continuance of general Gaines across the Sabine, he should be immediately ordered, with all his forces, back into our own territory, and a suitable explanation offered to the Mexican representative. The invasion of the limits of any nation, without urgent necessity, is certainly a just cause of offence, and whatever may be the justice of the pretensions, lately set up for the territory in which general Gaines has taken position, we have hitherto acknowledged the authority of Mexico over it, and until the question was definitely settled, it is due to her dignity as a nation, to abstain from the occupation of the disputed ground.

We sincerely hope that the cabinet at Washington will devise means for the settlement of the difficulty, if one there be, without permitting the disadvantage of a war to befall us.

REFORM. An adaptation of institutions to circumstances and knowledge, or a restoration to the original purposes, for which they have been perverted, demanded as a right by those who are suffering wrongs, and only denied and abused by those who have been fattening upon abuse. The real conservatives are the reformers, the real revolutionists are the corruptionists, who, by opposing quiet, will compel violent change. When the ultras, and men of this class, whose long misrule, and denial of justice, have inflamed the public mind, charge the reformers with having thrown the whole country into a blaze, thus accusing the extinguisher of being the firebrand, one is reminded of the incendiary, who, in order to avoid detection, turned round and collared the foreman of the engines, exclaiming, "Ha, fellow! have I caught you! This is the rascal who is first and foremost at every fire—seize him, seize him!" There is no reform bill in Turkey—no factious opposition—no free press—no two-penny trash—yet, in no country are revolutions so frequent.

Reform, however, to be useful and durable, must be gradual and cautious. To those radical gentry of the movement party, who would always be at work, without calculating the mischief or the cost of their vaunted improvements, I recommend the consideration of the following anecdote:—The celebrated orator Henley advertised, that, in a single lecture, he would teach any artisan, of ordinary skill, how to make six pair of good shoes in one day;—nay, six-and-twenty pair, provided there was a sufficiency of materials. The sons of Crispin flocked in crowds, willingly paying a shilling at the door, to be initiated in such a lucrative art, when they beheld the orator seated at a table, on which were placed six pair of new boots. Gentlemen!" he exclaimed, "nothing is so simple and easy as the art which I have undertaken to teach you. Here are a new pair of boots—here are a large pair of scissors; behold! I cut off the legs of the boots, and you have a new pair of shoes, without the smallest trouble; and thus may they be multiplied, ad infinitum, supposing always that you have a sufficiency of materials." [The Trumpet.]

UPPER CANADA. The legislature of this province commenced its session on Tuesday the 8th instant; and on Wednesday the governor, sir Francis Head, addressed the two houses in a cautiously worded speech, for which we have not room, but the principal topics of which were as follows.

The long disputed question of the clergy reserves. The crowded state of the jails, and the propriety of some increase in the number of judges, to the end that criminal justice may be administered more speedily.

The necessity of establishing an asylum for lunatics.

The advantages of constructing a great western rail road.

The propriety of causing a survey and estimate to be made, preliminary to the undertaking of a connection between Lake Huron and the Atlantic, by the waters of the Ottawa.

The state of the roads throughout the province.

The appropriation, in part, of the military reserves, to public use, for the encouragement of emigration.

And the relief of the provincial government from the embarrassments caused by the withholding of the supplies.

Sir Francis concludes his speech by an emphatic assurance of his determination, come what may, to preserve the constitution of the province inviolate. [N. Y. Com.]

COCHRAN'S RIFLE. This rifle has been tried in Washington under the supervision of capt. Ramsey and lieu. Scott. A correspondent of the "Intelligencer" who has seen the report of those gentlemen, says it was fired 1,008 times, and was in the same order at the termination as at the commencement of the firing. In order to test the influence of rain and wet from other causes, water was put into the chambers, and left there for an hour and ten minutes; the rifle was then discharged, and with the same ease and effect as previously. The cylinder in this rifle thus contained nine chambers; and in a comparative trial instituted between it and Hall's carbine, both pieces having been loaded, the whole nine discharges were made from the rifle before a second could be made from the carbine.

During the whole trial not a single cap missed fire; and at the distance of 150 yard, with 10 grains of powder, the ball perforated an inch pine board, and was flattened against a brick wall behind it.

Some apprehension was entertained that, from the contiguity of the charges, accidental ignition might be produced. To prove the entire freedom of his rifle from this danger, Mr. Cochran placed loose powder in the chambers, over the balls, and around the caps, and, so circumstanced, it was discharged as safely as before.

INTERESTING PHENOMENON. Lauriat has ascended into the upper regions now about twenty times. He has often been from four to five miles high, and has passed through clouds and all conditions of the atmosphere. It is impossible that observations of different kinds, with different instruments, at such a height above the earth's surface, should not result in some discoveries highly interesting to science; and the following we deem worthy of the examination of all interested in tracing the various phenomena connected with this earth. In Mr. Lauriat's last ascension from New York, he ascended about five miles, and proceeded over a hundred miles. He passed through clouds of sleet which covered his balloon with icy particles—but what was more interesting, he discovered that when he was at his greatest altitude, the needle of a compass which he had with him did not have the least tendency to exhibit polar attraction: but wavered about at all points of the compass. This circumstance is worthy of investigation, and should be made the precursor of examinations of the like kind, which may, by various experiments, result in arriving at some probable estimate of the causes of polar attraction, respecting which there is now only unconfirmed conjecture. It is true that the first impression conveyed is that the needle is above the influence of attraction—but it will enable us to decide whether the cause of the wonderful powers of the magnetic needle be resident in the equator or the poles. We should be happy to receive some disquisitions upon the subject.

SENATOR FROM GEORGIA. Albert Cuthbert has been re-elected a senator from Georgia in the United States. On the first ballot Cuthbert 107, J. W. Campbell 107, Jacob Wood 85, scattering 4. On the second, Cuthbert 128, Campbell 103, Jacob Wood 16, scattering 5.

SOUTH CAROLINA. Our statement of the result of the congressional election in this state, copied from one of the newspapers, was, in some particulars, incorrect. E. B. Smith was elected in the place of W. J. Grayson, John P. Richardson in the place of R. J. Manning and John Campbell in the place of R. B. Campbell.

THE LATE JAMES H. McCULLOCH. The officers of the customs of the port of Baltimore have resolved to wear crape upon the left arm for the space of thirty days, as a mark of respect for the memory of the late venerable collector.

MORTALITY IN NEW YORK. The Baltimore Commercial Transcript has published the following abstract of an article on this subject in the last number of the American Journal of the medical sciences.

In New York during the period of sixteen years, ending with 1835, the average mortality of the city was 4,936—of which about 900 were imputed to consumption, the most fatal disease. The greatest number of deaths in any one year, occurred in 1832, when 3,606 fell victims to the cholera. Fevers, so often the bane of other cities, appear to be seldom extensively prevalent, as only 1 death in 600 occurs annually. Only five deaths from hydrophobia are reported during the whole sixteen years; hence it appears that the alarm about mad dogs may be regarded as groundless. Not so, however, the notion that spirituous liquors produce evil consequences; for though the number of deaths from excessive drinking is not comparatively large, intemperance is stated to be the most efficient cause of numerous diseases.

If so, Baltimore may fairly congratulate herself on her comparative superiority—her average annual mortality being only 1 in 48, whereas in New York it is 1 in 40.

INDIANS IN ARKANSAS. The governor of Arkansas has issued a proclamation, ordering all the Indians within that state, who have not a fixed place of abode, to depart forthwith, and calling upon the militia of the state to give their aid to carrying it into effect.

GREAT RIOT IN CLEVELAND, OHIO. The following is an extract from a letter, dated Cleveland, Nov. 9, 1836.

We have had a dreadful riot. The Brooklyn people undertook to destroy the upper bridge, here, because the Cleveland people would not let them build one where the float-bridge was, and they commenced tearing the bridge down. The Cleveland people fired three guns upon them, and they fired back. Ten killed on the spot, and twenty-three wounded; many of them mortally.

Yours, &c.

H. VAN PELT.

SUICIDE. The frequency of suicides within a few months past, may not render it irrelevant to publish the following admirable order of Napoleon, written while he was first consul, and in which may be perused the solution of his conduct after the battle of Waterloo.

The number of suicides committed in Paris, in the course of September was 66. Forty-four had been committed in private houses, and the bodies of the remaining 22 victims to this deplorable mania had been found and deposited at the Morgue.

"Order of the day, St. Cloud, 22d Floreal, 10th year of the republic.

"The grenadier Groblin has committed suicide for a love affair. He was in other respects a good soldier. This is the second event of the kind which has happened to the corps within a month. The first consul publishes the following order to the guard:—That a soldier ought to know how to conquer grief and melancholy—that there is as much true courage in suffering with constancy the pains of the soul, as to stand unmoved under a battery of artillery—that to abandon oneself to chagrin without resisting, or to kill oneself to escape from it, is to abandon the field of battle before having conquered. (Signed) BONAPARTE AND BESSIERES."

ELECTIONS.

MASSACHUSETTS.

All the towns had been heard from except twenty. Mr. Everett's majority over the Van Buren candidate for governor, Mr. Morton, was 6,303.—The vote for electors, it is said, will present a much larger majority for the whigs.

The following gentlemen have been elected members of congress from this state. The friends of Mr. Van Buren are in italics.

Richard Fletcher,	William R. Calhoun,
Stephen C. Phillips,	John Q. Adams,
Caleb Cushing,	John Reed,
Levi Lincoln,	William S. Hastings,
George Grennell,	William Parmentier,
George N. Briggs,	Nathaniel B. Borden.

VERMONT.

An abstract of the election in this state, from official returns, gives the Harrison ticket 20,994 and the Van Buren ticket 14,037 votes. Harrison majority 6,957.

NEW YORK.

The Albany Argus gives returns from all the counties in the state except Franklin, and makes the Van Buren majority 26,753. Delaware county, where the Argus claims only 1,800, has given a majority of over 2,000.

The congressional delegation stands 30 Van Buren and 10 whigs; being a whig gain of one member.

*Excluding the votes of Clinton, Otsego and Tioga counties, which were rejected.

The majority for Mr. Gulick, the whig candidate for register in the city of New York, is 3,776. The office is worth from 10 to $15,000 per year.

NEW JERSEY.

The Paterson Intelligencer states the majority of the Harrison ticket to be 677—The returns are not all official.

In addition to the electors of president, New Jersey chose members of congress last week, by general ticket, and the following gentlemen, all whigs, are elected—

John Ayerigg,	John B. Maxwell,
William Halstead,	Joseph T. Randolph,
Charles C. Stratton,	Thomas Jones York.

William Chetwood (whig) is elected to the present congress, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Philemon Dickerson, (Van Buren) now governor of the state. There is therefore a whig gain of one member in the present congress, and six in the next congress.

VIRGINIA.

Mr. Van Buren's majority thus far is 7,001. The counties to be heard from will increase it a few hundred votes.

NORTH CAROLINA.

A letter in the Globe, dated Raleigh, Nov. 18, says—Fifty-nine counties give Van Buren a majority of 3,400. The six counties to hear from cannot, in any contingency, reduce the majority over 1,000 or 1,200, which will leave it 2,200.

GEORGIA.

Returns from sixty-one counties give a majority of 2,888 for the White ticket.

KENTUCKY.

The returns from 51 counties and districts, published in the Louisville Journal of the 16th, give a majority of 8,554 for Harrison.

INDIANA.

Has cast her vote for Harrison. Reported majorities from 49 counties give 14,879 for the Harrison and 4,241 for the Van Buren ticket.

TENNESSEE.

Twenty-two counties give the following aggregate votes: White 11,647, Van Buren 6,265. Davidson county, in which is gen. Jackson's residence, gave a majority of 344 for White. At the "Hermitage" the vote stood—for White 61; Van Buren 20.

LOUISIANA.

A letter from Mobile, Ala. published in the "Globe" says this state has gone for Van Buren by a majority of 600 votes.

The New Orleans True American of the 11th inst. however, says that the result of the election in the three municipalities into which New Orleans is divided gives a majority of 11 to the whig ticket. New Orleans has heretofore given a majority of 150 to 350 votes for the Jackson ticket. The same paper, after giving the results in some parishes favorable to the whigs, adds, that if Lafourche, St. Laundry, St. Mary's and Iberville turn out, the whigs have gained the state.

WAR IN FLORIDA.

We learn from the Charleston papers that an express had arrived at Gary's Ferry on Sunday 18th, with information that gov. Call marched from Fort Drane on the 11th for the Wythlacoochee, taking with him all the regular troops, the Tennessee brigade and the regiments of friendly Creeks. Gen. Jesup, was at Tampa Bay on the 7th with about 800 regulars and marines. He was making every preparation for systematic operations. Some mounted volunteers from Alabama had already joined him, and others were daily arriving. He expected to march in search of the Seminoles on or about the 20th inst. and has received orders to take the chief command. He had not been to Fort Drane, but would proceed direct to the Wythlacoochee where gov. Call would meet him.

The troops at Tampa were in good health, and those in other sections were rapidly recovering from the effects of indisposition.

From the Pensacola Gazette.

The want of any thing like regular communication with the seat of war, keeps us in the most painful state of suspense in regard to the operations of the army. It must be admitted, that the numerous obstacles which are known to stand in the way of a successful and speedy termination of the campaign, are calculated to inspire fearful forebodings of its results; and accident besides, has, we fear, done much to frustrate the well arranged plans of governor Call for supplying the troops in the field with provisions. We have heard that considerable supplies were ordered early in the campaign to be sent from St. Marks to the Suwannee, and they did not reach their destination until weeks after, according to the most liberal calculation, they should have arrived. It is said too, that a great quantity of corn and other provisions intended for the army, was deposited in a store-house at St. Marks; the house, which was built over the water, fell down with the weight which it contained, and the whole of its contents were ruined. Then again the large steamboat Convoy, containing a very full cargo of provisions, destined for Tampa Bay, sprung a leak near this port, and put in here in a sinking condition; nearly her whole cargo was damaged and much of it was entirely ruined; and last of all is the loss of the Lieutenant Izard on the bar of the Wythlacoochee.

It is believed that the character, condition and resources of the Florida Indians are but little understood, except by those who have actually witnessed their mode of warfare. The campaign made by general Jackson against the Florida Indians, eighteen years ago, when they were stronger than they are now, is often quoted to prove that the subjugation of the Seminoles is no such difficult matter as it is thought; but it should be remembered that their condition was quite different from what it is at the present. They were then banded together in small tribes. Every petty chief had his town; the guides had no difficulty in conducting general Jackson directly to them, and he subdued them in detail. Beside, they were not all unfriendly to the whites. But now they all fight as one man. History scarcely furnishes a parallel for the fidelity which these people have shown to one another. We hear of no single instance of treachery or defection among them. Since the war began, not one of the hostiles has come out from among his brethren. They have no towns to defend, and their women and children protect themselves by flight. The climate is their friend too. Summer, which brings disease and death to their pursuers, has no terrors for them, and they are strangers to the rigors of the winter. They have nearly 20,000 square miles in which to hide themselves, and the most satisfactory intelligence as to where they were yesterday, affords not the least reason to believe that they may not be fifty miles from there to-morrow; while if they choose, the whole tribe may, in many places, lie securely within a hundred yards of the whole army of the whites. During the last campaign it is said there were many instances of this; while the whites were "stunning the drowsy ear of night" with the chopping of trees, the building of fires, and the cracking of cart-whips, and all sorts of noises, much upon the same reason, we suppose, that caused the fellow to whistle at the very top of his lungs, to keep away the ghosts when he was passing a church yard.

In this county, we are too remote from the Indians to have experienced, or even felt the least apprehension of, the actual disasters of the war, but it has nevertheless pressed sorely upon us. Out of less than three hundred men liable to do military duty, we now have eighty in the field.

Indians in disguise.—It is stated by an officer of the United States army, that a number of Indians (400) presented themselves to the commanding officer on the Chattahoochee on the 15th of last month, and gave themselves up as Creek Indians. No one at the post had ever seen them among the Creeks, and there was strong presumptive evidence that they were Seminoles, and not Creeks. There is little doubt that hundreds of these people will escape in this way, as it would not be a very difficult matter for large bodies of them to make their way up to the Creek country. The correspondent of the Journal of Commerce says, the presumption that these Indians were Seminoles, "is supported by the fact that some few days previous to the surrender of the party alluded to, an intelligent resident of the neighborhood of Irwinton, came unexpectedly on a party of 10 or 12 Indians, who were too busily engaged in cutting up a new killed deer to observe him. He was on horseback and not at all uneasy at the meeting. This gentlemen was near enough to distinctly observe the Indians; and although he had a very general acquaintance with the Creek Indians, he felt assured these Indians were not Creeks."

Lieut. Raphael Semmes, of the navy, has published in the Pensacola Gazette a letter, not describing and accounting for the loss of the steamboat Lieut. Izard, at the mouth of the Wythlacoochee, but showing that the movements of the army were not impeded thereby. He says that the steamboat was not laden with supplies for the army, as has been said, but that the supplies were all forwarded to the entrance of the river in transports; that the duty for which the Lieut. Izard was assigned was to explore the river's mouth, and ascertain whether the river could be ascended, of which there was great doubt; and that the transportation of the supplies up the river was intended to be, and was, effected by means of a barge capable of carrying 500 barrels, pulling 50 oars, and drawing only two feet water.

The late captain Lane. It is stated in the Mobile Chronicle that "the true cause of col. Lane's suicide was chagrin at the shameful defeat of his friendly Creeks, at the Cove on the Wythlacoochee previous to his arrival with them at Fort Drane.—The particulars of this battle have been studiously suppressed."

From the Globe of the 19th inst.

We publish the following interesting narrative, lately received at the war department, being a report of the march of two companies of United States artillery, and the native regiment, commanded (as colonel) by the late captain Lane, of the dragoons, from Tampa Bay to Fort Drane, Florida, by capt. H. Brown, 4th United States artillery, acting as lieutenant colonel of the native regiment at the time: Fort Drane, October 22, 1836.

GOVERNOR: The melancholy event which occurred here on the 19th, causes the duty to devolve on me of reporting to you the movements of the regiment of Creek volunteers since its departure from Tampa Bay. We left our camp near Fort Brooke, and crossed the Hilboro' river on Monday, the 10th inst. and encamped about one mile from the fort.—On Tuesday we marched eighteen, on Wednesday nineteen, and on Thursday twenty miles, without any thing of interest having occurred. On Friday, the 14th, we started at 7 o'clock, and having marched three or four miles, one of our scouts reported a hostile Indian on our right flank: immediate pursuit ensued, but being mounted, he evaded us. On arriving at the place where he disappeared, we discovered as far as the eye could reach, extensive lakes, in which were many and heavily timbered islands connected together in some instances by extensive marshes, containing a heavy growth of grass. Our Indians having reported a fresh trail, and that a village was seen in the vicinity, col. Lane called a halt, and made preparations for a scout. We accordingly left our horses and baggage, and struck off in a north east direction; we soon found a small deserted village; proceeding onwards towards the south, we passed over some fine hammock, and came to a ford of some two hundred yards, which our troops crossed, partly by swimming, and partly by wading, carrying their ammunition on the points of their bayonets. Having reached the opposite side, we found extensive corn fields, and a few cattle and ponies: here was also a small village. Pursuing the trail, we came to an extensive marsh, a mile at least in length. Our Indians leading the way we plunged in, the mud and water being from four to six feet deep, our horses soon became exhausted and all very soon had to be abandoned. We then pursued our course on foot, the water at times up to our necks, and bottom so soft as to make it almost impossible to keep our heads above water.—We, at length, safely reached the shore; having passed a ford such as I presume has seldom or ever been attempted by white troops. We found ourselves in a beautiful fertile island, of several miles in extent, with a trail running south, which we pursued about a mile, and arrived at an extensive village, which had evidently been but recently abandoned.

Here we found corn, cattle, hogs, many domestic utensils, and several scalps of white men. Pursuing our course more westerly for half a mile, we came to another large village, where we also found the same. I presume the two villages must have contained about 150 lodges. From thence we followed the trail about half a mile, to a small declivity, at the bottom of which was a small pond, and on the side of which was a low scrub that extended to the left, about half a mile, and on the right of which was a thick hammock. Our van was here saluted by the enemy, which was promptly returned. We immediately pushed on, and a smart skirmish, of a half hour's duration, ensued, when the enemy gave way, and retired into the hammock; the scrub being so very thick as to be impenetrable. We pursued for a mile or more, both parties keeping up a running fight, when we came to an extensive open field, on the opposite side of which we pursued, when the enemy scattered in another thick hammock, and we gave up the pursuit, having, in the whole skirmish, had but one man wounded. It is but an act of justice to say, that every man done his duty, and I have any blame to find with the officers of the regiment, it is for their too great eagerness to push forward, and get in immediate contact with the enemy. The loss of the enemy could not be ascertained, nor the number engaged, in consequence of the well known fact, that they immediately carry their killed and wounded off the field; and that the scrub in which the principal skirmish took place, was so very thick, that but few could be seen at a time. I should say, however, that there were thirty or forty of them, and several were doubtless killed and wounded, from the heavy fire poured into the scrub. On return, our Indians killed some 100 cattle, and probably as many hogs, and drove to camp about 200 of the former. We returned by another trail in a north western direction, and having swam about 100 yards to the main land, reached camp about sunset. Our Indians during the night, brought in more cattle, so that we had in all about 400 head. We marched the next day about twelve miles, having passed on our right, a continued succession of extensive lakes and swamps. On Sunday, the 16th instant, we reached the Wythlacoochee at about 10 o'clock, and made immediate preparations for crossing, which we performed by 8 o'clock in the evening, by means of a small canoe, and some very small rafts made by the Indians. We encamped for the night just without the walls of Fort Izard; the next morning, pursuing our march, we struck a large trail leading to the southwest, which we followed for 7 miles, and encamped—during the evening our detachment arrived. The next morning, we took up our line of march for this place, proceeded 22 miles, encamped, and arrived here the next morning at half past nine o'clock.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your most obedient servant,

(Signed) HARVEY BROWN,
Lt. col. commanding Creek volunteers.
His excellency, R. K. Call, commander-in-chief.

TENNESSEE VOLUNTEERS.

GENERAL ORDER, No. 66.

Head quarters, army, E. T. and C. N.
Fort Cass, November 1, 1836.

The service of the companies of captains Vernon, Rogers and Parham, of the 1st regiment, and of captains Peak and Gillespie, of the 2d regiment, and the field and staff, and non-commissioned staff of each regiment of East Tennessee volunteers, assembled at this place for muster and payment.—Not being necessary at the present time, in the Cherokee country, in consequence of the pacific appearance of the Cherokees, they will return to their homes, and there wait, without pay, the future orders of the president of the United States or the commanding general of the Cherokee forces—it being distinctly understood, and the commanding general is so instructed by the war department, to make it known to the volunteers, that, having engaged to serve six and twelve months, unless sooner discharged, that they are liable to be called upon at any time during the period of their original engagement.

The commanding general avails himself of this occasion to congratulate the volunteers who are about to separate from him, on their release for a time, if not altogether, from the hardships of a campaign. Should their services, however, be again required in the tented field, he is assured, from the zeal, patriotism and devotion to their country, which have been so conspicuously manifested by them on all former occasions whilst under his command, that they will promptly obey the call.

In parting with them, the commanding general considers it due, to both officers and men, to announce that their conduct, from the commencement of the campaign to the present, has met his unqualified approbation; and should an occasion again require it, he would consider himself peculiarly fortunate if he could have the same officers and the same men to command. He tenders to them his best wishes for their future prosperity and happiness. By order of brig. gen. Wool:

THOS. C. LYON, A. D. C.

Fort Cass, Nov. 3, 1836.

SIR: The undersigned officers of the East Tennessee volunteers, who have been ordered home, agreeably to the general order, No. 66, cannot permit the present occasion to pass, when they are about to separate from you for a time, perhaps entirely, without manifesting the high regard which they entertain for you, both as a man and an officer. They also beg leave to tender you their thanks, and that of the men whom they have the honor to command, for the kindness and liberality with which you have uniformly treated them, and for the flattering testimonials of your approbation on this, as well as on other occasions. The field of their exertions has been too humble to permit them to boast—all that they can say is, that, if an ardent desire to serve their country, and to follow wherever duty would call them, entitle them to praise, they are sure they deserve so much. Nothing has been left them here but to prove themselves subordinate, obedient and willing soldiers, obeying with alacrity the orders of the government, and, at the same time, observing a manly and humane treatment towards the unfortunate Indians. Sir, they could not have returned to their homes if they had dared to sully the unspotted fame of Tennessee, by any acts of oppression and cruelty towards the unfortunate.—Our fathers have met the Cherokees in many a bloody fight, as almost every hill and valley in Tennessee will bear witness; but had we pursued a different course, the remnants of the pioneers would have turned their backs in scorn upon us: and we have witnessed with pleasure, and we take pride in bearing our united testimony to the same just and honorable course in yourself—that, whilst on the one hand you have represented with zeal, ability and firmness, the wishes of the government, on the other, all your intercourse with the nation has been characterized by impartiality, justice and humanity.

The general order which dismisses us to our homes for the present also informs us that, should an occasion require it, our services may be again demanded in the field. Be assured, sir, that, whenever called upon, we shall be ever ready to obey and to follow, whenever required, the standard of the stars and stripes. Should such be our destiny, we should esteem ourselves fortunate in again being placed under the command of an officer whose well-tryed valor and long experience would entitle him to our confidence and respect. We would commit our lives and honor to your keeping with a perfect assurance that nothing would be done on your part to compromise either.

Be pleased to accept for ourselves, and the men whom we represent, our best wishes for your future prosperity. We are, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

From the Baltimore American.

Believing that the occupation of the post of Nagodoches by a portion of the United States troops under general Gaines, and the sudden departure of M. Gorostiza, who had been sent to this country, as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary by the republic of Mexico, to lay before the president such representations as might express the views of his government in regard to the matter, are subjects which claim great interest with the people of this country, we have translated the following letter of M. Gorostiza, written at the time of his departure, together with the note of Mr. Dickens in answer to it. They are given in the "Courier des Etats Unis" of Saturday.

Note of Mr. Gorostiza, transmitted to the department of state.

It is with great regret that the undersigned learns from the note of the honorable Asbury Dickens dated the 18th instant, that the president, taking ground on the principle of self-defence, has not thought it his duty to accede to the just demands of the undersigned, relative to the invasion of the Mexican territory, by the troops of general Gaines, and that notwithstanding all his efforts, the president persists in his intention of maintaining as a principle, the pretended right to invade friendly territory, whenever he may think fit to do so, in defence of the frontiers of the United States.

It is plain that the undersigned cannot, for a moment, admit the existence of such a right, because it would be to acknowledge that every nation may take armed possession of the territory of its neighbors, without any other reason than an apparent necessity of so doing, and because such a right would be a constant attack upon the sovereignty and independence of all nations. In fact, what nation would not endeavor to fortify its own, at the expense of a neighbor's frontier, if, to establish the lawfulness of the proceeding, it were only necessary to assert the right.

The undersigned cannot assent to the latitude which the president of the United States gives to the principle of self-defence, in the case in question. This principle cannot exist except it be founded in justice and reason; if it do not spring, like all other principles which, united, constitute the law of nations, from that law of nature, which the ancients denominate the divine right; that law, which, whilst it imposes upon us the obligation of watching over our own preservation and defence, forbids us to do so to the injury of another; unless the danger be imminent, unavoidable, or infinitely greater than the evil which we may inflict.

Can it be said that the invasion of the Mexican territory has been called for by any necessity of this kind, in the conditions desired? After all the facts which have come to the knowledge of the undersigned; the pretended hostilities premeditated by the Indians, have only existed in the imagination of the Texans and of those who favor them; in other words, are inventions founded upon a wish to injure Mexico. A simple narration of facts will be sufficient to prove the truth of this assertion. So long as the colonists of Texas remained subject to the laws of Mexico, hostilities committed against the U. States by the Indians were never heard of, and, although, since the year 1832, there was not a Mexican soldier stationed at Nacogdoches or any other point on the frontier, no mention has been made of the Indians, during the revolution of Texas, either before or since Bexar was captured by the Texans. When, however, in the month of March last, the Mexican army, victorious on all sides, passed without difficulty the river Brasos, and no one doubted that it would reach the Sabine, for the first time, fifteen hundred Indians and Mexicans and Indians are spoken of, as being within some miles of Nacogdoches, putting every thing to fire and sword in order to induce general Gaines to approach the Sabine with all his troops, as he in fact did. Owing to the battle of San Jacinto, the danger which had threatened the revolutionists disappeared, and strange to relate, the Indians disappeared with it. General Gaines, who a few days previously asked for thousands of mounted men to meet an enemy which he represented as very formidable, then confesses that there had been a false alarm, and that the reinforcements were unnecessary. No mention was made of the Indians, so long as it was thought in Texas that the Mexican government would sanction the treaty extorted by violence from general Santa Ana, but, near the end of June, it was known that Mexico was preparing for a new campaign, and, as if by enchantment, the Indian aggressions reappeared upon the scene. There was only a rumor of an Indian invasion; the Texian commissioners who had repaired to Matamoros to treat for the exchange of prisoners, reported it; the Texian general Rusak, informed of their presence by Texian individuals, communicated it to general Gaines, who was equally well advised of it, as well as of the assassination of two whites at Navasoto, through the Texian maj. Sterling C. Robinson. Then this general perceived the necessity of recalling, to oppose them to the principal enemy, (principal belligerent), the mounted men whom he had sent back after the battle of San Jacinto, and it appeared to him necessary for the defence of the United States' frontier, to take possession of Nacogdoches, a Mexican town, fifty miles from that frontier. Can any thing be more clear?

If general Gaines had, to justify him in the course he has taken, any other information than that communicated to him by the enemies of Mexico and by persons who were interested in seeing the U. States compromise their neutrality on the Texian question, let it be produced to the undersigned.

If there has never been any danger—if such unfounded rumors have never been able to inspire the least fear—if these same rumors had been renewed several times, during the lapse of seven months, and have been constantly contradicted by facts, how can they be believed? How could such a danger ever have appeared imminent? how has it been made unavoidable? Where, in fine, was the absolute necessity, which caused, on this occasion, the principle of self-defence to be introduced, trampling under foot, as has been done, in its name, the most sacred rights of a friendly nation?

But, adds Mr. Dickens, the president should believe the information received from the general commanding the frontier, and is ready to punish him, if he has in any way gone beyond his instructions. The undersigned answers, in the first place, that the partiality of general Gaines in favor of the Texans, has been notorious, and his credulity during his command of the frontier so great that his information should never have had much weight with so enlightened a man as the president of the U. States, especially, since the governor of Louisiana and general Macomb have so well depicted the character of that officer and the influences to which his conduct has been subjected.

In the second place, the undersigned answers, that the punishment of general Gaines, or of any other officer, who may hereafter transgress the orders of the president, cannot be of any avail to Mexico, or repair the immense injury already done, and which may be done to her by the discretionary power with which the commanding general of the frontier has been invested by the president; and, in effect, what difference does the dereliction of a general make to Mexico, if by his fault the Mexican territory has been invaded? If this invasion has inspired Texas with greater confidence? If, through it, their ranks have been augmented by several thousands of volunteers, who never would have gone to Texas, if they had not expected to find an important support in the soldiers of the United States? In fine, if such an invasion, being extended to or renewed at the approaching campaign, the presence alone of the U. States troops in Texas, should cause embarrassments and collisions, which will interfere with the best concerted plans of the Mexican army. Mr. Dickens will agree with the undersigned, that his government cannot deem sufficient, a guaranty which does not protect Mexico from dangers, to which it is exposed in consequence of the presence of the troops of the United States upon her territory.

On this subject Mr. Dickens pretends that the instructions lately sent by his government to gen. Gaines, were more precise and positive than those before given, and that thus his successor, general Arbuckle, will be enabled, in conforming with them, to carry out the views of the president.

But if the instructions, to which Mr. Dickens alludes, are the same as those made known in the letter of the president to general Gaines of the 4th September, the undersigned cannot agree with the secretary of state ad interim; on the contrary, the undersigned finds that these instructions are a thousand fold more arbitrary than the first, for those designate at least the point at which the invasion is to stop, whilst these give entire liberty to the commanding general of the frontier, to pursue the Indians—who, according to his views, may show themselves hostile towards the United States—wherever he may find them, and then to take position on the Mexican territory wherever he may think proper. It is true, the presidents exhorts the general not to suffer himself to be deceived by false reports, and not to act, except when he shall be morally certain that the Indians enter upon the Mexican territory to accomplish hostile objects. But were not the orders given by Mr. Cass, secretary of war, to gen. Gaines on the 4th May and 11th July, the same, in different words. The power which similar orders have had upon his successors has been already seen, if they yield to the same influences, or permit themselves to be taken in by the same machinations. It is not probable that such will be the result, since at the information which the commanding generals receive comes from a country inimical to Mexico, disfigured by animosity and malevolence.

Such are the reasons for which the undersigned has constantly protested, since his answer to the memorandum of Mr. Forsyth of the 20th April, against the discretionary power with which the commanding general of the frontier had been invested. His knowledge of men enabled him to foresee that, sooner or later, such a power would become, in the hands of him who might be clothed with it, an instrument of peace or war between Mexico and the United States—and the undersigned valued too highly the friendship which united the two nations, not to tremble at the thought, that their relations were hereafter to depend upon the will or ignorance of a single individual. Mr. Dickens explains and attempts to justify so much confidence on the part of the United States, by saying that the distance at which the president is from the seat of war, does not permit him to employ any other means to meet the exigencies of events. But France was also distant from the United States, at the time when difficulties occurred between the two countries, and the United States would have demanded satisfaction, if an admiral had come from Martinique to break up the negotiations which were commenced. Would they not have said, with reason, that transactions of such importance required responsibilities paramount to those which a single man, let him be admiral or general, presents.

The undersigned has found it his duty to direct his attention to the desire manifested by the United States to take possession of Nacogdoches, at all hazards, and had it not been for the repeated assurances which he received from the department of state, that this measure had nothing to do with the settlement of boundaries, he confesses, he would not have known what to think of such a course.—The undersigned recollects that this same town of Nacogdoches has been proclaimed to be the property of the United States, by the secretary of war, when he wrote to general Gaines, to authorize him to repair to that place. The undersigned also remembers that when he addressed to Mr. Forsyth a protest against so strange a pretension, that gentleman, by order of the president, refused any sort of explanation.

He also remembers to have observed, as well in the notes of this department, as in the correspondence which has taken place between the secretary of war, general Gaines and some governors of states, a certain studiousness not to designate the Mexican territory which is beyond the Sabine, by any other title than that of "contested territory," or other similar names, as if actual treaty had not put an end to all dispute about limits, when the line of ancient Louisiana was extended between the rivers Marmonto and Carcasin, that is to say, thirty or forty miles on this side of the Sabine.

But the undersigned repeats, that the assurances respecting the nature of the movement of general Gaines appeared sufficient not to permit him to dwell longer upon the importance of such strange coincidences.

Such, then, were the constructions which determined the undersigned to write his notes of the 25th July and 4th August. He discovered then, as now, and for the same reasons, that the invasion of the Mexican territory by the United States troops was an insult perfectly gratuitous, since there had been no offence on the part of Mexico, nor any legitimate cause on the part of the United States. He demonstrated the immense losses sustained by Mexico in consequence of the invasion. At length he announced that, if the president rejected his just demands, he should be under the painful necessity of withdrawing, with his embassy extraordinary.—Nevertheless, the undersigned flattered himself that he would not be driven to this extremity, thinking that his reasons would be weighed in the balance of equity, and not that of a pretended right of convenience.

Unfortunately, it has not been so; the note of Mr. Dickens has left the undersigned no hope.—The explanations, moreover, given, in the name of the president, convince him of the little which Mexico is to expect from the United States, since the most sacred rights and most positive interests are sacrificed to the shadow of imaginary danger.—Mexico is insulted and wronged, through mere precaution.

Under circumstances so painful, the undersigned would fall short of his duty, if, as the representative of Mexico, he did not avail himself of the only means left to him to express at least how much he has been hurt by the wrongs done to his country on the part of the United States; he therefore declares of his own responsibility, that from this instant, he considers his mission as at an end.

The undersigned requests Mr. Dickens to have the goodness to cause his passports to be sent to Philadelphia, whither he will repair to-morrow.

The undersigned also requests Mr. Dickens to present his respects to the president, and to thank him in his name for the individual attentions which he has received whilst he has had the honor to be accredited near his person.

Finally, the undersigned repeats to Mr. Dickens what he has had the pleasure to state to him orally, that he will recollect always with gratitude, the frank and noble manner in which Mr. Dickens has conducted the relations with the undersigned, times and in regard to matters, which were far from agreeable.

To the hon. Asbury Dickens, &c. &c.
Washington, 15th October, 1836.

Note of Mr. Dickens to Mr. Gorostiza.
Department of state, Washington, Oct. 20, 1836.
The undersigned, secretary of state, ad interim, the United States, having informed the president the contents of the note of Mr. Gorostiza, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the republic of Mexico, dated the 15th inst. has received orders to transmit to Mr. Gorostiza the passports which he has demanded, and sends them accordingly.

The president regrets that an erroneous appreciation of the measures which he has deemed it his duty to take for the defence of the frontier, should have induced Mr. Gorostiza to terminate his mission. The president hopes, however, that the Mexican government will do him more justice.—To prevent all misapprehension, he will take proper steps and will send to Mr. Ellis such instructions which will enable him to make the necessary explanations.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to Mr. Gorostiza the assurance of his most distinguished consideration, (Signed) ASBURY DICKENS.

To his excellency senor D. Manuel E. de Gorostiza.

"REFORM OR REVOLUTION" IN MARYLAND.

INTERESTING CORRESPONDENCE.

The annexed additional correspondence between colonel Sellman and the whig electors of senate, took place on Saturday.

Annapolis, 17th Nov. 1836.

GENTLEMEN: In a correspondence previously had with you in reference to your views upon the subject of reform, you have signified your readiness to approve or consent to "constitutional reform."

You will oblige me, and promote the end we all, I hope, have in view, by stating whether, by the use of this term, you meant to be understood as intending to express your intention to elect a senate to promote the call of a convention, by the legislature of the state, for the purpose of reforming the constitution; provided that the call of such a convention should be required by a majority of the people, upon the submission of that question to them, by an act of the next legislature. I am, gentlemen, most respectfully, your ob't serv't.

JOHN S. SELLMAN.

To Messrs. Heard and Leigh, Kent and Dalrymple, Brawner and Merrick, Pratt and Duvall, Beall and Bruce, Vickers and Gale, Hicks and Lake, Handy and Williams, Spence and Franklin, Dudley and Dickinson, Ephraim Gaither.

Senate chamber, Annapolis, Nov. 19th, 1836.

John S. Sellman, esq. member of the electoral college.

SIR: Your note of this day asking us to say whether in a letter addressed to you on the 29th ultimo, by some of the undersigned, and which forms a part of the published correspondence between you and them, the term "constitutional reform" was to be understood in a particular sense specified by you, has been received; and in reply we beg leave respectfully to inform you that these words were used not in a restricted, but in their full and most comprehensive sense—that is—it was intended in that letter to convey the idea that in the opinion of those who signed it, in which opinion the undersigned fully concur, (should the required electoral quorum be obtained) a senate would be elected whose known principles would lead them to endeavor to effect all such amendments of the constitution as the interests and happiness of the people of the state might require; in doing which they would of course select any mode, by convention or otherwise, consistent with the principles and provisions of that instrument, which their enlightened judgments, due regard being had to the wishes of the people and the various interests of the state, might determine to be the best.

We have the honor to remain, your most ob't serv'ts,

Saturday, November 19th, 1836.

The electors met. On calling the roll, the same electors appeared and answered to their names as on yesterday.

On motion of Mr. Pratt, the electors adjourned until half past three o'clock, P. M.

Half past three o'clock, P. M.

The electors met. On calling the roll, the same electors appeared and answered to their names as in the forenoon.

On motion of Mr. Merrick, the electors proceeded to organize, when Benedict I. Heard, esq. of St. Mary's county, was elected chairman, and Joseph H. Nicholson appointed clerk.

On motion of Mr. Brawner, the following order was read and adopted:

Ordered, that Mr. Andrew Slicer be appointed messenger, and Mr. Samuel Peaco, doorkeeper to this college.

On motion of Mr. Pratt, it was ordered, that the chair appoint a committee to examine and inspect the returns of election, and whether they have been made agreeably to the constitution and the laws; whereupon Messrs. Pratt, Brawner, Handy, Spence and Sellman were appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. Pratt, it was ordered, that the messenger be sent to Mr. Sellman to inform him that the college is now in session, that he has been appointed a member of the committee of elections, and that his attendance is forthwith requested.

Mr. Sellman appeared and took his seat.

Wesley Linthicum, one of the electors returned for Anne Arundel county, Dr. Enoch George and John B. Thomas, electors returned for Queen Anne's county, and Marcy Fountain, an elector returned for Caroline county, appeared, qualified by taking the oaths required by the constitution and the laws, and by declaring their belief in the Christian religion and took their seats.

Mr. Pratt, from the committee on elections, submitted the following report, which was read and concurred in.

The committee on elections report, that they have examined the returns of the judges of the elections for the several counties, and for the city of Baltimore, and find by the said returns, the following persons are elected, declared and duly returned electors of the senate of Maryland, namely, for St. Mary's county, George S. Leigh and Benedict I. Heard; for Kent county, George Vickers and James P. Gale; for Anne Arundel county, John S. Sellman and Wesley Linthicum; for Calvert county, James Kent and James A. D. Dalrymple; for Charles county, Henry Brawner and William D. Merrick; for Baltimore county, Ephraim Bell and George Ellicott; for Talbot county, Solomon Dickinson and George Dudley; for Somerset county, William Williams and Samuel J. K. Handy; for Dorchester county, William W. Lake and Thomas H. Hicks; for Cecil county, John Evans and George A. Thomas; for Prince George's county, George W. Duvall and Thomas G. Pratt; for Queen Anne's county, Enoch George and John B. Thomas; for Worcester county, Thomas A. Spence and Henry Franklin; for Frederick county, Caspar Quynn and John Fisher; for Harford county, Thomas Hope and Samuel Sutton; for Caroline county, Robert T. Keene and Marcy Fountain; for Baltimore city, Joshua Vansant; for Washington county, Robert Wason and Charles McGill; for Montgomery county, Ephraim Gaither and Washington Duvall; for Allegany county, Richard Beall and Andrew Bruce; and that no return has been made for the city of Annapolis. All of which is respectfully submitted.

THOMAS G. PRATT, chairman.

On motion of Mr. Merrick, the electors proceeded to the election of a senate: accordingly the ballot box was prepared and the ballots deposited therein: it was sealed up and delivered to Messrs. Merrick, Sellman and Hicks, who were charged to count the ballots and report the result: they retired, and after a time returned and reported that on examination they had found that there were 26 votes given in all; of which Levi Hillery received 21 votes, Richard J. Bowie 21 votes, John V. L. McMahon 21 votes, Richard Thomas 21 votes, John Beckett 21 votes, William Schley 21 votes, Robert W. Kent 21 votes, William Price 21 votes and Elias Brown 21 votes, as senators of the Western Shore; and William U. Purnell received 21 votes, William T. Goldsborough 21 votes, Thomas King Carroll 21 votes, Edward N. Hambleton 21 votes, James B. Ricard 21 votes and Thomas Wright, of Thomas 21 votes, as senators of the Eastern Shore; whereupon it was declared that for the Western Shore,

SENATORS

Levi Hillery, of Allegany county,
Richard J. Bowie, of Montgomery county,

Edward N. Hambleton, of Talbot county,
James B. Ricard, of Kent county,

Thos. Wright, (of Thos.) of Queen Anne's co. are duly elected the senate of Maryland, for and during the term prescribed by the constitution and form of government.

On motion of Mr. Pratt, the following order was read and adopted:

Ordered, That the clerk record the proceedings of this body in the record book provided for that purpose, and now deposited in the library;

On motion of Mr. Merrick, the electors took a recess until nine o'clock, P. M.

Nine o'clock, P. M.

The electors met. On calling the roll, the same electors appeared and answered to their names as before the recess.

We certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the proceedings of the electors of the senate of Maryland. Witness our hands this 19th day of November, 1836.

AARON BURR.

The history of AARON BURR (says the editor of the Cincinnati Gazette) is a most instructive one. I am one of, perhaps, the few that never gave any credence to the charge of treason against him.—He sought, I am firmly persuaded, only to do that which American citizens are now doing in Texas with the approbation of their countrymen. He was marked for destruction, and destroyed. History durst not tell for whom, nor for what.

When his term as vice president expired, he took leave of the senate in a manner that made the deepest impression. The scene was represented as altogether extraordinary. Almost every senator found himself dissolved in tears.

The following account of it was given in the Washington Federalist, then printed in Washington city:

On Saturday, the 2d inst. (March, 1805), Mr. Burr took leave of the senate—this was done at a time when the doors were closed, the senate being engaged in executive business, and of course when there were no spectators. It is, however, universally said to have been the most dignified, sublime and impressive that ever was uttered; and the effect which it produced justified those epithets. I will give you the best account I have been able to obtain from the senators of several states, as well federal as republican.

Mr. Burr began by saying that he intended to pass the day with them, but the increase of a slight indisposition (sore throat) had determined him to take his leave of them. He touched slightly on some of the rules and orders of the house, and recommended, in one or two points, alterations, of which he briefly explained the reasons and principles.

He then said that he was sensible that he must at times have wounded the feelings of individual members. He had ever avoided entering into any explanations at the time, because a moment of irritation was not the moment for explanation; because his position (being in the chair) rendered it impossible to enter into explanations without obvious danger of consequences, which might hazard the dignity of the senate, or prove disagreeable and injurious in more than one point of view. That he had, therefore, preferred to leave to their reflections his justification; that on his part he had no injuries to complain of—if any had been done or attempted, he was ignorant of the authors, and if he had ever heard them he had forgotten them, for he thanked God he had no memory for injuries. He doubted not but they had found occasion to observe that to be prompt was not therefore to be precipitate, and that to act without delay was not always to act without reflection—that error was often to be preferred to indecision—that his errors, whatever they might have been, were those of rule and principle and not of caprice; that it could not be deemed arrogance in him to say that, in his official conduct, he had known no party—no cause—no friend.—That if, in the opinion of any, the discipline which had been established approached to rigor, they would at least admit that it was uniform and indiscriminate.

He further remarked that the ignorant and unthinking affected to treat as unnecessary and fastidious a rigid attention to rules and decorum; but he thought nothing trivial which touched, however remotely, the dignity of that body; and he appealed to their experience for the justice of this sentiment, and urged them in language the most impressive, and in a manner the most commanding, to avoid the smaller relaxation of the habits which he had endeavored to inculcate and establish.

But he challenged their attention to considerations more momentous than any which regarded merely their personal honor and character—the preservation of the law of liberty and the constitution. This house, said he, is a sanctuary and a citadel of laws, of order, of liberty; and it is here—in this exalted refuge—here, if any where, will resistance be made to the storms of popular frenzy and the silent arts of corruption; and if the constitution be destined ever to perish by the sacrilegious hands of the demagogue or the usurper, (which God avert!) its expiring agonies will be witnessed on this floor.

He then adverted to those afflicting sensations which attended a final separation—a dissolution, perhaps forever, of the associations which he hoped had been mutually satisfactory. He consoled himself, however, and them, with the reflections, that though separated, they would be engaged in the common cause of disseminating principles of freedom and social order. He should always regard the proceedings of that body with interest and with solicitude—he should feel for their honor, and the national honor, so intimately connected with it—and took his leave with expressions of personal respect, and with prayers and wishes, &c. &c.

In this cold relation, a distant reader, especially one to whom col. Burr is not personally known, will be at a loss to discern the cause of those extraordinary emotions which were excited—the whole senate were in tears, and so unmannered, that it was half an hour before they could recover themselves sufficiently to come to order and choose a vice president pro tem.

At the president's on Monday, two of the senators were relating these circumstances to a circle which had collected round them; one said that he wished that the tradition might be preserved as one of the most extraordinary events he had ever witnessed; another senator, being asked on the day following that on which Mr. Burr took his leave, how long he was speaking, after a moment's pause, said he could form no idea—if it might have been an hour, and it might have been but a moment; when he came to his senses he seemed to have awakened from a kind of trance.

The characteristics of the vice president's manner seemed to have been elevation and dignity, a consciousness of superiority, &c.; nothing of that whining adulation, those canting, hypocritical complaints of want of talents, assurance of his endeavors to please them, hopes of their favor, &c. &c. On the contrary, he told them explicitly that he had determined to pursue a conduct which his judgment should approve, and which should secure the suffrage of his own conscience; and he had never considered who else should be pleased or displeased, although it was but justice on this occasion to thank them for their deference and respect to his official conduct, the constant and uniform support he had received from every member, for their prompt acquiescence in his decisions, and to remark, to their honor, that they had never descended to a single motion of passion or embarrassment: and, so far was he from apologizing for his defects, that he told them that, on reviewing the decisions he had occasion to make, there was no one which, on reflection, he was disposed to vary or retract.

As soon as the senate could compose themselves sufficiently to choose a president pro tem. they came to the following resolution:

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of the senate be presented to Aaron Burr, in testimony of the impartiality, dignity and ability with which he has presided over their deliberations, and of their entire approbation of his conduct in the discharge of the arduous and important duties assigned him as president of the senate; and that Mr. Smith, of Maryland, and Mr. White [of Delaware] be a committee to wait on him with this resolution.

Attest: SAM. A. OTIS, secretary.

To which resolution col. Burr returned the following answer to the senate:

"Next to the satisfaction arising from a consciousness of having discharged my duty, is that which is derived from the approbation of those who have been the constant witnesses of my conduct; and the value of this testimony of their esteem is greatly enhanced by the promptitude with which it is offered.

"I pray you to accept my respectful acknowledgments, and the assurance of my inviolable attachment to the interest and dignity of the senate."

"AARON BURR."

How prophetic (so far, at least) the sentiments of A. Burr! The senate have stood, like Joshua, in holy writ, between the living and the dead, for the term of the Jeroboam administration, and staid the plague. What that body is soon to become, we know not; but we trust they will remain true to their station under the constitution.

FROM LIBERIA.

From the Frederick (Md.) Herald.

The following letter, which has been obligingly handed us for insertion, is from a colored man who left this neighborhood some two or three years ago for Cape Palmas; it conveys a flattering account of the happiness of his present condition, in comparison with his former. It will be read with interest by those who knew him, as conveying information which may be relied on with certainty, and as contradicting falsehoods which have been widely circulated in relation to this prospering colony:

Cape Palmas, Sept. 4, 1836.

DEAR SIR: I have received and read your very kind letter of June 27th, with a satisfaction in some degree proportioned, I humbly trust, to your Christian courtesy and affection; and I feel that I never can be too sensible of your merit, nor too grateful to you for the pains you have taken to communicate so desirable information to me and my family. An anxious solicitude (as you anticipated) for the welfare of my children and the situation of my friends and neighbors, had long borne with oppressive weight upon my mind. Many a tear and wakeful hour can witness how ardently I desired to hear from them, if no more, before I die; but, sir, by your kindness, this consuming want has been fully redressed. I sincerely lament that such an incredulity as you expressed, and one, too, so replete with embarrassment and difficulty to themselves and to their color universally, exists among the colored population in America in reference to the existence of such a place as Cape Palmas; likewise that they question and try to invalidate the many assertions that emancipated persons wishing to come to Africa, and shipping for that purpose, according to the directions of the Colonization society, do not safely arrive at that place, and are received and welcomed to our shores as free people. I lament that there are designing men actuated by motives of self-interest, or party spirit, who are so abandoned by truth and uprightness as to coin and circulate such glaring falsehoods. We are here, blessed be God, and, though some weak and fickle minded, who badly want a master, or whose minds are destitute of strength, solidity, or enterprise, may look to the land of bondage, long for their chains, talk about their fleshpots, or weep for the tombs of their fathers, I and many others are determined to stay here to live, and here to die, knowing that "better is a little with contentment than much and trouble therewith."

As to the report about starvation, of which you make mention, it is a palpable falsehood; I never wrote it, I never thought it, and what grieves me worse than all is that I have any relatives concerned in such a fabrication; and if they continue such a course, I awfully fear "the curse of the Lord will be upon their houses, and their children far from safety."

I heard from Calbert about six weeks ago, he was then well and doing well; but as to the young woman you wrote of, I am not prepared to communicate any information. Calbert is at Caldwell, one of the upper colonies.

Sir, I feel the weight and importance of your appeal to my Christian sympathies, and have already expressed in part my opinion as to the country to which I have emigrated. I have had but one mind, but one sentiment, but one purpose; that is, that the hand of Almighty God is in it, and his sleepless eye over it, and that whosoever avails themselves of the opportunity and offer of the society may be subsequently, nay, eternally benefitted. But in any place, if people are dissatisfied, they will be unhappy and miserable; and there are some here not pleased with the place, and the probability is that there will be more or less in every expedition. All persons have not enterprising minds, and this is one essential thing in people circumstanced as we are here. This is the reason why you hear of so many evil reports about our colonies; but for my own part I see nothing here to frighten people, but rather much to encourage them.

If I know any thing about things lovely and a good report, liberty, civil or religious, ought to inspire any slave to be free; but when both these, and many other things, are presented as incitements, the spirit of freedom should impel him to action; and when that freedom can be legally and quietly procured, a circle of endeared acquaintances, the prospect of pecuniary benefit, the sepulchres of departed kindred behind, nor difficulty nor danger before, should restrain him. Though I meet with some difficulties here, as well as others, it is not more than I expected, and I am fully persuaded that no man, properly weighing the matter, need lament the hour of his embarkation. In religion I enjoy myself better than I ever did in America, and better than I ever expected here; but our way is opening, our borders are enlarging, and the church is winning its widening way rapidly. Upwards of forty have been added to us this year: more or less of every expedition is brought in. Our prospects among the natives are flattering, and we are praying that the Great Head of the church will give us a great harvest of souls among these ignorant people. My family are all well. I hope, indeed, that you will be so kind as to answer this, and let me know what prospect there is of getting my children. I need not ask you this, you will do all for me you can. Give my regards to all that inquire after me.

I am, dear sir, your very obliged, humble serv't,
JACOB GROSS.

VOYAGE IN SEARCH OF LOST WHALERS.

From the London Nautical Magazine.

VOYAGE OF H. M. S. COVE, CAPT. JAMES ROSS, IN SEARCH OF THE LOST WHALERS.

While the Cove was at Stromness on her outward course, captain Ross received intimation from the admiralty of the arrival of the Abram, of Hull, and of her having drifted southward with the pack to the 54th degree of north latitude. In consequence of this information, he deemed it expedient to depart to a certain extent from the instructions of the admiralty. Accordingly, he made for the pack-edge in the above mentioned latitude, but, owing to the unfavourable weather, he did not succeed in gaining it until the 7th of April. Between that date and the 27th of May, captain Ross made a careful examination of the main pack-edge between the 54th and 55th degree of latitude, and failing to discover any traces of the Lady Jane or William Torr, he stood over to Holsteinburg, for the purpose of falling in with the boom-vessel, which he expected to join him there on the first of June.—Here the Cove remained for some days, obtaining a supply of water, and completing the requisite repairs. The Undaunted, of Kirkcaldy, had previously announced to captain Ross the arrival of the Lady Jane in England, but of the William Torr no tidings could be procured. The Terror boom-vessel not appearing,† the Cove proceeded to Whale-fish Islands, the last appointed rendezvous for the Terror, and arrived there on the 14th of June. On the 19th of the same month the commander received a communication from the admiralty, intimating, that in consequence of the arrival of the Abram, and of a statement made by Mr. William Tather, master of the Jane, the sailing of the Terror had been countermanded as unnecessary.

Captain Ross was directed to proceed homewards, after making every practicable endeavour to relieve the William Torr, in the quarter where he might consider her most likely to be found, on receiving the additional information. Though regretting that he had not the means of penetrating to the west land of Baffin's bay, the commander, guided by the statement of Mr. Tather, that the William Torr was seen on the 16th of October, 45 miles S. E. of Cape Searle, and drifting to the southward—deemed it his duty to advance to the quarter thus decidedly indicated, and thence endeavor to prosecute his inquiries at one of the northern settlements on the coast of Labrador. Before his departure he proceeded through the Waygatz strait, for the purpose of communicating with the whaling ships to the northward. On the first of July he reached Fore Island point, in lat. 70, 40, N. and long. 67 W. where he found about fifty vessels detained by the ice. Repassing the Waygat strait, he bore to the westward and reached the packing, lat. 69 N. and long. 57½ W. and gained the spot where the William Torr was alleged to have been last seen, on the 18th of July. A careful examination of the pack was made at this place. On the 14th of July the Cove fell in with three whalers, the Eclipse, Commerce and Resolution, the masters of which vessels, as well as those to the northward, gave the most solemn assurances that, although they believed the William Torr to be to the southward, still they would use their best endeavors to examine the whole of the west land for the crew. In the face of many difficulties, arising from foggy weather and heavy south easterly swells, capt. J. Ross persevered in exploring the pack to the southward.—His progress was impeded by a barrier, of heavy and extensive floes drifting to the southward, at a distance from fifty to seventy miles from the land.

*The only tidings received of this unfortunate ship appear to be the following extract from the Hull Packet:—"The William Torr, Greenock, August 27. The Antilles arrived here to-day from Venice and Trieste, sailed from the latter port on the 25th of June, and got down the Adriatic in four days; had afterwards much calm weather in the Mediterranean, and passed Gibraltar four weeks ago. On the 17th ult. lat. 46 deg. 11m. N. long. 170 deg. 30m. W. picked up a large oil cask, branded 'William Torr,' supposed to belong to the missing whaler."

After many ineffectual attempts to penetrate this barrier, he at last succeeded in again entering the pack, and in advancing through it to the settlement of Okkah, in lat. 57½ N. where it was hoped that the missionaries of the Unitas Fratrum, resident at that place, would be able to communicate some information respecting the William Torr. No account, however, of that vessel, or the crew, could be given by the missionaries, who declared that it was impossible for any ship, or the crew of any ship to have approached that shore on the north or south, within three hundred miles of the settlement, without their being speedily apprised of the fact.

Under all the circumstances—having closely examined the pack from the 54th to the 69th degree of north latitude—it appeared to captain Ross that all that the vessel under his command was capable of effecting had been accomplished. Presuming upon the correctness of the information furnished by Mr. Tather, he feared that the William Torr, if she had not returned to England, had been wrecked in the pack; but he still indulged the hope that she had wintered on the west coast of Baffin's bay, in which case her crew would most certainly have been discovered by some of the whale ships.

The Cove weighed anchor on the 4th of August, passed through Pentland Frith on the 19th ult. and arrived in sound condition and with all hands in perfect health, after a most perilous, and, we grieve to add, an unsuccessful service.

FOREIGN EXTRACTS.

The Chronique de Paris relates the following extraordinary scene as having taken place at the court of assizes, the truth of which, however, we do not take upon ourselves to vouch for. A youth of about 19 was brought to trial for having broken the window of a baker's shop and stolen a two-pound loaf. The president—"Why did you steal the loaf?" Prisoner—"I was driven by hunger." "Why did you not buy it?" "Because I had no money."—"But you have a gold ring on your finger, why did you not sell it?" "I am a foundling. When I was taken from the bank of a ditch, this ring was suspended from my neck by a silken cord, and I keep it in the hope of thereby discovering at last who were my parents. I cannot dispose of it."—The procureur du roi made a violent speech against the prisoner, who was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment for 5 years. Immediately upon this, a woman, more worn down by poverty than age, came forward and made the following declaration:—"Gentlemen of the jury. Twenty years ago, a young woman was seduced by a young man of the same town, who after deceiving her abandoned her. Poor and distressed, she was obliged to leave her child to the care of Providence. The child has since grown up, and the woman and her seducer have grown older. The child in poverty, the woman in misery, and her seducer in prosperity.—They are now all three in court. The child is the unfortunate prisoner whom you have just pronounced guilty; the mother is myself; and there sits the father," pointing to the procureur du roi.

Journey under water. The extraordinary feat of walking under the water for the distance of a mile was performed at Weymouth on Monday, Oct. 3d, by Mr. Joseph Orchard, the celebrated diver, who completed this unparalleled undertaking in the harbor, walking at the bottom of it from the new pier the whole length, and then making his appearance by landing at its extremity, bearing a pewter tankard, which he met with in his progress. He afterwards dived again, walked under the water across a portion of the bay, and landed at the stairs opposite Luce's hotel, amidst the cheers of an immense crowd who had accompanied and watched his submarine excursion. A boat, having an air pump and necessary apparatus for supplying Mr. Orchard with fresh air, attended him. [Bath Chronicle.]

Chronometers. Chronometers constructed with glass balance strings, instead of the old metallic ones, are now in course of trial at the royal observatory. On comparing the glass with the metallic springs, when the temperatures were raised from 32 to 100 degrees, it was found that while the loss in 24 hours, in the gold spring was 8 minutes 4 seconds—that of steel, 6 minutes 25 seconds—and that of platinum 2 minutes 31 seconds—that of a glass spring was only 40 seconds. These differences are ascribed by the inventors principally to the different degrees in which the substances had their elasticity reduced by an increase of temperature. As glass was thus found to suffer a much smaller loss of elasticity by this cause than metals, they proceeded to construct a glass balance, suited to the correction of the small error still occasioned by this cause, employing a glass disc for this purpose. The computation being completed, they next tested the isochronism (uniformity of movement) of the glass spring, and it proved to be as perfect as any metallic spring. In common with all other instruments of the same kind, they have shown a disposition to progressive acceleration—the cause of which is but little known, but which appears to be influenced by the action of air.

Medical statistics. A late fashionable physician, who for some years, received fees to the amount of £20,000 annually, endeavored, during the last three years of his life to ascertain the sources of the diseases to which he was principally indebted for his wealth. After comparing the memorandums of each year, he made the following as a comparative calculation:—Vauxhall, theatres and places of worship, 1,600; indulgence in wine, spirits and smoking, 1,300; indolence, 1,000; sudden changes in the atmosphere, 1,200; prevalence of the north or east winds, 1,800; force of imagination, 1,506; gluttony, 1,800; quack medicines, 900; love, 150; grief, 850; unsuccessful gambling, 900; contagion, 900; study, 950; reading novels, 450; of the doctor, 1,500.—

• • • A surgeon at Madeley, some time ago, produced his book of debts to some of the temperance friends, exhibiting accounts to the amount of £1,300 owing to him from different persons, out of which it appeared, £300 were for natural and accidental causes: all the rest was the result of drunkenness.

Various speculations are afloat as to the marriage of the princess Victoria. The German papers say that the duke of Brunswick (the reigning duke) has the wishes of William IV in his favor, and the duke's recent visit to England had reference to this union. If such a marriage were to take place, the duchy of Brunswick would become part of the British dominions; but while Hanover is felt to be a burden, we scarcely can desire any further continental territory. The duke of Brunswick here referred to is not the mad duke, who has become notorious by his late balloon ascent with Mrs. Graham.

Another report has it that one of the princes of the house of Orange solicited the hand of the princess, and, on being referred to her, received the cool and civil reply that her affections were fixed upon another prince! It is said that the young prince of Saxe Cobourg is the happy man, and the sudden visit of Leopold, king of the Belgians, to England, (he arrived last week), was caused by his majesty's desire to conclude matters, so as to insure the marriage of his nephew with the princess. She cannot marry without the consent of parliament, and, at any rate, the match would scarcely take place until May, when she will be eighteen.

The duke of Sussex has a son and daughter by his marriage with the lady Augusta Murray, to whom he was married at Rome, but the marriage was set aside by act of parliament; lady Augusta was the daughter of the earl of Dunmore. Colonel d'Este, the son, is one of the king's equerries, and Mademoiselle d'Este is to be married immediately, at Windsor Castle, to the prince Ernest of Hesse Philippstale.

A calculation has been made of the real and personal property of the peers, which shows a very small proportion to the general mass of wealth in the kingdom; there are Peers.	£	Total.

4 annual av'ge of property of 250,000—	1 million.
10 do. do.	100,000—	1 do.
20 do. do.	50,000—	1 do.
33 do. do.	30,000—	1 do.
50 do. do.	20,000—	1 do.
100 do. do.	10,000—	1 do.
200 do. do.	5,000—	1 do.

417 peers with an annual property of 7 millions, Five of these seven millions are entailed property; that is, must descend to the eldest son. The gentry, including the baronets, have five millions more of entailed property.

Stupendous undertaking. The most dangerous place for bathers in the world is the Serpentine river, in Hyde Park, London. The place now occupied by this noble sheet of water was formerly a succession of gravel pits, so that the footing is no where secure; and many a powerful swimmer has lost his life by being entangled in the masses of river weed. Public spirit in England is always on the alert for the general utility, and attention is now turned to this matter. The London Morning Chronicle says:

"Yesterday morning, at six o'clock, a number of workmen and excavators were set to work (the dam being completed for the purpose on Saturday last), commencing draining the immense body of water out of the Serpentine river, on Kensington garden side, preparatory to cleansing and leveling the bottom of it. It is to be hoped that the intended improvement to this dangerous river will have the effect of preventing the numerous fatal accidents which occur, more particularly during the summer months to bathers."

Emancipation of females from the harem. Constantinople, Sept. 7. The 4th September will be chronicled in golden letters in the annals of the seraglio, and, to all probability, its anniversary will be commemorated by the future generations of the Mussulman women as the æra of their deliverance from the bondage under which the stupid cruelty of man had for ages condemned their sex to groan. In the earlier part of the day the sultan sent for them to inform them that he had resolved on releasing them from the perpetual imprisonment within the precincts of his palace, to which they had hitherto considered themselves condemned for life, and on granting them the facility of occasionally seeking recreation out of doors. They might in future, whenever disposed to frequent any of the public walks on the Bosphorus, freely acquaint him with their wish, for he would feel it a pleasure to indulge their inclination. It were more easy to imagine than to describe the pleasurable sensation which these words of the sultan produced on his fair auditory. Their lord, it may fairly be presumed, at that moment appeared to their eyes as an angel sent from heaven to release them from their fetters. They simultaneously threw themselves at his feet, and bedewed them with heartfelt gratitude. The ladies did not, it may readily be believed, employ much time before the toilette mirror. A few minutes after the reception of these glad tidings they were already embarked, proceeding with all the rapidity which the concentrated energy of 14 sinewy boatmen could impart to their light bark towards Hunkiar Skelisy. A strange coincidence must it, no doubt, have appeared to them that this very sweet spot, where the sultan but four years previous sacrificed his independence on the altar of Russian perfidy, should become the theatre of the first act of their own emancipation. The rapid movement of the britschkas and the loveliness of the valley they crossed, soon drove away apparently all gloomy reflections from their minds; for on their arrival at the delightful Kiosk of Tokat they all took an equally active part in the scene of merriment and frolics, which continued without intermission until the lengthening shades from the surrounding hills apprised them it was high time to return home. So enchanted were they with this day's pastime, that on their arrival at the palace they besought the sultan to allow them to return to Tokat on the 6th, and did not desist from their applications until they had secured his consent.

Machiavelli avenged by the booksellers. The following is an amusing bibliopolical anecdote. A good many years after Machiavelli's death, a certain Jesuit of the name of Luchisini, published a book which he entitled "Sciocchezze scorpette nolle opere del Machiavelli, del Padre Luchisini." (Absurdities discovered in the works of Machiavelli, by father Luchisini.) As this title was much too long to put on a label at the back of the volume, the booksellers of that day reduced it to "Sciocchezze Luchisini." (Absurdities of father Luchisini;) and by that simple abbreviation punished the monk's insolence. The brain. M. Couerbe, a French physician, has recently examined the brain of a human being with a powerful microscope, by which means he finds it presents small globules slightly elliptical in shape. These are larger in the grey, than in the white substance of the brain. They are coagulable by acids, like those of the blood and milk. The analysis finds, besides the salts discovered by Vauquelin, lactic acid, sulphur and phosphorus—a pulverulent yellow fat, an elastic fat, a reddish yellow oil, white fatty matter, and cholesterine.

The portions which abound after this analysis, or treatment with ether and alcohol, is mostly composed of albumen, coagulated globules, and of membranous substance. The elements of the substances obtained by the analysis of Couerbet are carbon in the proportions of about 68 to the 100 parts, hydrogen 10, azote 5½, phosphorus 2½, sulphur 2½ and oxygen 15, in each of the five above mentioned substances, with the exception of the last, (cholesterine), in which carbon is in the proportion of 85, hydrogen 12, and oxygen 8 in the 100 parts.

Unpublished letters of Walter Scott. The following excellent letter of Walter Scott, hitherto unpublished, has lately appeared in the London journals:

"Sir: Your modest and sensible letter would not have remained so long without an answer, had it not reached me at a time of severe indisposition; even at present I must employ another hand than my own.

"I have been long under the necessity of laying down a positive and general rule, never to offer an opinion on the manuscript poetry of unknown correspondents. Besides being a most burdensome tax upon my time, (for I frequently receive two or three large packets in a week), I had generally the very unpleasant task of returning such answers as were disagreeable to my correspondents. In fact, sir, although nothing can be so rare as that high degree of poetical talent which arrests in a strong degree the attention of the public, yet nothing is more general among admirers of poetry and men of imagination, than the art of putting together tolerable and even good verses. In some cases, (and I am disposed to reckon my own among the number), either from novelty of subject or style, or peculiarity of information, even this subordinate degree of talent leads to considerable literary distinction; but nothing can be more precarious than the attempt to raise one's self from obscurity, and place empty and tantalizing objects in the view, diverting the poet from those which fairly and manfully followed out, seldom fail to conduct worth and industry to comfort and independence.

"I by no means advise you to lay aside your taste for literature; it does you credit as a man, and very possibly as a man of talents. But those powers which can make verses are applicable to the more useful and ordinary purposes of life. Your situation is at present dependant; but there is none so low from which patience, industry and perseverance, cannot raise the possessor of those excellent qualities. I would only advise you to publish in such a shape as to insure a return of profit, as some compensation for adopting the thriftless occupation of a poet. If you should resort to subscription, you are at liberty to put down my name; for I scarce think that a man who writes so sensible a letter can be guilty of the folly of publishing very bad verses. I am, sir, with sincere good will, your humble servant, WALTER SCOTT.

"P. S. As you have given me no direction, I can only use the general one pointed out by your letter."

EDUCATION IN ENGLAND.

The following are extracts from the report of the Manchester Statistical society on the state of education in Liverpool, alluded to in the last "REGISTER."

"With few exceptions the dame schools are dark and confined; many are damp and dirty; more than one-half of them are used as dwelling, dormitory and school room, accommodating, in many cases, families of seven or eight persons. Above forty of them are cellars.

Of the common day schools in the poorer districts it is difficult to convey any adequate idea; so close and offensive is the atmosphere in many of them, as to be intolerable to a person entering from the open air, more especially as the hour for quitting school approaches. The dimensions rarely exceed those of the dame schools, while frequently the number of scholars is more than double. Bad as this is, it is much aggravated by filth and offensive odours arising from other causes.

One pointing out to one mistress of a dame school, the unfavorable effect these circumstances must produce upon the children, she replied, "They thrive best in dirt."

The circumstance which proves the unwholesome condition of many of these schools, is the very rapid spread of infections or epidemic disorders, which occasionally make their appearance in them. The measles, scarlet fever, small pox and ophthalmic affections, never attack one scholar alone. Frequently one-half of the scholars are affected at the same time; and some of the schools have been visited at times when two-thirds of the children, usually attending, were detained at home by such complaints. These cases have invariably occurred in the most unhealthy and ill ventilated schools, while in schools more favorably circumstanced, it has rarely happened that more than three or four of the scholars have been absent on account of illness at the same time.

In a garret up three pair of dark broken stairs was a common day school, with forty children, in the compass of ten feet by nine. On a perch, forming a triangle with the corner of the room, sat a cock and two hens; under a stumpy bed, immediately beneath was a dog kennel, in the occupation of three black terriers, whose barking, added to the noise of the children, and the cackling of the fowls, on the approach of a stranger, were almost deafening. There was only one small window, at which sat the master, obstructing three-fourths of the light it was capable of admitting.

At another school, also in a garret, very much dilapidated, and only nine by twelve feet, were thirty-eight scholars; not more than six of these had a book; at which only five boys could be accommodated at the same time, with all the provision for writing and arithmetic. The room below was in the occupation of a cobbler, whose wife lay ill in bed of a fever, himself pursuing his avocation near the bedside.

Another school is worthy of description. The descent is by a flight of narrow steps, fifteen inches in width, and covered with filth; the room is naturally dark, but is rendered doubly so, from the dirt without, and from the steam within the windows; the forms are composed of four old bed stocks, resting on brick supports; the writing desk is a three legged table or stool, accommodating only one scholar at a time. The master, an Irishman, represented himself as a "graduate of the university of Munster, the first place for scholarship in all Ireland."

In one poor school, an old form supplied the place of a desk; three small children were kneeling on the floor to write at it, and two taller ones sat on the floor with their legs thrust under it.

With reference to religious and moral instruction, we find the following account.

In one school the master professed to teach the Catholic, church of England, and Swedenborgian doctrines. In another, the scholars were said to be taught according to their respective creeds. In a third, they were allowed, once a week, to learn any catechism they brought with them. A mistress of one of the dame schools, who taught both the Catholic and Protestant catechism, said she "took care to keep both going together, and then no harm could come out of it." One master professed to teach the Protestant and Catholic doctrines, and some other which he said he did not rightly understand himself.

The mistress of a girl's school expressed a hearty wish that this enquiry might lead to putting down all Catholics and Dissenters, whom she designated as a bad disaffected set. "I hate Dissenters worse than the Catholics," said she, in the presence of her pupils, "I once set on foot a subscription for a poor man who was a Dissenter, and he had the impudence to say that I had kept back part of the subscription money, so that, (raising her voice, and giving strong emphasis to the word never) I determined never to do a good action, and I never will." This individual had previously insisted upon the care she took of the morals and religion of her pupils.

"No less than ten of the mistresses of dame schools, in the parish of Liverpool alone, acknowledged to, being in the receipt of assistance from the poor rates; and such is the poverty and destitution of some of these schoolmistresses, that they cannot even provide forms for the children to sit on."

The following anecdotes will show the attainments of some of the teachers.

One master, who stated that he used the globes, was asked if he had both or one only—he replied, "Both; how could I teach geography with one?"—Being further questioned on the subject, it appeared that both were in his opinion necessary, because one was supposed to represent one half, and the other the remaining half of the world.

It appears that, 185 out of 438, (the total number of the two classes of schools), the masters, upon being questioned on the subject, professed to teach morals; but the profession, in the mode in which it was generally made, seemed to spring from an apprehension that the question was one involving the respectability of the school, and our agent, could find no evidence that systematic training in the principles of morals was ever attempted, or even supposed to be possible.

In the poorest schools, no pretence is made to teach morals, and many masters have no idea what teaching morals can possibly mean. The generality of teachers indeed entertain very imperfect notions on this subject. The prevailing idea is, that morals are best taught by visiting the more flagrant deviations from rectitude, with the rod.

To show how imperfect the knowledge of some masters on the subject of morals, one master being asked if he taught morals, observed, "That question does not belong to my school, it belongs more to girls' schools."

The character of the teachers is thus set forth:

"It is not uncommon to find the mistress of a dame school gone out for the day, leaving the school in charge of some neighbor or neighbor's child. Sometimes she is found washing at the back of the house; at other times, the washing and drying is carried on in the school.

"On one occasion, the children of a common day school were found playing in a garret, and it was stated that the master had been away drinking, for several days together.

"Dame schools are almost universally ill supplied with books. The poverty of the mistress renders it quite out of her power to provide them, and the parents neglect to furnish their children with them, either from the same cause or from indifference.—In many of those schools which are not wholly destitute, the books are of such a mixed character, as to defy enumeration, consisting of old magazines, of parts of novels or sermons, and sometimes even of political pamphlets.

"Some were more honest—one conscientious teacher of a common boys' day school, an Irishman, being asked if he taught grammar, replied very candidly, 'Faith, and it's I that don't; if I did, I must lache that thing I don't know myself.'

"Much difficulty was experienced in obtaining the numbers in some of the dame schools, from a notion that it is unlucky to count their scholars.—One had conscientious scruples and was deaf to persuasion, saying it would be flat flying in the face of Providence. 'No, no,' said she, 'you shan't find me counting; see what a pretty mess David made of it when he counted the children of Israel.' The number was afterwards obtained without doing violence to her principles.

"The number of charity schools in the borough of Liverpool forms a much larger proportion of the whole number of schools of all sorts, than in either of the towns previously examined by the society. More than one-third of the whole number of children returned, as receiving instruction of one kind or another, are educated in charity schools; but it ought to be observed, that in the great majority of these charity schools, the scholars themselves contribute something towards the expense of their education."

And the following is the conclusion to which the enquiry leads, it refers only to the town of Liverpool.

The result of the committee's inquiries may be expressed in the following condensed form:

- 12,000 children of all ages receiving entirely at the cost of the parent, an education of a very low order.
- 13,000 children of all ages receiving, partly at the expense of the parents, partly at the expense of private benevolence, an education more or less effective, but in all cases, of some real value to the children.
- 8,700 children of all ages receiving some instruction in Sunday schools, but no regular education.
- 4,000 children of the upper and middle classes, educated in superior private schools.

30,000 children between the ages of five and fifteen, receiving education, either really or nominally.

Taking this as a fair measure of the quantity and quality of the education received by the children of the working classes, in this country, and what, in other civilized countries, has been done for the education of the same class, the result is one which cannot be dwelt upon without some feeling of pain and humiliation.

NATIONAL TYPOGRAPHICAL CONVENTION.

ADDRESS TO THE PRINTERS OF THE U. STATES.
Washington city, City Hall, Nov. 11, 1836.

FELLOW CRAFTSMEN: The delegates from the different societies which were invited to meet at Washington on the 7th November instant, to form a convention, to take into consideration the present state of the printing business, are about closing their labors. They feel desirous to address you, in order to lay before you the motives which induced the call, and which urged them to adopt measures to form a constitution for the originating and management of a general association, under the denomination of the NATIONAL TYPOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY, to be held annually, (at New York, September 1, 1837), and to be composed of delegates from all societies throughout the United States, proportioned to the rate of their sitting members.

From recent attempts at encroachments on the rights of journeymen, and to prevent them in future, it has been judged most prudent to seek safety in union. This concert of action becomes more imperative, when we daily perceive the rapid strides which printing is making over a vast extent of country, and the measures which may be adopted to injure us. It is a lamentable fact that the newspaper press has almost entirely passed from under the control of members of the profession, into the hands of speculators and partisans, who, ignorant of the feelings and sympathies of the craft, create dissensions and difficulties where they cannot make them subservient to their will and interest.

As nothing of a permanent nature could be undertaken by this convention, it confined itself solely to recommendatory measures, such as were suggested during the several meetings which were held, leaving much important matter to the societies to accomplish before they confirm and ratify the constitution—copies of which will be sent to all the local typographical societies in the union for their approval before the national society meets—but in the mean time, it is incumbent on us to make you acquainted with the various topics which engaged our time and attention, and the results to which we have arrived.

In looking back but a few years, we may almost say a few months, associations by men in the humbler spheres of life were regarded, even by men of sound legal knowledge, as a departure from common usage, which ought to be considered as a combination against wealth and rank, and contrary to common law, for which they pretended to have many strong judicial precedents. But already have the true principles of political knowledge spread almost with the celerity of sound, and stamped the improvements of the age; all that dread of danger has disappeared, and given place to more congenial feelings. So much so, that it now becomes the duty of the working classes to watch the employment of capital in the hands of the speculator. Indeed, it is an important object for the study of legislators, to restrain the capitalist in his wild career of gain that he may not injure the poor mechanic in the line of his profession. Should this maxim be overlooked, the wealthy of the land may increase in riches, but the most abject poverty and distress will be sure to follow in the track. Does it not then become the industrious mechanic to protect himself and family from pauperism, by adopting a mode of defence which will cause a more general distribution of that prosperity which is produced by his hard earnings?

To you, fellow craftsmen, who take a pride in your profession, and look upon the present degraded state of the press as a public misfortune, which must eventually corrupt the morals of the community, we would appeal to arrest this evil; or, before many months pass over, the art of printing will no longer give support to its professors. The demon of misrule has entered the sacred temple of liberty, corrupted its officiating priests and profaned the holy altar. This picture is too true, and has already occupied the attention of many good men of our land, and among that number Noah Webster. As a proof of which, we give the following living picture of the press from the pen of this great man:

"The press, when judiciously managed, is one of the greatest blessings of a civilized people; when abused, it is the most powerful instrument of mischief. Probably no civil privilege in this country is so much perverted and abused. In no country is reputation held so cheap. Slander, like the sythe of death, levels all worth and distinction; the press, one of the noblest instruments of improvement, is converted into an instrument of deception, and the means of making citizens hate and oppress each other. The moral effect of this abuse is lamentable; for it seems to have become a ruling belief of partisans that a man has a right to delaminate those who differ from him in opinion."

Thank God! but few of these corrupt conductors of the press are practical printers. Unfortunately, however, they manage to carry on this warfare by the service of boys, raising six or eight at a time for a few years, to subvert their nefarious purposes, and then cast them on the profession for support. By this means, they continually keep the stream flowing into the large cities, driving the journeymen from their situations to make room for those youths, who will labor for a mere pittance to obtain a livelihood, and hence become an object to some avaricious employers—inconsiderate men.

This we consider a cruel and unjust practice, and are determined, as far as lies in our power, to meet the evil with energy and firmness. We call upon each local society to unite with us in denouncing it, and upon every parent or guardian to protect the interest of their charge, by compelling their boys to be bound as apprentices, and to be taught a knowledge of their business, and not allow them to be thrown into the company of immoral and profligate youths, encouraged by receiving more money than they are acquainted with the use of.

We would advise every society not to lose one day in adopting some specific act on this head, that all may feel the benefit. The suggestions of the national society's constitution will point out a mode to regulate you in this all-important and long complained of evil, which has already ruined the business in more than one city; and we must congratulate those societies who have undertaken to check this wicked custom, and expose those who traffic at their neighbors' cost.

We cannot embrace the one half of the objects brought before this convention in a newspaper address, which must, of necessity, be very brief; but one serious evil we must not omit, because, if longer persisted in, it will reduce us to the condition of servile tools of party, which will deprive us of the most distant hope of benefitting ourselves by our profession. This evil exists in a country, too, where the press is considered free, and the principles of liberty are well known. We have allusion to that unjust and pernicious practice of the legislatures of many states, as well as of the federal government, of bestowing all their printing and binding in such a manner as to reward their partisans, even to the smallest job, when they are neither printers nor at all acquainted with the art, to the exclusion and utter ruin of the practical man. This ought not to be submitted to, and we must endeavor to have it altered, if necessary, through the ballot-box, by calling on all whose interests may be concerned to unite with us. It is the duty of legislators to protect all classes, and not to oppress one to elevate another. We may compete with capital; but cannot with the power of a state. Security in the right of what we possess is the principal object of the social compact, and the property of the working man consists in the knowledge of his calling, and any infringement of that right is at once subversive of all civil institutions.

We cannot overlook what has been pointed out to us since we assembled here, through the public papers. A joint stock company is about being formed in Boston* to carry on printing by means of boys; and we also perceive, from a prospectus published in the United States Telegraph, that a more formidable inroad is about to be made by a joint stock company with a capital of $500,000 under a charter. This chimerical plan, of itself, could not excite one uneasy sensation in the breast of any practical man; but, in this age of speculative mania, others may attempt the same or similar projects.—The following single extract will at once exhibit how our interests might be destroyed by the failure or success of such undertakings.

"It is proposed (says the prospectus) to manufacture the paper used in printing, and thus save the expense of drying it for market, putting it into bundles, transportation to market, commission, interest, and guaranties, equal at least to twenty per cent.

"A greater saving can be made by the employment of boys in composition, printing, and binding. This, with the profits on periodicals, reprints and elementary books, will secure to the stockholders a good dividend."

Our efforts in endeavoring to enlist your feelings and co-operation, are for the benefit of all, individually and collectively. We do not intend to meddle with the concerns of local societies—and therefore, can fix no standard of wages, but obligate ourselves to sustain each other in our general interests, when prudence dictates the interference. We therefore call upon you, through your associations, to concert measures to have delegates sent to "The National Typographical society," to cause its exertions to be felt from one end of the union to the other, in sustaining the honor and interests of our profession. In those sections of the country where no society is as yet established, we trust the craft will see the necessity of immediately uniting themselves in some bond of union. Where they are few and scattered, a chapel, or some such meeting may be concerted, to appoint a delegate or proxy.

To the rising profession of the west, we should particularly address our solicitations, as they promise to become the future guardians of the people's rights. To them this is a most important era. However small may be their numbers, they ought now to concentrate and unite themselves together; they have no old prejudices to contend against—no inveterate habits to overcome; the task to them must be a pleasant and an easy one, and on which might be predicated many a useful and valuable institution. Libraries or reading rooms might be got up, and made the channel of much friendly intercourse between them. Through this means of acquiring information, they might protect the yet almost uncorrupted west from the hiring editor's contaminating pen, and become the true recorders of the nation's progress to greatness and glory in the peaceful pursuits of civil life, or its struggles in the field of glory, when battling against the oppressor for liberty and independence.

Although we do consider it the duty of all to join and lend their aid to some association, we would rather invite than use coercive measures to induce them to become members. We would do this in the best of faith, that we might have all the good and moral men of the craft classed as brothers of one family, and none to stand aloof but the unworthy and debased. We hope the different societies will so amend the qualification articles of their constitutions as to make all who are now ineligible from want of certificate, &c. of apprenticeship, members, who may be now working at the business as acknowledged journeymen. When the national society's constitution is ratified, then six years will be the minimum standard of apprenticeship for boys to be bound. This regulation the employing printer will find to be of primary importance to his interests and welfare. And thus reciprocally united, we may bid defiance to the efforts of the speculator's capital, and make our press to be heard, whether in the turmoil of a republic or in the dead calm of a despotism. Through the agency of the delegations, a statistical table will be annually published of the number of papers, their editors, how many are printers, men employed, members and not members, boys bound, &c. so that we may possess all necessary information concerning the management of the palladium of our rights, which the public as well as the craft should know.

We fear we have transcended our limits for publication, and must omit much of what we would wish to suggest. We would remark, however, that the union we are about to form is only the association of social feelings; we have encroached upon no man's rights, nor committed an act that we shall ever have cause to regret. The interests of the employer and journeyman have been assimilated, and, we hope, rendered permanent for the time to come.

The convention transacted its arduous duties with the greatest harmony and good feeling towards each member; and never did a meeting take place under more propitious auspices as to the future welfare of the profession at large.

NOTE.—All communications on business connected with the National Typographical society, may be addressed to Mr. CHARLES A. DAVIS, No. 529, Pearl street, New York city.

MESSAGE OF THE GOV. OF GEORGIA.
Message of governor Schley, to both branches of the general assembly of the state of Georgia.

Executive department, Georgia.
Milledgeville, 8th Nov. 1836.

Fellow citizens of the senate and house of representatives:

Since the adjournment of the last session of the general assembly, events of an extraordinary character have addressed themselves to the sympathy and courage of Georgia, and I am proud to say, that the appeal has been answered with a promptness and zeal worthy of her pride and patriotism.

Information having reached the executive early in the month of January, by a communication from governor Eaton, that the Seminole Indians had raised the war whoop in Florida, and were perpetrating its concomitant deeds of horror, and the emergency being deemed too imperious to await the distant action of the general government, a call was forthwith made for volunteers to aid our suffering countrymen to repel the bold and barbarous invaders—and, to provide against contingencies, a draught of three thousand five hundred men was required. But, to the honor of Georgia, volunteers stood forth from the sea board to the mountains in numbers far beyond the exigency, and with an eagerness evincing, that though "the days of chivalry are past," its spirit has not departed.

As all could not be accepted, and no selection could be made for merit where all were equal in zeal, the contemplated succour was confided to those who had the fortune to be foremost in time.

Before the necessary preparations were completed, major general Scott of the army, charged with the impending campaign, made a requisition on Georgia for two regiments, one of infantry and one of mounted men. Of the first, five volunteer companies, viz: the Morgan Rangers—the Putnam Fencibles—the Hancock Blues—the Macon Volunteers and the Monroe Musketeers assembled at Macon and were organized into a battalion under the command of major Mark A. Cooper, an officer of their own choice, it being deemed proper, in the absence of positive law to the contrary, to suffer volunteers in the service of their country, to elect their own commander.

On the seventh day of February this battalion embarked on boats prepared for the occasion, with orders to proceed to Picolata and report to major general Scott, or to such other officer of the United States' army of superior rank to major Cooper, as should be in command at that post. Besides this battalion, there were two volunteer companies from Augusta—the Richmond Blues and Richmond Hussars—which embarked at that city on board a steamer for Picolata. The second battalion of infantry was in progress of organization from the counties of Coweta, Carroll, Campbell, Fayette and De Kalb, and was intended to be conveyed in steamers from Columbus to Tampa Bay; but before the companies took up the line of march, despatches were received by express from general Scott, requesting that they should not proceed to Florida.

Of the mounted regiment, one battalion composed of the Washington troop—the Hancock troop—the Jefferson Hussars—the Baldwin county cavalry, and the Houston cavalry, was ordered to repair to Dublin and elect a major to command them; but, owing to the non-arrival of some of the companies as soon as was expected, the election did not take place, and each company found its way, in its own manner, to Picolata. Here the Washington, Hancock and Jefferson companies entered the service of the United States and elected capt. Douglass of the Jefferson Hussars, to command them. In addition to these companies, capt. Charles H. Nelson of Cherokee, raised a mounted corps, composed of citizens of Cherokee and Wilkes, and repaired to Florida, where they, also, entered the service of the United States.

The privations and perils of an arduous and harassing campaign were sustained by these troops, with a fortitude and courage honorable to themselves and their country, and which gave assurance (since realized) that in the hour of danger, Georgia may safely rely on the patriotism and gallantry of her sons.

A second battalion of mounted men, to complete this regiment, composed of Putnam mounted riflemen—the Gainesville dragoons—the Walton county cavalry—the Buckskin Hussars, of Dooly county—the Butts county cavalry and the Twiggs cavalry, assembled at Hawkinsville, the place appointed for rendezvous, and was organized, by the election of major David Ross to command them. This battalion proceeded to Black Creek, in Florida, with the intention of entering the service, but they were not accepted, because the campaign was about to be closed, and the officer in command at that station directed them to return. Although this battalion was not formally mustered into the service, the U. States have paid them and defrayed the expenses of their march to and from Florida.

Brigadier general Burwell Pope was appointed to command the Georgia troops in Florida, and proceeded to Picolata for that purpose. But one battalion of infantry having been detained by request of general Scott, and the second battalion of mounted men having been ordered back to Georgia, the troops were reduced below a brigadier's command, and general Pope accordingly returned without an opportunity of taking part in the campaign.

Having no authority to draw on the treasury of Georgia to defray the expenses of bringing these troops to the field and marching them to Florida, I requested for this purpose, funds from the secretary of war, who promptly remitted to me twenty-five thousand dollars. The greater part of this sum was expended in that service, and the balance has been applied to the Creek war, to which I shall hereafter advert. But before the receipt of this money, circumstances connected with the public safety, compelled me to draw on the contingent fund for six hundred and sixty-eight dollars and six cents, which I have since returned to the treasury; and besides this amount, the treasurer, col. Haynes, at my request, promptly assumed the responsibility of furnishing me with such sums of money as were necessary to meet the daily demands of the service, until I could receive remittances from the war department. In addition to the twenty-five thousand dollars, above mentioned, I have since received the sum of ten thousand dollars, which has enabled me to return to col. Haynes the whole amount borrowed, and to pay off the accounts contracted for transportation, subsistence, &c. &c. of the volunteers.

In compliance with a resolution of the general assembly, passed at the last session, I caused the counties of Baker, Dooly, Early, Lee, Randolph, Stewart and Sumter to be furnished with arms and ammunition, and a company of spies, consisting of twenty mounted men; to be raised in each, to protect the people against hostile incursions of the Creek Indians. These companies were kept in service for some time, and until it was deemed proper to supersede them by a force believed to be more efficient. This was a small battalion of mounted men who volunteered, at the invitation of the commander-in-chief, to serve three months under the command of major John H. Howard, to whom a special commission of major was given for that purpose. This battalion was mustered into the service of the U. States, and supported and paid by that government. The expenses of the spies, raised under the authority of the resolution, have not been paid, because at the time that the accounts were being made out and arrangements were in progress to pay them, the Creek war commenced, which so disturbed the people of those counties, and occupied the time and attention of the executive, that it was not possible to do so—and since that time, these causes have not ceased to exist and exert their influence.

A short time before the expiration of the term for which major Howard's battalion had volunteered, the Creek Indians became hostile and rendered it necessary to call on the people of Georgia to take up arms in defence of their state. On the 13th of May, a general order was issued inviting volunteers. The invitation was accepted with great promptness, and in a much shorter time than it is generally supposed that unorganized militia can be brought to the field, a force of between four and five thousand composed of volunteers and draughted militia, was assembled at different points on the Chattahoochie. Some of these troops had to march a distance of two hundred miles, and yet they were nearly all assembled at the different places appointed, by the 6th day of June, making the whole time, from the date of the invitation to the time of arrival, only twenty-two days.

The Florida campaign had exhausted the arsenal at Milledgeville of nearly all the arms. Those which still remained were immediately forwarded to Columbus and West Point, and an order was issued to the military store keeper, at Savannah, to ship one thousand with the accoutrements, to Augusta, whence they were immediately sent in wagons to Columbus. No time was lost in the transportation of these arms, and they arrived at different times between the 4th and 15th days of June. I also requested the officer in command of the United States' arsenal, near Augusta, to forward to Columbus one thousand muskets, which request was promptly granted, and the arms were immediately put on board of wagons; but by misconduct or negligence in those having charge of the wagon train, they did not arrive until the last of June or first of July. Major general Scott had ordered a quantity of Hall's rifles from Picolata to Darien and thence to Hawkinsville, to be conveyed from that place to Columbus, together with a supply of provisions for the army; but these, also, were delayed by untoward circumstances, long after the time of their expected arrival.

Knowing that the president of the United States had charged major general Scott, with the defence of the nation against any hostile movements of the Creek, as well as the Seminole Indians, I addressed him a letter on the 18th day of May last, requesting him to repair to the Georgia frontier, on the Chattahoochie, and take charge of the military operations in that quarter. This letter met him at Savannah, and he immediately proceeded to Milledgeville, where he arrived on the evening of the 28th May, in company with major general Jesup, whom he joined at Augusta. On the next morning, these gentlemen and myself left Milledgeville for Columbus, where we arrived on the morning of the 30th of May.

Before the arrival of generals Scott and Jesup, and whilst the responsibility of the campaign rested on me, I had determined to place on the eastern margin of the Chattahoochie, a force capable of preventing the escape of the enemy, believing, that whenever he should be pressed in Alabama, he would seek refuge in flight, and that the conflict would be, as it eventually was, on the territory of Georgia.

This purpose, to which the troops were directed as speedily as they could be organized and armed, was recommended not only by the consideration stated, but by the melancholy fact that the Indians had murdered, or driven from their homes, all the white inhabitants of Alabama that were within their power, and destroyed their property, before the army had reached the frontiers of Georgia. There was nothing left to tempt their cruelty or rapacity; and, therefore no feeling of humanity forbid the caution intended to force them into conflict or capitulation. The events of the campaign have confirmed my confidence in those views, for our troops, on the river, were engaged in almost daily contests with the flying foe, and all the battles of the Creek war, have been fought by Georgians, on the soil of Georgia.

Immediately on the arrival of gen. Scott, at Columbus, he assumed the command of the army and the direction of the war, and gave the high sanction of his approbation, to the course which had been pursued.

Want of arms, ammunition and provisions, which had to be conveyed from Savannah, Augusta, Picolata and New Orleans, delayed, for a time, the contemplated movement on the enemy, and was a source of embarrassment, not less vexatious to those who had taken timely measures to provide them, than to the army, impatient as they were, to avenge the wrongs of their suffering countrymen. But this delay has been greatly exaggerated by mistake, or misrepresentation, and a just allowance has not been made for misadventures, over which those in command had no control.

As the troops arrived, they were equipped and sent forward as speedily as possible. The first companies were mustered into service on the 2d or 3d day of June, and the great body of the army took up the line of march under generals Scott and Sanford, eighteen days thereafter. If due allowance be made for the time necessary to procure munitions of war from distant points, to muster into service, officer, arm and furnish with ammunition, camp equipage and provisions, between four and five thousand men, whose peaceful pursuits have given them but little aptitude to military organization, it will be found that the actual detention was unavoidable and very inconsiderable; and under less momentous and exciting circumstances, it would have received a more general and just explanation.

By virtue of the authority vested in the executive by the 45th section of the militia law of 1818, I appointed major general John W. A. Sanford and brigadier generals Henry H. Lowe, Zachariah White and James Wood, to command the troops. These officers discharged their duty with promptness and ability, and to the entire satisfaction of the army and the people.

A few days before general Scott moved from Columbus, gen. Jesup, with the Alabama troops and friendly Indians, marched from Tuskegee through the Creek country in the direction of Fort Mitchell. To this detachment of the army, a number of hostile Indians, including three or four hundred warriors, came in and surrendered; whilst another party, said to consist of three hundred, alarmed at the approach of this force, crossed the Chattahoochie some miles below Roanoke, and proceeded towards Florida. The trial was not discovered until a day or two after they had crossed, and just at the time time when generals Scott and Sanford, with the troops under their command, reached Roanoke. The fact being made known to them, a force under col. Beall was despatched in pursuit, and a portion of the enemy was overtaken in the Chickasawatchie swamp, in Baker county, where a skirmish ensued in which it is said that nine or ten Indians were killed, and a quantity of goods, horses, money and other property captured. A battalion of volunteer infantry from Muscogee county, under command of major Hoxey, also marched to Baker county and searched the swamps for the enemy; and subsequently, a battalion of mounted men, under major Alford, scoured that part of the state.

The Georgia troops engaged in the Creek war have done honor to themselves and to the state, and presented conspicuous instances of gallantry that have called forth the praises, and will long receive the gratitude of their country; and to this just commendation of the army is equally due to those brave citizens of Stewart, Randolph, Lee, Irwin, Baker, Telfair, Thomas, Lowndes, Early and Ware, who flew with alacrity to the point of danger, and with a high personal daring sought the sanguinary savage in his own fortress swamps, and checked his cruel course of death and devastation.

The hostile Indians who surrendered to the troops under command of general Jesup, were conducted to Fort Mitchell, where the warriors were placed within the pickets of the fort. Believing, from good evidence, that among these were many who had been engaged in the murder of our citizens, and the burning of Roanoke, and other places on the Chattahoochie, and it is my duty, as the governor of the state, to use all legal and proper means of having them identified and turned over to the civil authority for trial. I addressed two letters to gen. Jesup, at Fort Mitchell, under date of the 29th and 30th of June requesting him to detain these warriors at the fort for a reasonable time, that I might collect the evidence to identify them, and to authorize me to demand them for trial. To these letters no answers were received, and on the 2d day of July all the Indians were removed from Fort Mitchell on their way to Arkansas, except eleven warriors who had been charged, on sufficient evidence, with the commission of capital crimes in Georgia. These were afterwards, on my request, delivered by major McIntosh, who was in command of the fort, to the civil authorities and secured in the jail at Columbus.

Believing that an indignity was offered to the state, through her chief magistrate, by this course of proceeding on the part of general Jesup, I addressed a letter to the president of the United States, on the 7th of July, stating the facts, and protesting against such conduct on the part of an officer of the army, towards the authorities of the state, a copy of which I sent to general Jesup. I have received an answer from the president, in which he has caused a copy of my letter to be forwarded to gen. Jesup, with a call for explanation.

Subsequent to these occurrences, the Creek warrior Jim Henry, surrendered himself to the Alabama forces under generals Jesup and Patterson. Immediately on learning the fact, I demanded him as amenable to the laws of Georgia for crimes he had committed within her jurisdiction, but general Jesup refused to deliver him to the agent appointed to receive and conduct him to Georgia, on the ground that he had been previously demanded by the governor of Alabama, to be tried for capital crimes committed by him within that jurisdiction—and he was afterwards delivered to the sheriff of Russell county, in that state, and conducted by capt. Garmany and a part of his company to Girard, and lodged in jail.

As soon as I could obtain the evidence necessary to make a demand on the governor of Alabama for this man, I did so, and requested that, in the event of his acquittal in that state, he should be delivered to the agent appointed by me on the part of Georgia to be conducted to Stewart county and tried for the crimes with which he there stands charged. This demand was promptly complied with by his excellency governor Clay, who immediately transmitted to me the necessary papers, which were placed in the hands of captains Evans and Schley, of the city of Columbus, whom I appointed agents to receive the prisoner and conduct him to this state. These gentlemen attended the court in Russell county, Alabama, to receive him, in the event of his acquittal, but at the request of his counsel, the venue was changed from Russell to Montgomery county, where the court will not sit until the month of March next.

Some short time after claiming Jim Henry, I made a general demand of gen. Jesup of all Indians, in his custody, charged with the commission of crimes within this state, and who should be identified as such by the persons who accompanied col. Rockwell, the bearer of my communication. Before the arrival of these gentlemen at Tuskegee, the Indians had been removed to Montgomery, and they were obliged to proceed to that city, where, by authority received from gen. Jesup, they took into custody twelve warriors, recognized as amenable to our laws, and committed them to jail in Columbus to await their trial.

Since writing to the president, and my return to Milledgeville, a correspondence has taken place between gen. Jesup and myself, in which he accounts for not having answered my letters. To that of the 29th of June, he has enclosed me a reply, which, he says, was written, but by mistake placed on file instead of being sent to me; and to that of the 30th of the same month, he acknowledges that no answer was written, and supposes that the omission occasioned by his great anxiety to depart for Tuskegee, and the multiplicity of business which then occupied his time and attention. His motive for removing the hostile warriors from Fort Mitchell against the wishes of Georgia, conveyed to him through her chief magistrate, is explained in his letter to the war department, in answer to the call made by the president, after receiving my communication.

Copies of all the correspondence relating to this subject, as also to the Seminole and Creek wars, will be found among the accompanying documents.

There are still many hostile Indians in the swamps of Irwin, Thomas, Lowndes and Ware, who give just cause of alarm to the inhabitants. I have been applied to for the means of protection, which were immediately afforded by sending arms and ammunition to those counties, and instructing the commanding officers of regiments to call out a mounted company in each, for temporary security, until more permanent arrangements could be made; and to this end, I requested from major gen. Jesup, a detachment of regular troops for that service. The request was promptly granted, and major G. Dearborn, with two companies, was sent with instructions to establish a military station at such place in Lowndes or Ware, as might be considered most eligible, and to call on the commanding officers of the militia in those, and the adjoining counties, for such number of troops as he should deem necessary to give security and repose to the country.

Many of the members of capt. Garmany's company, who were engaged with the Creek Indians in the battle of Shepherd's field, on the 9th June last, lost most of their wearing apparel and were so destitute of these articles that they could not perform duty without a new supply. The army regulations make no provisions for furnishing clothes under such circumstances, and some of these men had not the means of procuring them, for they had also lost their money; and, therefore, I purchased cheap articles for them to the amount of one hundred and sixty-six dollars and twenty-five cents, which I paid out of the contingent fund.

The Georgia troops engaged in the Creek war, had expended their own money in providing themselves with such camp equipage as they believed to be necessary on their march to the frontier, and in camp. Application was made to the quartermaster of the United States' army to refund the amounts thus expended, but he did not feel himself authorized to do so, because the quantity and quality of many of the articles purchased, did not correspond with the army regulations. After several conferences which I had with that officer on the subject, he agreed to furnish the money if I would assume the responsibility of paying the accounts and settling with the war department. This I consented to do, rather than our people should lose large sums of money expended by them for the public service, and accordingly I received from Mr. Waite, the quartermaster, five thousand one hundred and sixty-eight dollars and forty-five cents, which I applied to the payment of these demands.

Very soon after the ratification by the senate of the United States, of the treaty made between general Carroll and Mr. Shermerhorn, the commissioners on the part of the United States, and the Cherokee tribe of Indians, (a copy of which accompanies this message), the people of that section of the state became apprehensive that the Ross party, against whose wishes the contract for their removal to the west was made, would, in the then situation of the state in regard to the Creeks and Seminoles, become hostile. Under the influence of this excitement, heightened as it was, by some murders and burnings committed by Indians about that time in Walker county, petitions from several parts of the Cherokee circuit for troops, arms and ammunition, were presented and granted. Orders were issued to brigadier general James Hemphill to raise a battalion of militia and place them at Lashley's Ferry, on the Coosa river, for the double purpose of preventing the Creeks from coming into Georgia, and to keep the Cherokees in check.

This order was executed, and a battalion was organized under the command of major Charles H. Nelson. For further security, a part of the Cherokees were disarmed, and five hundred muskets and accoutrements were ordered from Savannah, and sent to Cherokee county, with a sufficiency of ammunition for the use of the people, in the event of any hostile movements on the part of these Indians. Whether the Ross party really intended any hostile action, has not been ascertained. But, it was proper to be prepared for it; and the arrangements on the part of Georgia, together with the appearance of the Tennessee troops, about that time, under brigadier general Wool of the United States army, had the good effect of quieting the fears of the citizens.

An unpleasant circumstance, however, occurred between a company of Georgia volunteers, under command of captain Absalom Bishop, forming a part of major Nelson's battalion, and a portion of the Tennessee troops. Captain Bishop, in obedience to orders, had arrested a number of Creek Indians for the purpose of conveying them to Alabama, to be delivered to the proper officer having charge of the Creek emigration; but before his object was effected, captain Vernon, with a company of Tennessee volunteers, demanded these Indians, and threatened to take them from his possession, and to take him and his company if he resisted. Before, however, any collision took place, general Dunlap, commanding the Tennessee brigade, arrived, and a compromise was made, by which captain Bishop kept possession of a part of the Indians, and surrendered a part on the claim of their being Cherokees.

I have received from general Dunlap and colonel William N. Bishop, communications in which different views are taken of the matter, and the circumstances are differently stated: each party criminating the other. To the letter of general Dunlap, I returned an answer objecting to the conduct of the Tennessee company; and I also wrote to general Wool, giving to him the facts as they had been presented to me by both sides, and requesting him to calm the troubled waters. His reply attaching blame to each party, will be found among the correspondence on this subject herewith communicated.

By the treaty to which I have adverted, between the United States and the Cherokees, the latter are allowed until the 23d day of May, 1838, to leave the soil of Georgia. This convention will, I have no doubt, be satisfactory to the state, and it will be proper for the general assembly so to modify the laws in relation to these people and their rights of occupancy, as to do justice and advance the interests of the state.

In the month of December last, immediately after the adjournment of the legislature, I received a letter from governor Cannon, of Tennessee, on the subject of the arrest by the Georgia guard of Mr. John Howard Payne within the jurisdiction of that state. The act could not be justified on any principle of right or comity between states, and had been expressly condemned by a resolution of the general assembly of Georgia, before complaint was made on the part of Tennessee. I replied to the letter of governor Cannon, and enclosed to him a copy of the resolution, which has been satisfactory. A copy of the correspondence is herewith transmitted.

The defects of our militia system, though, to a certain extent, long known and felt by all who take any interest in having a well organized body of citizen soldiers, were never so glaringly exposed as during the Seminole and Creek wars. The existing law offers so little inducement for persons of suitable capacity to accept offices in the militia, that even the high stations of colonel and major were found vacant in many of the counties, during the excitement of the past year. By the act of 1818, no provision is made for the election or appointment of field officers to volunteer troops, and it is very doubtful whether the legislature intended, by the 45th section of that act, to vest in the governor the appointment of those officers in the case of drafted militia. In the absence, therefore, of any law on this subject in regard to volunteers, and with the great doubt of power in respect to drafted men, I permitted both species of troops in the Creek campaign to elect their field officers, to whom I gave commissions to continue during the time they should remain in that service.

There is another omission in this act which it would be well to supply; there is no penalty fixed against them who, after appearing at the place of rendezvous, shall refuse to enter the service of the United States.

The office of adjutant general has been vacant for twelve months. The legislature, at the last session, failed to fill it, and I deemed it unnecessary to do so during the recess of that body, because I could not expect to obtain the services of any individual without compensation, and there is none now attached to the office, except the inadequate amount of thirty day's pay, in each year, of an officer of like grade in the army of the United States. I would respectfully recommend that, in revising the system, provision be made for an adjutant and assistant adjutant general, with a competent salary to each, to induce him to give his whole time and talents to the subject.

The nature of this communication will not allow me to enter into a detail of all the defects and imperfections of the present militia laws; nor do I consider it necessary, as recent experience has so fully developed them, that they will not escape the intelligent observation of the legislature.

The ordinary arms, for the purchase of which an appropriation was made by the general assembly at the last session, have been contracted for through the agency of the war department, the secretary having politely offered to have them fabricated after the model of those used in the army, and at the price paid by the United States for similar articles. The swords, pistol-holders and accoutrements have been finished, received and paid for, and are of a superior quality for the price; but the pistols have not yet arrived. The sum appropriated was ten thousand dollars, with which three hundred and forty sets have been purchased. The cost of the swords, holders and accoutrements including commissions, freight and insurance is four thousand four hundred and thirteen dollars and ninety-six cents.

The act authorizing the purchase of these arms requires the governor to distribute them to cavalry corps. The number obtained will furnish only five or six companies, and it will be an unpleasant task for him to determine which shall be thus favored to the exclusion of all others. As all the companies will have an equal claim, and very few of them can be accommodated, it will be well for the general assembly to determine, whether, under the circumstances, these arms shall be distributed, or kept in the arsenal to be used by such volunteers as may be called into service, in the event of an emergency making such call necessary.

No military fund was created by the appropriation act of the last session, and, consequently, I have not been enabled to pay the brigade inspectors and others having military accounts against the state.

The cartridge boxes, bayonet scabbards and belts which had been contracted for, under authority of a resolution of the general assembly, passed at the session of 1824, have been received and paid for.

The reports of the keepers of the public arsenals at Savannah and Milledgeville, will be found among the documents, and will show the number and condition of the arms and accoutrements, and the quantity and quality of the ammunition.

I have received a communication from colonel Bomford, of the ordnance department, stating that Georgia is entitled, under the act of congress of 1806, to a quota of arms up to the first January last, equal in value to 548, 7-13 muskets, and requesting that I would designate the kind of arms the state would prefer. In answer to this communication, I have directed the amount to be paid in yagers or rifles, with the necessary accoutrements.

The Georgia arms which were used during the Creek war, were, on the discharge of the troops, delivered to the United States ordnance officer at Columbus; and, by direction of the commanding general, have been sent to the arsenal at Mount Vernon, in Alabama, to be put in good order. These, or others equally good, will in due time, be returned to the state.

The state having no gunpowder suitable for small arms, and there being frequent calls for that article during the recent Indian excitements, I caused seventy-five kegs to be purchased, most of which is now in the magazine at this place.

The addition to the south end of the capitol, which was authorised by an act of the general assembly, passed on the 20th day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, and for the erection of which a contract was entered into between the state and Messrs. Smith, Tucker & Marler, has been completed. So far as I can judge, the work has been well executed, and the contractors have received the sum of twelve thousand five hundred dollars, the whole amount of the appropriation. But there still remains a balance of fifteen hundred and twenty-eight dollars eighty-three cents due to them, for the payment of which, an additional appropriation should be made. Besides this work, some repairs and extra improvements were deemed necessary to preserve the house against injury from the weather, as also to improve its general appearance. The several accounts to be rendered for these, will probably amount to one thousand dollars, and for this sum, also, an appropriation is requested.

But the building is still unfinished. The plat-forms and steps at the eastern and western doors are in a very dilapidated state, and not suited in appearance, or utility, to the beautiful structure of which they now form the vestibules. These ought to be removed and their places supplied with porches and colonnades, corresponding with the rest of the edifice. And, as a finishing touch to the whole, the interior should be neatly painted.

In conformity to a resolution of the last session of the legislature, the public square around the capitol has been improved, by levelling the surface as far as was deemed necessary at this time. That part of the resolution requiring trees and shrubbery to be planted, has not been executed; because before that is done, there should be a good enclosure to protect them. The area of the present campus is too large. It ought to be contracted to about 210 yards square and enclosed with a good, neat and durable fence.

The committee appointed to contract for, and superintend the building of a house for the residence of the governor, have not been able to succeed in procuring an undertaker. Two causes have conspired to prevent them; the inadequacy of the appropriation, by reason of the enhanced value of material and labor, and the great demand, every where, for architects and mechanics. The only propositions that were submitted, to erect a building of proper dimensions and in good style, were at the prices of twenty-four and eighteen thousand dollars. The sum appropriated to build and furnish, was only fifteen thousand, and consequently, neither of these propositions could be accepted.—It will be for the legislature, now to determine, whether an additional sum shall be appropriated to carry into effect the object contemplated in the resolution of the last session.

The arsenal, in Milledgeville, is unfortunately so located as to obstruct the view of the capitol from the principal part of the town, and diminish, to a great extent, the beauty of that edifice and the grounds around it; and the building is not properly adapted to the uses for which it was intended. I, therefore, respectfully submit for the consideration of the general assembly, the propriety of removing it to some more suitable place and rebuilding it on a better plan.

Copies of the semi-annual reports made to the executive department by the several incorporated banks of this state, in terms of the law, as also the annual report of the central bank of Georgia, are herewith submitted to the general assembly.

Agreeable to the requisition of the fifth rule and ninth section of the charter of the bank of Darien, I have appointed Messrs. Joseph Cumming of the city of Savannah, James Hamilton Couper of McIntosh county and William W. Holt of the city of Augusta, to represent the state's interest in a meeting of the stockholders of that institution, which was called in conformity to the charter, and to be held at the principal bank in Darien, on the third day of this inst. It will be proper to make provision to compensate these gentlemen for their labors.

A list of executive warrants drawn on the treasury during the past political year, as also of executive appointments made during the same period, will be found among the documents accompanying this communication.

The act of the general assembly, passed on the tenth day of December, 1810, declares that the standard of weights and measures established by the corporation of Savannah and Augusta, shall be the standard weights and measures in this state, until the congress of the United States shall have made provision on the subject. This provision was made by a resolution passed at the last session of congress, which directs the secretary of the treasury "to cause a complete set of all the weights and measures adopted as standards, and now either made, or in the progress of manufacture, for the use of the several custom houses and for other purposes, to be delivered to the governor of each state in the union, or such person as he may appoint, for the use of the states respectively, to the end that an uniform standard of weights and measures may be established throughout the United States."

Congress having thus acted on the subject, the general assembly should so alter the act of 1810 as to conform to this resolution, and afford facilities for extending to every part of the state, the benefits to be derived from a uniform standard of weights and measures.

I have received from several of our sister states, resolutions of their legislatures on the subjects of abolition, rail roads, the treaty with France, the mode of electing the president and vice president of the United States, and the surplus revenue, with a request that I should lay them before the general assembly. They are herewith transmitted to the house of representatives.

By the 14th section of the act of 1793, and the resolution of 1834, the governor is required to defray, from the contingent fund, the expenses of preventing the spread of the small pox. Under the authority of these acts, the sum of two thousand two hundred and ninety-six dollars and one cent, has been expended during the past year, and several accounts remain unsettled some of the charges being of a character which I did not feel myself authorised to pay; such, for example, as the value of clothes committed to the flames and physicians' bills. It would be well for the legislature to establish some rule on the subject for the government of the executive and the people.

Almost every year this disease visits our state, and produces a panic wherever it takes up its abode. It has become a subject of deep interest to the people, and calls for the intelligent action of the legislature in devising the most effectual and, at the same time, humane means of preventing the spread of the disease. Among these, there can be no doubt that vaccination is the most efficacious, and should therefore be encouraged by offering to the people every facility in the obtaining of the vaccine matter. To do this, an agent ought to be appointed, whose duty it should be to keep on hand, at all times, a sufficient quantity of fresh virus, to be by him, on application, furnished to persons desiring it in all parts of the state, the expense of which should be paid from the public treasury.

In pursuance of the authority vested in the governor, by a resolution of last session, on the subject of the education of the indigent deaf and dumb in this state, I have appointed the rev. Elijah Sinclair the commissioner to carry into effect the humane and charitable views of the general assembly. This gentleman had been appointed to the same office by my immediate predecessor under a previous resolution, and had discharged his duty with such high credit himself, and great benefit to the unfortunate objects of the state's bounty, that it gave me pleasure to reappoint him.

This provision so honorable to the state, in behalf of an unfortunate portion of our fellow beings, suggests the propriety of extending the public charity to another class having equal claims to our sympathy.

Humanity requires that a comfortable place of refuge should be provided for the lunatic and the madman to alleviate their sufferings, and to protect the community against their involuntary acts; and that such as are indigent should be maintained at the public expense. I invite the attention of the general assembly to the subject, and recommend an appropriation of such money as may be deemed necessary for the erection of a lunatic asylum for the reception and accommodation of persons thus afflicted.

I herewith transmit to the general assembly a copy of the proceedings of the convention which assembled at Knoxville, in the state of Tennessee, on the 4th of July last, to take into consideration the proposed Louisville, Cincinnati and Charleston rail road. Georgia was ably represented in that convention by delegates from different sections of the state, who clearly demonstrated that the cheapest and most practicable route to the southern Atlantic coast is through the territory of Georgia.—Charters have been granted by the states of Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina and South Carolina for the purpose of constructing a continuous rail road from Cincinnati to Charleston, passing through these states, and the question will be presented to Georgia, whether she will grant a charter authorising a rail road to join the main trunk of this great work at some convenient point in Tennessee.

The great advantage of rail road communications in producing individual profit and public convenience, by the speedy transportation of persons and property, have been so fully developed, that it cannot be necessary, at this time, to elucidate them to an enlightened people. They are stimulating individual enterprise in every quarter, and should not escape the intelligent forecast of the statesman, devising for his country, prosperity in peace and security in war.

Hitherto, no attempt has been made thus to connect the west with the south; because, until recently, the intervening mountains have been considered an insuperable barrier. But now, that all physical difficulties recede before the light of science, the people of Georgia owe it to themselves to second, with energy and liberality, the great enterprise which is projected of connecting Cincinnati with the southern Atlantic coast. They can avail themselves of its advantages with less trouble and expense than any other portion of the south, as it has been ascertained, by actual survey, that the entire line from an eligible point on the northern or north western part of the state, to Knoxville, in Tennessee, by way of the Rabun gap and other routes, may be passed on a rail road, without a single inclined plane, and without the least difficulty in the employment of locomotive engines. Personal interest, public utility, state pride, every feeling which should impel man to exertion in a good cause, appeal to us most signally in behalf of this stupendous object; and, surely, every Georgian will respond with a spirit becoming the people and the occasion.

Every exertion in the power of the executive was made to procure a competent engineer, to examine the passes in the mountains on the northern line of Georgia, in time to lay the result before the Knoxville convention, but without success. I had determined to employ Mr. James Stephens, of Rhode Island, who had produced high testimonials of his qualifications for the task, but, unfortunately, directed my letter containing the appointment, to Providence instead of Newport, so that it did not reach him, and the error was not discovered until a few weeks ago, after I had given the office to another. I regret, on Mr. Stephens' account, that the mistake occurred, although no injury has been sustained by Georgia in consequence of the delay.—Early in the month of August last, I appointed col. A. H. Brisbane, of South Carolina, a gentleman of character, ability and high attainments in his profession, civil engineer for the state of Georgia.—He called to his aid, Mr. Edward B. White, a gentleman highly qualified for the task, and immediately commenced the examination of the passes in the mountains, as directed by the resolution of the last session. They have finished the survey of the route by the Rabun gap and submitted a report of their proceedings, accompanied by maps and estimates; all of which are herewith transmitted to the house of representatives. They are now engaged in the examination of the other passes, which will soon be completed, and a report on the whole subject will be laid before the general assembly at an early period of the session.

By an act, passed on the 22d day of December, 1835, the sum of ten thousand dollars was appropriated for the improvement of the navigation of Flint river, and the sum of twenty thousand dollars for the improvement of the Chattahoochee. No part of either of these sums has been drawn from the treasury, because the provisions of the act have not been complied with, and no application has been made for the money, except on the part of the commissioners of Flint river, who adopted a plan of operations which seemed to me to be contrary to the directions of the law, and particularly to the 4th section.

Whilst on the subject of internal improvements, it is proper that I should call the attention of the general assembly to the "Savannah, Ogeechee and Altamaha canal." The state has invested ninety-eight thousand five hundred dollars in this enterprise, and thus far no dividend of interest or profit has been returned; nor, from present appearances, is it likely that any benefit will be derived from it. It has been advertised by the sheriff of Chatham county to be sold under execution, at the suit of an individual, for the sum of two thousand dollars, and application was made to me, by the director on the part of the state, for advice what course to pursue. Having no authority to draw money from the treasury for such purpose, I so informed the director, and reminded him that the canal was pledged to the state for the return of the sum of fifty thousand dollars, the amount originally loaned to Mr. Jencks; and that the purchaser, at sheriff's sales, would take the property with that incumbrance. I have since learned by a letter from Mr. Arnold, the director, that the sale of the canal has been postponed to the first Tuesday in December next, when it will certainly take place, unless the judgment be paid.

The spirit of internal improvement, so onward and vigorous in our sister states, is extending itself in our own and stimulating private enterprise to efforts, which, though local and personal in their purposes, embrace so many interests, and contribute so greatly to the general convenience, that they seem to be justly entitled to a portion of the public patronage.

Intimately connected with this subject, is that of the geological structure of the state, and of its mineral resources. A proper knowledge of these is necessary to a prudent and profitable location of canals and rail roads, and should have their influence in directing their course. Thus far, Georgia has scarcely looked beneath her surface, and her great staple commodity has been the only article of transportation within the contemplation of those who have projected schemes of internal improvement, whilst the advantage to be derived from geological investigation has been entirely overlooked. In such a survey the whole state is interested, not merely in the increased variety of its products, but in the promotion of the most efficient culture, by disclosing the character and capacity of the soil.—Her territory, and particularly that part comprehended within the Cherokee circuit, is believed to abound in mines of gold, marble, iron, limestone, salt and other valuable minerals. These concealed treasures which should be made tributary to her knowledge and wealth are worthy of your enlightened consideration, and the provision necessary to a full and scientific examination of them ought not longer to be delayed. I suggest, therefore, the propriety of employing a competent geologist to make a thorough survey of the state, with a view to the ascertainment of its mineral and agricultural resources, and the proper location of works of internal improvement.

Since the above was written, I have received from Mr. John R. Cotting, a letter dated at Augusta, on the 25th ultimo, accompanied by a report of a geological and agricultural examination made by him, during the past summer of the counties of Burke and Richmond. This survey was executed at the expense of individuals of those counties, and is highly creditable to their public spirit; and, as far as I can judge, equally to the skill and capacity of Mr. Cotting as a scientific and practical geologist. I avail myself, with pleasure, of the opportunity thus afforded me of sending to the house of representatives this letter and report, with the hope that they may add force to the recommendation I have submitted.

The reports of the inspectors and principal keeper of the penitentiary are herewith submitted. They will show that during the past year a profit has been made on the labor of the convicts, and that after deducting from the good debts due to the institution, those which it owes, there will be a balance in its favor of ten thousand five hundred and thirty-five dollars. This may be considered a prosperous condition, and yet, owing to the practice which has heretofore prevailed of giving a general credit on articles sold, the officers are embarrassed and need the aid of the legislature until collections can be made. This practice will shortly cease, as the inspectors have, I think wisely, determined to require cash for all work done, and articles manufactured after the first day of January next, and to force, if necessary, the payment of all available debts. Other causes have operated to the injury of the institution, but a radical reform has been commenced, and, I have no doubt, will be continued much to its advantage.

I respectfully add my recommendation to that of the inspectors to appropriate, or lend to the penitentiary the sum of five thousand dollars to enable them to provide materials and subsistence until, by collections, they can procure the necessary funds.

I would respectfully invite the attention of the legislature to the amendment of the first section of the third article of the constitution, which provides for the establishment of a supreme court for the correction of errors committed in the superior courts. The judicial system of Georgia (if that can be called a system which has no head) has always been an anomaly in jurisprudence. There are now ten judicial districts, having a judge to preside in each, who is independent of the others and subject to no control. His opinions are the law of the district during the time he shall continue in office, but no longer—they do not bind his successor. These judges often decide the same question differently, so that what is law in one district is not law in another, and, as a matter of course, we have no such thing, in fact, as laws of Georgia, although the legislature have enacted, and do annually enact, what purport to be such. It is a matter, therefore, of the first importance, not only to the interests of the people, but to the character and honor of the state, that you should, at the present session, organize the supreme court, and thereby establish a head to direct the operations of the judiciary and render the law uniform throughout the state. Apart, however, from any reasoning on the subject, the constitution, which we have all sworn to support, is imperative, and declares that "the judicial powers of this state shall be vested in a supreme court for the correction of errors," &c. &c. This court can be organized only by the legislature, and so long as they fail to do it, so long will the people be deprived of their constitutional right.

By an act of congress, approved by the president of the United States on the 23d day of June last, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," a portion of the revenue of the federal government has been directed to be deposited with the states. The 13th section of this act provides, that when the money in the treasury of the United States shall exceed the sum of five millions of dollars, the surplus shall be deposited with such of the states, in proportion to their representation in the senate and house of representatives of the United States, as shall, by law, authorize their treasurers or the competent authorities to receive the same on the terms in that section specified. These terms are, that the faith of the state shall be pledged for the safe keeping and repayment of the money and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the secretary of the treasury of the United States for the purpose of defraying any wants of the public treasury beyond the amount of five millions. And, as an inducement to each state to receive its proportion of the public treasure on deposit, it is declared in the same section, that if any states declines to do so on the terms mentioned in the act, the same shall be deposited with the other states agreeing to accept the same on deposit in the proportion pointed out by the act. It is then declared, that when these deposits, or any part of them shall be wanted by the secretary to meet the appropriations made by law, the same shall be called for in ratable proportions within one year, as nearly as conveniently may be, from the different states with which the same is deposited; and shall not be called for in sums exceeding ten thousand dollars from any one state in any one month, without previous notice of 30 days for every additional sum of twenty thousand dollars, which may, at any time, be required. By the 14th section of the act, this surplus money is ordered to be paid to the states in the following proportions, and at the following times, viz: One quarter part on the first day of June 1837, or as soon thereafter as may be: one quarter part on the first day of April: one quarter part on the first day of July, and one quarter part on the first day of October; all in the same year. A copy of the law, and of the letter of the secretary of the treasury on the subject, will be found among the documents accompanying this message.

This act of congress presents a subject of no ordinary interest, and involves principles which demand the deliberate investigation of the general assembly. Although the law is nominally constitutional because it purports to be "an act to regulate the deposits of the public money," and so far as that purpose was entertained, may be considered as really so, yet, declarations at the time of its enactment, and since, by some of its ablest advocates, that these deposits were intended as donations never to be reclaimed; and the simultaneous avowal by the great beneficiaries of the tariff, that this policy was to become a system to conciliate the complaining states, are calculated to excite a jealous watchfulness of innovation, and of every effort to allure, or force us from the primitive purity of our government.

"We must fear these Greeks, even though they come with presents in their hands."

The framers of the constitution never could have contemplated the accumulation of redundant revenue, to foster particular interests in its collection, and subsidize others in its distribution. Against such a system of injustice and corruption, I trust that Georgia will enter her solemn protest, and call for such a reduction of the tariff, as will prevent further unnecessary accumulation and division of the people's money.

Georgia, will, I hope, never consent to give up her independence and be supported by the surplus revenue of the United States. She has ample resources of her own, and if she had not, she could obtain money from her people, who are too proud to permit her to be the beneficiary of the federal government, which has no means of supplying her wants, other than those obtained from the people by the exercise of a power delegated for another purpose, but improperly applied to raise money to corrupt them.

Two questions for the consideration of the general assembly arise on this law. First, will the state receive her proportion of the surplus upon the terms proposed? And secondly, if she so receive it, how shall it be disposed of?

As regards the first, I presume there can be little, or no difference of opinion, because, if rejected, it would go to the other states and strengthen opposition to any objection she might urge against a measure already sustained by an overwhelming majority.

And as there is no reasonable ground to hope that all, or even a majority of the states, will refuse to receive the money, Georgia, by doing so, could not, unaided by her sister states, arrest the operation of the law, or give a sufficient rebuke to congress for thus sporting with the best interest of the republic. Under these circumstances, the state will act with commendable policy and violate no principle, if she receive her proportion of the surplus revenue upon the terms and condition prescribed in the act.

The second question is one upon which, it is probable, there may be some diversity of opinion—not in regard to the nature of the state's interest in the fund, and her obligation to return it, but, as to the mode of investing it.

The money to be deposited is, and will continue to be the property of the United States. It may be, that this fund is not intended to be reclaimed, and unless war should cut off the revenue from commerce, it probably never will be, but, whatever may have been the real design of those who enacted the law, we will be bound by its terms and should be prepared, at all times, to redeem the pledge it exacts.

The amount to be received by Georgia will probably be one million of dollars. This sum, at a moderate interest, will yield an income which, added to the other income of the state, will be sufficient to support the government. I would, therefore, respectfully recommend that the fund be so disposed of as to make it, by loan on good security, available, when required, to redeem our pledge, and profitable whilst it remains on deposit.

These, fellow citizens, are the principal subjects to which I have deemed it my duty, at this time, to call your attention, and I earnestly invite your deliberate consideration of all the topics of general interest to which I have adverted. Other matters of less importance, as also such as may arise during the session, will be submitted to you in special communications—and no exertions on my part shall be wanting to render you such aid, in the course of your labors, as my official situation may render proper, or enable me to afford.

WILLIAM SCHLEY.

FOREIGN CHRONICLE.

Poverty. We little dream in this country of the reverses which attend some of the titled personages of Europe. An inquest was lately held in England on the body of a baronet who died for want of proper food in a miserable lodging. He had been ruined by a law suit. Among some debtors, proclaimed outlaws at a sheriff's court, were lord William Paget, sir John de Beauvoir and Long Wellesley, the brother of Wellington. The unfortunate col. Gustafson, the ex-king of Sweden, the lineal descendant of the great Gustavus is wandering about Europe, often an outside passenger on a stage coach, because he is too poor to pay for a more comfortable seat. Compared with such instances of fallen rank, how enviable is the condition of our republican farmers and mechanics, whose industry secures them from the possibility of want. As the population of the world increases, all aristocracy, save that of money, will decrease.

Ancient British coins. After all the learning that has been exhausted by Pegg and others to show that the ancient coins bore objects of heathen worship by the Druids, it is admitted that it cannot be satisfactorily proved that a single British coin bears the representation of any deity, weapon or utensil, peculiar to the people by whom they are supposed to have been minted.

The names of the two young sons of Lucien Bonaparte, engaged in the late affray at Canino, are Pierre Napoleon and Antoine Lucien. They were accused of murdering a peasant in the neighborhood. Pierre was the individual whom the Carbineers attempted to arrest on the public square at Canino, and who shot down the lieutenant by a mortal wound, and also used a long knife, (probably a Bowie, imported from America), so fiercely as to severely injure several of the soldiers—receiving himself a number of wounds. His bravery was the subject of general admiration. He is but 20 years of age. The other brother fled to America. Pierre is in prison at Rome.

Information is communicated by telegraph between Liverpool and Holyhead, and back, a distance of 14½ miles, in one minute.

Populating America. The total number of emigrants to America, since January, 1833, from Liverpool alone, is 76,839. There is an increase of over 8,000 the second quarter of this year over the last.

We take the following from the Gazette du Lyonnais—"M. Asquini, the apostolic delegate, arrived at Ancona on the 30th of August from Rome, bringing with him several physicians. On that day there were two processions, in which nearly 1,000 ladies walked barefoot, with tapers in their hands, to the church of Notre Dame de St. Cyriac, to implore her intercession to cause the scourge to cease. A subscription is being raised for the relief the indigent sufferers from the cholera."

Prince Paskevitch lately reviewed the 4th corps of the Russian army stationed in the neighborhood of Warsaw.

No less than 1,227 soldiers and 332 marines of the British military forces, have been flogged within the last five years. Of these 242 were flogged a second time and 44 a third time.

The Hull tars who were lately with captain James Ross, in the Cove, on being paid off, volunteered to go on another expedition to discover a northwest passage.

The royal printing office at Paris, contains 56 fonts of oriental characters—comprehending all the known alphabets of Asia, ancient as well as modern.

There are 16 alphabets of different European nations who do not employ the Roman characters, and of these latter the establishment possesses 46 complete fonts, of various forms and dimensions. All these fonts weigh at least 828,000 lbs. The consumption of paper at the royal printing office in a single year amounts, on an average, to from 80,000 to 100,000 reams per day, which are printed for the use of the several public boards. The number of workmen employed regularly is from 350 to 450.

The queen of Spain. The New York Evening Star says—"The present queen Christina, of Spain, is one of the most remarkable of royal personages for her extreme beauty and the fascination of her manners. It is a singular fact that every one of her premiers has successively become enamoured of his queen and sovereign. Martinez de la Rosa, the first, wrote exquisite sonnets upon her. Mandizabal could not conceal his desperate passion; and Munoz, her present major domo, reigns triumphant in her affections. If Christina resembles her sister, the unfortunate duchess of Berry, she cannot but be pretty. The latter one was a handsome, light haired, blue eyed blond, of great delicacy of form.

We feel much satisfaction in being enabled to publish the following statement, for the information of the public generally, who are not aware of the extreme productiveness of many of the Cornish tin and copper mines. The undermentioned mines have paid the respective shareholders annually after the following rate:—Wheal Jewell (adjoining the Great Wheal Prosper) £2,000 per cent.; Dolcoath, £760 per cent.; Tresavean, £640 per cent.; Consolidated mines (also adjoining the Great Wheal Prosper) £500 per cent.; Carn Brea, £300 per cent.; Levant, £275 per cent.; Wheal Tolgar, £190 per cent.; East Pool, £180 per cent.; Great St. George, £180 per cent.; Wheal Virgin, £100 per cent. [Sherborne Mercury.]

Etiquette. A letter received at Bombay from Teheran, says that at a grand dinner given by the shah of Persia, Mr. Ellis, the British resident, was grievously offended, and left the durbarr, because the health of the emperor of Russia was the first toast proposed, and that of the king of England only the second.

A snug forfeiture. The London Morning Chronicle lately incurred penalties to the amount of one million of dollars, more or less, in a single day.—And that, too, merely by omitting the date at the end of the last column on the last page, which, it seems, is required by the new act relative to stamp duties, under the penalty of twenty pounds for each copy! The solons of the British radical ministry are not content with the date at the head of the first page, under the title, and its repetition at the head of the editorial columns, but must have it again repeated—in order, no doubt, that they may ascertain the day of the month without the trouble of turning the sheet over. The best of the joke is that the Chronicle—the only paper which did not take note of the new requirement—is the ministerial organ. Well might it exclaim, "Oh save me from my friends!" [N. Y. Courier.]

Thames alligator. A singular circumstance took place yesterday. A man steering his barge past Galleyquay, observed a black motionless object in the water, which upon his attempting to draw it out moved, and his hand was severely lacerated; he, however, succeeded in getting it into the barge, when to his great astonishment, it proved to be a young alligator. It was purchased for and removed to the Surrey Zoological gardens. [London Morning Chronicle.]

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

Samuel Ackley has been convicted in New York, on Friday the 18th inst. of the murder of his wife by impalement, (having forced a piece of sword nearly six inches long through the anus into the bowels) and was sentenced to be hung on Saturday the 14th of January next. The details brought out on the trial are horrible!

Texian vessels seized. The N. Y. Express states, that the two schooners, Brutus and Invincible, lately in the harbor, have fallen a prey to an unexpected enemy. Warrants were issued on Saturday for their seizure, by part 8d of the revised statutes.—The officers and crew are in the custody of Wm. Hillyer, the sheriff of the city and county.

Profits of litigation. The court of common pleas at Boston lately decided a case which had been protracted one year, and originated in a suit brought by one of the parties for the recovery of a cider barrel valued at seventy-five cents. In the course of the multiplied trials the litigants paid fees to the state to the amount of $50, and to the constables, witnesses and lawyers upwards of one hundred more.

Upper Canada. The legislature in this province met on the 9th instant. Among the notices of motions, are the following: A bill to repeal the laws imposing fines on Quakers, &c. for not doing duty as militiamen in time of peace—and resolution with a view to obtain a seaport in Upper Canada, by altering the boundary lines in Lower Canada.—The effect of the latter would be to annex Montreal, in Lower Canada to the upper province.

Governor Schley, of Georgia, has issued his proclamation, offering a reward of two hundred dollars for the apprehension of Thomas J. Chambers, who murdered Moses Camp, in Gwinnett county, on the 24th ult. and has fled from justice. The said Chambers is represented to be about thirty years of age, middle size, blue eyes, fair complexion, with dark hair, has a scar on one of his cheeks, is much given to intoxication and is left handed.

The Globe states that Mr. ALPHONSE PAGZOT presented his credentials to the secretary of state on Saturday last, and was received as charge d'affaires of his majesty, the king of the French near this government.

A correspondent of the New York Star asserts that the rates of domestic exchange between that city and other places are as follows: On Charleston, 5 per cent.; on Savannah, Mobile and Augusta, 6 a 7 per cent.; on New Orleans, 4 a 5 per cent.; on Louisville, 5 a 6 per cent.; on St. Louis, 6 per cent.

Land sales. The Pentotoc (Mi.) Union, says—The third sale of lands terminated at this place on Saturday last. The amount received for the two weeks, ending at that period, is somewhat above $290,000, which, added to the amount of the previous sales, gives a total of $316,578 68.

James Anderson, of Canton, Ohio, who committed forgery of $7,000 on the Massillon, Ohio bank, was tried in Canton last week, and sentenced to the penitentiary for five years. There was nothing developed in the trial that would lead to the detection of any other person engaged in it. There is still, however, some mystery as to the manner in which Anderson first obtained the draft of 400 dollars which was sent through the post office from New Lisbon to Cleveland. Anderson was not in the post office, but must have had some associates there to have obtained the original draft.

Peace society. The Boston Reformer says that Dr. Mather established a society of peacemakers in Boston "150 years ago" whose business it was to settle disputes and prevent law suits. We remember a Massachusetts peace society, which existed some years ago, the aim of which was to put down war between nations. Just as it got in full operation, Bonaparte set all Europe at loggerheads, without ever making an apology to the society, or saying, "by your leave, gentlemen." They took revenge, however, on Alexander of Russia, whom they had elected as an honorary member, by expelling him formally. He never got over it.

Another steamboat accident. We learn from the Cincinnati Whig of the 18th inst. that a most distressing accident occurred on board of the steamboat Flora, capt. R. D. Chapman, on the 17th, while on her way from Louisville to Cincinnati. The boat had approached to within thirty miles of the latter place, when the pipes which connect the two boilers together, commonly called the "connecting pipes," suddenly broke, or separated, causing the death of one man, and the scalding and mutilation of thirteen others, all cabin passengers but one.

Russian minister. It is stated that baron de Maltitz, formerly secretary to the Russian legation, is to succeed baron Krudner as minister from Russia near this government.

The death of Mr. William Brandon in Smith county, Tennessee, is noticed in the southern papers. He was 99 years of age, and was the first male child, of civilized parents, born south of the Yadkin river.

A noble resolution. "Among other resolutions passed at a late meeting of the Mobile rifle corps, respectful to the worth and memory of M. J. Wheeler, late lieutenant in that company, was one adopting his only child, a beautiful little girl, seven years of age and pledging themselves to cherish, support and educate her. This was a noble and magnanimous act, and cannot be extolled in a tone too high and exalted. The father was a man of high and ennobled feelings, was a better friend to others than to himself, and left that only pledge of his love to his wife, which the members of the rifle company have adopted as their own. This is a beautiful moral upon the character of our young population. They now stand to her as a father, and they are to cherish, educate and support her." [Mobile Chron.]

Another slave case. On Friday the 18th inst. a colored man named Jesse Redmond was arrested in New York on a claim set up by Mr. John Turlington, of Accomac county, Virginia, whose agent, Mr. Waddy, made affidavit that Jesse was Mr. Turlington's slave, and ran away in 1828. On investigating the claim, however, before Mr. Justice Usher, it manifestly appeared that Mr. Waddy was in error, and that Jesse had resided for the last thirteen years in this state, and ten years before that in Nova Scotia. The claim was of course withdrawn. Suit for false imprisonment has been commenced by Jesse against Mr. Waddy.

Bank failure. It is stated in Hicknell's Reporter that the Nahant bank at Lynn, Massachusetts, has stopped payment in consequence of a run upon it for specie. The president of the institution failed, and this distrust was created in the public mind.

(3) The second session of the twenty-fourth congress will commence on Monday next, and to meet the extra demands it will impose upon our time and attention, we have made arrangements to furnish faithful accounts of its proceedings and the prompt insertion of all documents, speeches, &c. of general interest, that cannot fail to satisfy the numerous patrons of this work who have expressed their approbation of the attention we have usually paid to these matters. The same impartial spirit which has heretofore governed us will be maintained, and with our new arrangements and the increased room afforded by our enlarged pages, whereby the use of small type is rendered unnecessary, we hope to render this department of the "REGISTER" more than usually interesting.

(4) We publish within a fraction of 3,500 copies of the "REGISTER," and it has been a work of great labor to furnish them with the ordinary hand-presses in time for the earliest mails. To overcome this difficulty and to meet the increasing patronage bestowed on this work, we have recently procured one of "Adams' improved printing machines," which is now in operation. It is a beautiful invention, and with the addition of "Clayton's patent springs" for holding the sheets and insuring "register," will enable us to issue our publication with great rapidity and in a handsome style of workmanship.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. We have published all the official returns received since our last. The states from which authentic returns have not been received, are Louisiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Missouri and Arkansas. The reports relative to the vote of the first are very contradictory. The New Orleans Standard of the 24th says, that from official returns "as far as received at the governor's office," and authentic accounts "otherwise received," all the state except the parish of Claiborne, is heard from, and the Van Buren majority is thirty votes. "But should Claiborne give the counterbalancing majority expected, the vote of Louisiana will be for the White electoral ticket." On the other hand, the Bee says, "all the returns of this state have been received officially, except five.—The democratic ticket is 207 votes ahead, but our probable majority will be about 272. In no event will it be less than 200." Another account says, that Amite, Claiborne and Wilkinson, have gone for White, and Franklin for Van Buren. But it is not worth while to trouble our readers with the thousand and one rumors that are afloat—a few days will settle the question and relieve the public anxiety.

The governor of Virginia has issued his proclamation announcing the election of the Van Buren electors, but the official returns have not yet been published. The Van Buren majority will be nearly 7,000. The returns from North Carolina, not official, give a Van Buren majority of 3,660.

MR. C. J. INGERSOLL'S OPINION "with reference to the United States' bank and the question of vested rights" is published in the present sheet. It is important as showing the ground which will be assumed by the party of which Mr. J. is a member, in the convention recently chosen to propose amendments to the constitution of Pennsylvania—and, in connection with Dallas' letter, makes an important chapter in the history of the times.

DELAWARE. It has been currently reported for some days past, that the hon. John M. Clayton has resigned his seat in the senate of the United States. The Delaware Journal, which enjoys ample opportunities of knowing the facts, says the statement is premature, and expresses a hope that Mr. Clayton will be induced to retain his appointment.

MARYLAND. A sufficient number of the new senate not having arrived at Annapolis to form a quorum, the house of delegates adjourned on Saturday last to the 4th Monday in the present month. The message of the governor to that body, and an account of its proceedings, will be found in subsequent pages.

It is stated that William Price, esq. of Washington county, and John V. L. McMahon, esq. of Baltimore city, recently elected to the senate, will not accept seats in that body.

VOL LI Sic. 14.

VIRGINIA. The legislature of Virginia will commence its session on Monday next—and among its first acts will be the election of a senator in congress in the place of Mr. Leigh, who has expressed his determination to resign.

NORTH CAROLINA. The legislature of this state assembled at Raleigh, on 21st ult. HUGH WADDLE, (W.) was elected president of the senate over MOSELY, (V. B.) the former president. In the house of commons, HAYWOOD (V. B.) was elected speaker over GRAHAM (W.)

On the 23d ult. the governor sent in his annual message, which is a brief, but comprehensive document. The subjects noticed are chiefly of local interest: The portion of the surplus revenue which North Carolina may receive he regards merely as a deposit for safe keeping, and recommends the investment of it upon unquestioned security as the best means to provide for its safety and its return when demanded. The interest he thinks might be used "for the purpose of diffusing education or some other object." The tariff compromise act of 1833, he does not consider binding, and believes that act should be modified so as to adopt the revenue to the legitimate expenses of the government.

It is said that on joint ballot both parties are equally balanced, there being 26 whig and 24 Van Buren members in the senate, and 59 whig, 61 Van Buren members in the commons.

On Saturday last the honorable WILLIE P. MANCUM resigned his situation as United States senator from this state. An election will therefore take place, as well for his unexpired term, as for the new term which commences on the 4th of March next. The Van Buren party, it is said, have fixed upon Judge Strange as their candidate.

WAR IN FLORIDA. By two arrivals from Jacksonville, E. F. at Charleston, S. C. on the evening of the 25th ult. the editors in that city received the gratifying intelligence, that an express, which reached Garey's Ferry on the 21st ult. (having left the army the preceding morning, at Walloo Swamp) reported that two battles had taken place between the Tennessee and Florida volunteers, and the Indians, in both of which the former were victorious. The first engagement took place on the 18th inst. in which 20 Indians were killed, while the loss of the whites was 5 killed, and several wounded.—The last fight occurred on Saturday afternoon last; the loss on either side not ascertained. The regulars and friendly Indians were not engaged in either battle, having taken another route. High encomiums are bestowed on the gallantry of gen. Armstrong, of the Tennessee volunteers, as well as on col. Reed, of the Florida volunteers.

From an old negro, who was taken prisoner, it was ascertained that not more than half the Indians were engaged, the other portion having taken another course—and that they were short of powder and disposed to yield, but feared to make the proper advances.

Accounts from gov. Call stated that the army had crossed the Wythlacoochee—that no Indians had been discovered, that their villages had been found deserted, and that the army had marched to Volusia, where a supply of provisions had been ordered.

"THE FARMER AND GARDNER." This old and most valuable periodical has recently been purchased by Edward P. Roberts, esq. who for some time past has had charge of the editorial department.—The able manner in which he has performed his duties, is the best evidence of his claims to the patronage and support of every farmer and planter in the union; but we cannot withhold our testimony in favor of the self sacrificing spirit with which he has devoted himself to the interests of agriculture, and the zeal with which he enters into all subjects relating to that most valuable and interesting pursuit. A more honest or a more able advocate of the interests of the farmer and planter there is not in this country, and those "lords of the soil" will be guilty of gross neglect if they do not extend to him the most liberal encouragement.

THE COURT OF ENQUIRY, as we learn from the "Examiner," was again organized at Frederick on Monday last. The same paper states that a communication was received from general Gaines, objecting to general McComb as a member of the court, so far as he (general Gaines) was concerned.

The following is a list of the officers at present in Frederick: Maj. gen. Macomb, maj. gen. Scott, brig. gen. Atkinson, gen. Sanford, col. Bankhead, col. Kenan, col. Lindsey, major Huson, capt. Cooper, capt. McCall, capt. Hitchcock, capt. Green, capt. Dimmock, capt. Lee, capt. Newcomb, resigned, formerly U. S. A.

TEXAS. Files of the Texas Telegraph to the 12th ultimo, have been received at New Orleans. They contain the inaugural addresses of president Huston and vice president Lamar.

A discussion on the liberation of gen. Santa Ana had taken place in congress, but it was resolved, by a large majority, to retain him as a prisoner for some time to come.

Mr. Ellis, chairman of the committee on foreign relations, had made a lengthy report upon the condition and prospects of Texas accompanied by resolutions, empowering the president to appoint commissioners to treat with the government of the U. States, for the admission of Texas into the union.

Congress was despatching business rapidly, but great inconvenience was experienced among the officers of government, for want of offices in which to perform their duties.

The Mexican prisoners at Galveston island were transferred to Velasco, on account of the scarcity of provisions at the former place.

Santa Ana and Almonte had been relieved of their irons, and a treaty was negotiating with the former when our informant left Columbia, where these personages remain in durance.

The individuals who attempted the release of Santa Ana, were still prisoners at Velasco, their trials not having as yet taken place.

The Texian privateer Thomas Toby, had taken a Mexican schooner bound to Tampico, while in sight of that place, laden with salt and brandy. The fort at Tampico kept up a continual fire at the T. T. but to no purpose, as the distance was too great for the shot to reach her. The prize was carried into Velasco.

By advices from Mexico, received through the New Orleans papers to the 11th ult. we learn that a division of the Mexican army left Mexico for the invasion of Texas, October 15th, accompanied by a large number of sappers, miners, pioneers, &c.

Some apprehensions were entertained in Mexico, that the departure of the troops would lead to acts of violence by the inhabitants towards the American residents.

Several expresses had arrived at Tampico previous to the sailing of the schooner Lady Hope from that place for New Orleans. These messengers brought information of the approach of the above mentioned invading division (about 3,000 strong) to within a few leagues of Tampico. It was believed that general Rusk would immediately march on to Matamoras and take possession of that place. About fifty cities, towns and seaports of Mexico have voted contributions of supplies of money, clothing, &c. to the invading army.

Tranquillity and a patriotic resolution to put down the Texian rebels are said to reign in Mexico.

The Indians in Chickua and the insurgents in Flaxcala have been subdued.

A brig called the Privilegio has been sent in chase of the Texian corsair Terrible.

The Mexican brig of war Alamo, brigantine Urrea, and schooner Bravo, are on a cruise.

General Bravo commands the army—a second division was about leaving the capital.

GEORGIA AND THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. The following preamble and resolutions were offered by Mr. McAllister, in the senate of Georgia on the 19th ult. and made the order of the day for the Monday following.

"Whereas, the election of president of the U. States may be transferred from its legitimate tribunal, the people, to the house of representatives: And whereas, the elevation of William Henry Harrison to the presidency, is an event to be deprecated by every republican, and if consummated, to be deplored by every southern man: And whereas, the question of his elevation has never been submitted to the people of Georgia, and it is believed if the same were submitted, it would be answered by a decided negative: And whereas, although a majority of the people of this state have given their suffrages in favor of the honorable Hugh L. White, such suffrages were not given with a view to the elevation of William Henry Harrison.

Be it therefore resolved, &c. That in case the election of President of the United States shall devolve upon the house of representatives, that our representatives in that body be, and they are hereby requested, IN NO EVENT, to vote for William Henry Harrison.

Be it further resolved, &c. That our representatives in congress be requested, not to urge the claims of the honorable Hugh L. White in that body, if by so doing, the elevation of William Henry Harrison is to be effected."

On the 21st inst. Mr. Davis of Elbert, introduced the following resolutions into the house of representatives.

Whereas, a majority of the representatives from this state in the congress of the United States, have unconditionally pledged themselves in case the election of president should devolve upon that body, to support the candidate for president, who should receive the vote of Georgia; and whereas, the people have given a decided majority to Hugh L. White of Tennessee, for that office:

Be it therefore resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the state of Georgia in general assembly met, That our representatives in congress are distinctly pledged to, and instructed by the people to vote for Hugh L. White, for president, without any alternative, that they cannot disobey this deliberate and clearly expressed will of their constituents, on a particular and definite subject, without a manifest violation of their own voluntary pledge, and an utter abandonment of the important and fundamental principle of constituent instruction, so deeply interwoven with our republican institutions.

And whereas, the wishes of the people of Georgia have been alike clearly expressed in favor of John Tyler of Virginia, for vice president, over Francis Granger, William Smith and Richard M. Johnson, the opposing candidates for that office.

And whereas, said election for vice president is likely to devolve upon the senate of the United States.

Be it therefore resolved, That our senators be, and they are hereby instructed to vote for John Tyler.

Be it further resolved, That his excellency the governor of Georgia, be requested to transmit a copy of the last aforesaid preamble and resolutions relative to the election of vice president, to each of our senators in congress.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT. From the following resolutions introduced into the legislatures of Georgia and Vermont, we may anticipate another exciting discussion of this question during the ensuing session of congress. Mr. Pinckney's resolutions were not satisfactory to either party and were urged more as an expedient than as establishing a principle.

On the 19th ult. Mr. Bond introduced the following preamble and resolutions into the senate of Georgia:

"Whereas, during the last session of congress various petitions were submitted to and received by that body, having for their object the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia: And whereas various opinions exist in relation to the right of that body to receive such petitions and act upon them: and strange as it may appear that diversity of opinion was found even among the delegation from this state; and we, believing that the period has arrived when not only Georgia but the whole south should present one undivided and uniform front upon this all absorbing subject: Be it therefore resolved by the senate and house of representatives, in general assembly met:

1. That congress has no right under the constitution to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia, or any where else within the limits of the United States.

2. Resolved, that congress has no right to receive any petitions whatever for the action of that body, upon any matter whatsoever not within the constitutional sphere of its action.

3. Resolved, that congress, in receiving petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, violated the spirit of the constitution, and that the members from Georgia, who voted for the reception, by that body, grossly betrayed the interest of their constituents.

The following resolutions were adopted by the legislature of Vermont at its recent session.

Resolved, by the general assembly of the state of Vermont, that neither congress, nor the state gov-vernments, have any constitutional right to abridge the free expression of opinion or the transmission of them through the medium of the public mails.

Resolved, That congress do possess the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

TROY INDIA RUBBER COMPANY. There are few people, we believe, even in this city, who are aware of the manufacture and extent of the business which is carried on by the Troy India Rubber company. The individuals who chiefly compose the company commenced the erection of a building but little more than a year ago. That building was consumed by fire in April last. During the last session of the legislature the company obtained an act of incorporation. Immediately after the destruction of the first building the company commenced the erection of another of much larger dimensions, and in an almost incredible space of time it was completed.

There are now employed in the establishment about 120 persons, in the various departments of the business. Four are occupied in the manufacture of the composition. Five in applying it to cloth. Fifty, one-half of whom are females, are engaged in the manufacture of shoes. Sixty, nearly all females, in the making up of garments, such as coats, aprons, caps, &c. &c.

More than one thousand yards of cloth are used every day. From seventy-five to one hundred pairs of shoes are made daily. In the manufacture of composition, 400 lbs. of rubber and 15 lbs. of spirits are used per week. Three coats can be made up in a day by one female. In the making up of shoes, a process somewhat novel is adopted. Each workman performs a specific portion of the labor on the shoe, and passes it to another workman, who performs his part of the labor, and the shoe is passed to a third; and before it is completed, it passes through the hands of eight different workmen.

Notwithstanding the immense amount of work executed in this manufactory, the agent finds it impossible to supply the demand. Orders come in upon him for greater quantities of manufactured articles than can be furnished. [Budget.]

INSURANCE CASE. The case of George O. Lamson vs. Edward A. Mix, Elihu L. Mix and W. Westervelt, having occupied the United States circuit court three days, terminated yesterday morning in a verdict for the plaintiff. The following is a brief outline of it:—In December, 1833, Elihu Mix was either whole or part owner of the ship Gen. Smith, and the other defendants were interested in a voyage which she was about to make to the western coast of America to purchase Lima wood. Previous to the vessel's sailing, the defendants obtained a letter of credit from H. D. Cothel, of this city, in favor of Edward A. Mix, who went with the ship, to the plaintiff, who was then doing business at Carthage, in the province of Costa Rica. Cothel's letter instructed Lamson to furnish Edward A. Mix with whatever funds he might want, and to obtain from him in return his draft at 60 days, on Elihu L. Mix, and also to have the ship consigned on her homeward voyage to Cothel. Acting upon this letter, Lamson guaranteed the payment of a cargo of Lima wood, which Edward A. Mix purchased from a man named Gerald. But, instead of obtaining Edward A. Mix's draft on Elihu L. Mix, as Cothel had instructed him to do, he forwarded his own draft on Elihu L. Mix to Cothel, to get it accepted. Elihu L. Mix refused to accept, unless a commission of five per cent. charged by Lamson was deducted. This Cothel declined doing, and about the same time, learned that the ship had been consigned to Fitch, Brothers & Co. of Marseilles, but that the bill of lading had been made out to him. As Lamson had not obtained the draft of Edward A. Mix, nor was the ship consigned to Cothel, he considered that the conditions on which he gave the letter of credit had not been observed, and that he was exonerated from any liability to Lamson; he therefore declined having any thing further to do in the matter, and left Lamson to look to the defendants for the amount of indebtedness on their account, and Lamson instituted the present suit to recover it. The principal point of defence was, that the letter of credit was given, and the property obtained solely for account of Edward A. Mix, and that the other two defendants were in no way responsible for it. It was shown however on the part of the plaintiff, that the three defendants were interested in the voyage, and had all taken a part in procuring the letter of credit from Cothel. Verdict for the plaintiff, $12,997 09. For the plaintiff, Messrs. Selden and Law. For the defendants, the Messrs. Staples.

CUBA. A letter from Havana, published in the Boston Gazette, after giving the particulars of the misunderstanding between the governor general of the island and the governor of St. Jago, concludes thus:

"This state of things has caused great alarm to the inhabitants of St. Jago and the other principal cities of the island. In the former all business was at a stand, and in many other parts of the island great alarm was felt by the people generally, and men of property in particular. Large amounts of money and bills were to be remitted to this country for safe keeping and investment, as many wealthy men have large sums in gold and silver lying idle, and feeling confident (as would be the case) that in the event of any insurrection, their money would be seized, large sums will find their way to the United States beyond doubt, as Cuba has immense sums lying dormant in gold and silver amongst its inhabitants, with whom it is the fashion to hoard up money in this way amongst all classes, more particularly by the wealthy, where there are many instances of single individuals having from 300 to 500,000 dollars in actual gold and silver coins in their possession, which never circulates."

Island of Cuba. A writer from Cuba to the editor of the Pennsylvania Inquirer states that the imports and exports into and from that island have increased very much. According to a statement published, the amount exported from that island to the United States, during the last year, was $11,346,615, and the amount imported from the United States, $5,506,508—showing a cash balance of trade in favor of Cuba, of $5,839,807. From Matanzas, according to the representations of the same writer, the whole exports, during the year 1835, were, of sugar, 184,356 boxes; coffee, 155,779 arrobas; molasses, 42,204 hogsheads; of which 41,680 boxes of sugar, 134,735 arrobas of coffee, and 42,136 hogsheads of molasses, were sent to the U. States. He represents education as being at a low ebb in Cuba, the want of it being by no means confined to the lower classes. Domestic duties, as they may be called, such as sewing, cooking, washing, &c. are, as he says, but little understood by the females, whose time is spent in music and dancing, in which he thinks they can vie with any ladies, although, perhaps, their music is not such as to suit the refined taste of the fair daughters of Europe or America.

THE DEBT OF ENGLAND. The following amusing calculation is from a late London paper. It may appear very strange that a nation can support the burden of such an enormous debt; and yet, with all this weight upon the government and people, there is less pressure upon the men of active business in Great Britain, than there is upon the same classes in the United States, where we have a surplus of 40 millions in the public treasury.

The weight of the national debt, in gold, amounts to 14,088,472 lbs. or 6,282 tons 9 cwt. 3 qrs. 13 lbs.; in silver to 266,666,666 lbs. or 119,047 tons 12 cwt. 1 qr. 14 lbs. To transport this debt across the seas, in gold, it would require a fleet of 25 ships of 250 tons burthen, each. To carry the debt by land would require 12,580 one-horse carts, each cart being loaded with half a ton of gold.—These would extend, in one unbroken line, 35½ miles. If conveyed by soldiers, and every soldier were to carry 50 lbs. weight in his knapsack, it would require an army of 281,769 men. Eight hundred millions of sovereigns, piled one upon another, or formed into one close column, would extend 710 miles. If this column were commenced at the Lizard, or extreme point of Cornwall, and continued northward, it would reach ten miles beyond John o'Groat's house, at the extreme point of Scotland. The same number of sovereigns laid flat, in a straight line, and touching each other, would extend 11,048 miles; or more than 13 times round the moon. Eight hundred millions of one-pound bank of England notes, sewed together, would cover a turnpike road 40 feet wide, and 1,050 miles long; or from Land's-end to John o'Groat's house, and nearly half-way back again. If the notes were sewed together, end to end, they would form a belt long enough to go four times round the world, or sixteen times round the moon. The whole population of the world is estimated at one thousand millions of souls. An equal distribution of the national debt would give sixteen shillings to every man, woman and child; or four pounds to every family on the face of the earth.—Were England to conquer all Europe, and levy a general poll-tax to pay off her present debt, she must have from every man, woman and child, £5 17s. 7½d.; or from every family throughout Europe £29 8s. 2½d. Supposing, for a moment such a thing possible, as that we could procure from the Mexican mines silver in sufficient quantity to pay off the debt, it would require to bring it to England, a fleet of 476 ships of 250 tons each. To carry it to the bank of England in one-horse carts, each containing half a ton of silver, it would take 238,095. These ranged in one unbroken line, would extend 676 miles; or from Land's-end to within 24 miles of John o'Groat's house. If carried by men, each loaded with fifty lbs. weight, it would require 5,383,333; or 1,891,033 men in addition to the whole adult male population of Great Britain.

Paulding votes with Putnam, and Van Wert with Mercer.

The counties of Allen, Coshocton, Crawford, Fayette, Holmes, Jackson, Knox, Lawrence and Licking, each returned poll books in one or two of the townships, which were rejected for want of formality—a palpable omission of duty on the part of the judges and clerks of elections. We have, however, included them in the above statement, for the purpose of showing the actual vote in each county, to which the candidates were justly entitled. We annex a statement of the votes in the rejected townships, giving the reasons for which they were rejected.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

From the New York Journal of Commerce.

It was originally provided by the constitution that each member of the electoral college should vote for two persons for president and vice president, without designating the particular office of either. The one having the highest number of votes was declared to be president, and the one having the next highest number, vice president. This however, was found inconvenient in practice, and in 1801 was abandoned for the better system now in operation, by which the electors name in their ballots the person voted for as president, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as vice president.

Since the declaration of independence there have been twelve presidential elections, exclusive of the present, and in only two cases has the choice devolved upon congress. The first was in 1801, when Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr had an equal number of votes in the electoral college, and the second in 1825, when the electoral votes were so divided between Andrew Jackson, John Quincy Adams, Wm. H. Crawford and Henry Clay, that neither had a majority. The following schedule will show the number of votes received by the principal candidates at each election from the origin of the government to the present time.

First term, 1789. Electors 69. George Washington was therefore declared elected to the presidency, and John Adams to the vice presidency.

Second term, 1793. Electors 135. George Washington had 132 votes, and was elected president; John Adams 77, and was elected vice president.—The next highest candidate was George Clinton, who received 50 votes.

Third term, 1797. Electors 138. John Adams received 71 votes and was elected president; Thomas Jefferson 69, and was elected vice president. The next highest candidate was Thomas Pinckney, who received 59 votes, and after him Aaron Burr, who received 30.

Fourth term, 1801. Electors 138. Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr had each 73 votes, John Adams 65, and Charles C. Pinckney 64. There being no choice of president, the election was carried into the house of representatives, and on the 36th ballot, Thomas Jefferson received the votes of nine states out of sixteen, and was declared elected. Aaron Burr was declared elected vice president.

Fifth term, 1805. Electors 176. The new system of voting introduced. Thomas Jefferson received 162 votes for president; George Clinton 162 votes for vice president; and were elected. Charles C. Pinckney, the only other candidate for the presidency, received 14 votes, and Rufus King 14 votes for the vice presidency.

Sixth term, 1809. Electors 176. James Madison received 122 votes for president, and Chas. C. Pinckney 47. George Clinton 113 votes for vice president, and Rufus King 47. Madison and Clinton were accordingly elected.

Seventh term, 1813. Electors 217. James Madison received 128 votes for president, and De Witt Clinton, 39. Eldridge Gerry 131 votes for vice president, and Jared Ingersoll 86. Madison and Gerry elected.

Eighth term, 1817. Electors 217. James Monroe received 183 votes for president, and Rufus King 34; Daniel D. Tompkins 183 votes for vice president; and John E. Howard 22. Monroe and Tompkins elected.

Ninth term, 1821. Electors 232. James Monroe received 231 votes for president, and Daniel D. Tompkins 218 for vice president.

Tenth term, 1825. Electors 261. Andrew Jackson received 99 votes for president; John Quincy Adams 84; Wm. H. Crawford 41; Henry Clay 37. Neither candidate having a majority, the election was carried into the house, where, on the first ballot, John Quincy Adams received the votes of 13 states out of 24, and was declared elected. Seven states voted for Jackson, and 4 for Crawford. John C. Calhoun was chosen vice president by the electoral college, having received 182 votes. The next highest candidates were N. Sandford, who received 30 votes, and Nathaniel Macon, who received 24.

Eleventh term, 1829. Electors 261. Andrew Jackson received 178 votes for president, and John Quincy Adams 83. John C. Calhoun 171 votes for vice president, and Richard Rush 83. Jackson and Calhoun elected.

Twelfth term, 1833. Electors 288. Andrew Jackson received 219 votes for president, Henry Clay 49, John Floyd 11, William Wirt 7, Martin Van Buren received 189 votes for vice president, John Sergeant 49, William Wilkins 80, Henry Lee 11, Amos Ellmaker 7. Jackson and Van Buren elected.

SPECIE CIRCULAR.

From the "Globe" of Wednesday last.

It was recently alleged in a Missouri opposition paper, with much exultation, that there was an "end of the humbug," as the specie circular had so courteously been called.

It declared, that some new treasury circular had been issued, which it seemed to consider as a modification or repeal of the original one.

We inquired at the proper place if there had been any such treasury circular issued, and was informed that there had not.

This we published; and though admitted to be true, yet some of the bank presses assert it was evasive or liable to misconception; and imputations have been made both on us and the treasury department of a design to mislead.

But these are wholly unfounded. In point of fact, neither the treasury department nor any of its bureaux have issued any new circular on that subject or as to disbursing officers; nor have any bureaux in any other department issued any, which alters or annuls the original specie circular in any respect.

We have since learned, however, that a bureau in the war department, on a complaint some time ago, that its disbursing officers had suddenly drawn large sums in specie from some of the deposite banks, has cautioned them in relation to that course. But this has nothing to do with the original specie circular from the treasury, and we never inquired at the war department, in respect to it, and neither knew, nor published anything as to its proceedings on that point.

We neither knew nor inquired any where as to any point, except the circulars of the treasury, and thought only of some measure modifying the original specie circular.

Had we known of the course which had been taken by the war department, in respect to its disbursing officers, as to drawing on the banks, though having nothing to do with the imputed "humbug," we certainly should have published it, because it reflects credit on those who suggested it, with a view to protect the banks from unnecessary and vexatious demands for specie.

But we did not know it, and did not ask concerning it, and we learn that it was not then known at the treasury, though the latter had some time previously invited the attention of the war department to the subject.

From the New York American.

The veracity of the Globe, and the consistency of the party, on the subject of the Jackson, or specie currency, were directly impugned by an article we copied on Thursday from the National Intelligencer, charging that the denial by the Globe that instructions had been given by the treasury department to the various fiscal agents and disbursing officers, not to demand specie from the deposite banks, was a mere evasion, inasmuch as these instructions, though not given by the secretary of the treasury, were given at his request, by intermediate agents.

What the National Intelligencer thus generally stated, our readers will find established by the annexed circular of the commissary general of subsistence.

CIRCULAR.

Office of the commissary general of subsistence, Washington, October 17, 1836.

SIR: The secretary of the treasury has requested that disbursing officers, acting under the orders of the department of war, may be cautioned respecting the making or authorising large calls for specie from the deposite banks.

In concurrence with the views of the department of war upon this subject, you will not demand nor authorise any demand for a large amount of specie, at one time, from any of the deposite banks, without giving them reasonable notice; and whenever such calls are anticipated at the period for rendering estimates for funds, it will be remarked on the estimate, that "the amount will be required in specie," in order that the secretary of the treasury may be so notified upon the requisition, and make his arrangements accordingly.

Respectfully, your most obedient servant,

Com. gen. of sub.

From this one circular which has come to light, we may fairly argue the existence of similar ones in all the departments; and then what a figure, in the eyes of honest and truth-loving people, does the secretary of the treasury cut, when he authorises so palpable an evasion and prevarication as that above referred to in the Globe!

[Let us do justice, as far as we can, to all men. We do not believe that the evasion referred to was authorised, and we doubt whether it was approved by the secretary of the treasury.] [Nat. Intel.]

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF MARYLAND.

Executive department, Annapolis, Nov. 25, 1836.
Gentlemen of the senate, and of the house of delegates:

The extraordinary occurrences, which, in our judgment, rendered it proper and necessary that you should meet in general assembly at this time, having been briefly detailed in the proclamation calling you together, a copy of which is herewith submitted, we proceed to state to you, more at large, the views by which we were influenced, and the objects sought to be accomplished by calling for the exertion of your authority, in the unprecedented crisis in our affairs, so faithfully and wantonly brought about.

It was with deep regret, that we felt ourselves called upon to expose to the world conduct of Marylanders, so utterly unworthy of the name, and so little to have been expected of descendants from, and partakers in the honor and fame of ancestors of such unsullied purity and glorious memory, as every son of the state should be proud of and strive to emulate. But, after waiting in vain, with painful anxiety and deep solicitude, in hopes that a returning sense of duty, moral and political, would cause at least a sufficient number of the recusant electors, to attend the college, and with those who had qualified, elect a senate, until after the last of the exciting elections of the season was over, but not until its result was ascertained, when there could be no suspicion of partizan design or political motive for our action, we felt that we could no longer forbear, in duty to the people of the state and justice to ourselves, to take a firm and determined stand in support of the constitution and authority of the government, against the designs and proceedings intended to effect their overthrow.

It is believed that the annals of party contention, and political errors and aberrations from duty, to which all party spirit naturally tends, would be searched in vain for a case of such plain and palpable violation of constitutional duty and moral obligation, as the conduct of the recusant electors of the senate of Maryland exhibits; and although all who have approved of their unholy designs, and lent their aid and assistance to carry them into effect, have been guilty of gross dereliction and violation of the duty of good citizens, it is only those who counseled, beguiled and misled them to the course they pursued, that equal them in degree of guilt.

A painful sense of duty having required of us to denounce the conduct of the recusant electors and their abettors, in terms suited to the nature and design of their offences, it is with the greatest satisfaction that we turn from them to do justice to the patriotic and noble conduct of many of their political partisans. In some parts of the state, and particularly in Allegany county, the party to which they belong, almost with one voice condemned, and, from the first, reprobated their conduct, with as much severity as their political opponents have done; and we believe this has been the case with a very respectable portion of their political friends in every part of the state. Such patriotic conduct, breaking and rising above all party trammels, when the constitution and government—the tranquillity and welfare of the state were endangered, merits all praise, and meets our unqualified admiration. And we have great gratification in expressing the highest confidence, inspired by manifestations and evidences in every quarter of the state, that when the recent excitements shall have passed away, and reason shall have triumphed over the madness of party, and resumed her empire, that the number even of the political partisans of the recusant electors, who will continue to countenance and support them in their delinquency, and revolutionary designs and proceedings, will be comparatively very few, and be confined to such of their prominent counsellors and principal abettors as will have no hope of re-establishing themselves in the good opinion and confidence of the community. We will not allow ourselves to doubt, that even among the recusants themselves, there will be found some, whose honesty and patriotism will finally triumph over their misguided passions, and cause them to look back upon their late conduct with mingled astonishment and shame, and the most profound abhorrence of the wily, evil advisers by whom they were led astray.

As soon as the recusant electors had taken their course, it became the duty of the executive, and indeed of all good citizens, to inform themselves of the constitutional and best means of defeating their designs, and supporting the constitution and government, and providing a remedy for their dereliction of duty. Upon examination of the constitution and form of government with this view, we found cause of increased admiration of the wisdom and forecast of the patriotic and eminent statesmen by whom it was framed. We found that they had not left it in the power of any unfaithful agents of the people, to destroy this work of their wise heads and pure hearts. They provided that "the general assembly of Maryland" should consist of a senate and house of delegates, and for periodical elections of the members of each branch, without otherwise limiting the term of service of either. But although they had the forecast so to frame the provisions in relation to the elections of members of the senate and house of delegates, as to guard against the effects of improper conduct, or omissions of unfaithful agents, willing to leave the state without a general assembly, by leaving the term of service of the members of each house unlimited, otherwise than by the election of successors, yet it is manifest that they intended the people should have the power and means, and expected they would be exercised, of terminating the service of the members of the senate every fifth year, and of the members of the house of delegates every year. It was in this view, undoubtedly, that they provided for elections to fill vacancies in the senate, "for the residue of the said term of five years."

If any support were necessary to this plain view of the provisions of the constitution, it is abundantly supplied by numerous judicial authorities and decisions, both English and American, in cases directly in point. In Foot v. Prowse mayor of the town of Truro, reported in Strange, page 625, "it was held, that the words, annuatim eligende (to be chosen annually,) were only directory, and that an annual election of them was not necessary to make an election in their presence good, and King, C. J. who delivered the opinion of the court, compared it to the case of constables and other annual officers, who are good officers after the year is out, until another is elected and sworn." In this case, the charter of the town directed, that the election of aldermen should be made annually, and that the election of mayor should be held in the presence of the aldermen. The aldermen, in whose presence Prowse had been elected mayor, had not been elected annually, but held their offices of aldermen in virtue of an election held some years before. Prowse's election was held to be valid. To the same effect, substantially, are the following decisions, viz:—Hicks vs. town of Launceston, 1 Rolle's abridgment, page 518. Queen vs. The corporation of Durham, 10th modern reports, page 146. Smith vs. Smith, 3d equity reports of South Carolina, and the people vs. Runkles, 9th Johnson's New York reports, page 147. in which all the other cases here mentioned, and several text books, are cited as authorities.

The continuance of the senate, until superseded by the election of successors being thus settled in our minds beyond a doubt, we should at once have called the general assembly together, with a view of their making provision for the election of other electors in the place of those who had refused and neglected to attend the college and perform their duty, but for the additional excitement and misconstruction of motive, which we apprehended would be produced in the public mind by such a step, during the pendency of the recent election of electors of president and vice president of the U. States; and we determined to call the general assembly for that purpose, immediately after that election should be over, without regard to, or intention to be influenced in the least by, what might be the result of that election.

Considering that the spirit of the constitution, and the plain intent of its framers require that the term of senators shall be terminated by the election of successors every five years, or as soon thereafter as circumstances may admit of, our first object in convening the general assembly was, that they might pass a law providing for the election of electors of the senate, in the place of those who had refused or neglected to attend the college and perform their duty. That the general assembly have the authority to provide by law for a new election in such a case, is a proposition so clear of rational doubt, that, but for the lawless and anarchical spirit of the day, which calls in question the most venerable and best settled doctrines of constitutional law, and embraces in their stead the most wild and monstrous absurdities, no argument or authority would be necessary or even proper to sustain it.—Even if the original constitutional provision on the subject remained entire and unchanged, the power to provide for the election in such a case, would be ample, but all such parts of that constitutional provision, as relates to the judges, time, place and manner of holding elections, having been abolished at the November sessions 1798 and 1799, and left thereafter to be regulated by law, it would seem impossible that doubt could be raised on the subject.—Yet being aware that the authority of the general assembly in this respect, has been not only questioned but strenuously denied, we deem it proper to refer to a few conclusive authorities in support of it. That eminent jurist, James Kent, late chancellor of New York, in the second volume of his commentaries, says—that "the power of election, or the supplying of members in the room of such as are removed by death or otherwise, is said to be a power incident to, and necessarily implied in every aggregate corporation, from the principle of self preservation," that "it was decided in the case of Newling vs. Francis, 3d term reports, 189," that "when the mode of electing corporate officers, was not regulated by charter or prescription, the corporation might make by-laws to regulate the election, provided they did not infringe the charter." And he refers to various other authorities in support of his position. Such power being "an incident to, and necessarily implied in every aggregate corporation" how can it be doubted that the legislative authority, which grant charters of incorporation, possess at least equal powers of "self preservation?"

That there is no existing legal provision for an election to supply vacancies in the senatorial electoral college, it is presumed, is for the same reason, that the punishment of the crime of parricide, when first committed in the Athenian commonwealth, was found to be unprovided for: because it had never entered into the conceptions of the framers of the constitution or laws, that such a provision was or would become necessary.

A sufficient number of the recusant electors having, since the issuing of our proclamation and before the day assigned for the meeting of the general assembly, attended the electoral college, qualified and joined with those faithful electors who had from the first been ready to perform their duty, and a new senate having been elected, it will now only be necessary, in reference to the conduct of the recusants and their abettors, to provide appropriate remedies to meet any future like conduct or occurrences. And for this purpose, we respectfully recommend an amendment of our election laws, providing for new elections to fill any vacancies which may occur in any future electoral college, by death or resignation, or by refusal or neglect to attend and qualify within a specified time; and we also recommend an amendment in our criminal laws, providing for suitable and adequate punishment of any agents of the people who may hereafter solicit and receive, or accept of any public trust, and refuse or wilfully neglect to perform the duties enjoined by the constitution or laws.

Supposing that you will concur with us in the opinion, that at this extraordinary session your attention and labors ought to be confined to the special objects of calling you together, and such other business of importance as the welfare of the state requires to be acted upon without delay, we shall forbear to call to your notice or attention any other subjects of interest to the state. Among these we esteem the passage of such laws as you may deem necessary and proper for suppressing all revolutionary designs and proceedings; for the better support of the constitution and government, and for bringing to justice and deserved punishment their future violators. As the constitution provides that no part thereof shall be altered, changed or abolished, unless a bill so to alter, change or abolish the same shall pass the general assembly, and be published at least three months before a new election, and shall be confirmed by the general assembly, after a new election of delegates, in the first session after such new election; and as several bills for alterations of the constitution were passed by the last general assembly, it is necessary to their confirmation as a part of the constitution, that you should act upon them at the present session.

And as the act of congress, providing for the deposit with the states of the surplus revenue of the United States, requires that legal provision shall be made by each state for receiving her proportion thereof, and giving the required obligations for its return when legally called for, before receiving any part of said surplus, and as the distribution is to commence on, or soon after the first day of January next, we recommend the passage of a law in conformity to the requirements of the act of congress: a copy of which, with a circular from the secretary of the treasury of the United States, we herewith submit for your consideration.

Reform of the constitution, having been held forth by the recusant electors as their ostensible object in the course of conduct pursued by them and their abettors, our views upon that subject are perhaps justly and properly expected.

In an address to the people of the state, the recusant electors undertook to defend their attempt to subvert the constitution by revolutionary means, upon the unfounded assumption that all hope of adequate amendment, or, in the cant, various meaning, and undefined phrase of the day—reform, by the constitutional method, are vain and illusory; and they quoted, with a view to support their assumption of right to pursue the course they had adopted and recommended to their coadjutors, from our bill of rights, the unquestionable truth "that whenever the ends of government are perverted, and public liberty manifestly endangered, and all other means of redress are ineffectual, the people may, and of right ought, to reform the old or establish a new government." But they omitted all attempts to show that these circumstances had occurred, or, that they were the people, or even the representatives of any part of them, for such a purpose.

What are the ends of government? The security of life, liberty and property, may be the brief but comprehensive answer; and we state with honest pride, and in the fullest confidence, that in no community have these ends been more effectually provided for, or more amply enjoyed, and that an instance cannot be cited from our history under the constitution, in which any of them have been violated, by color of law. "When public liberty is manifestly endangered?" As it is notoriously felt by all, so it needs no argument to prove, that public liberty has never been endangered, or even threatened here, save by the rash or misguided men, and their abettors whose conduct is now under review. But, were it otherwise, and had these events occurred, can it be said, with the least semblance of truth, "that all other means of redress" have been tried and found "ineffectual?" No other constitution or form of government has provided more amply for its amendment, or a mode more ready, easy, safe and judicious for that purpose than ours, nor has there ever occurred, since its adoption, a time when the assumption or assertion that there is no hope of reform under it, was so evidently untrue as at the present.

In the lapse of sixty years, the position of society has materially varied, so that the provisions of the constitution are less perfect in theory, and less adapted to ideas of right, and to the present condition, wishes and interest of the people, than at the time of its establishment. There are several parts of the instrument which it is generally believed might be beneficially changed. The establishment of a different basis and apportionment of representation is required by a just regard to the rights, interests and wishes of the people of the more populous sections of the state, and there is every reason to believe that such a change, in this respect, as ought to satisfy the large and populous sections, and can be safely conceded by the smaller and less populous, can, and will be obtained, in the constitutional manner, and with general consent. The comparative inequality of the representation of different sections of the state, with reference to population, taxation and business, has been pressed upon the attention of the people and the legislature for several years past, and, as evidence of the impression which had been made in favor of conceding to the more populous sections, an increase of representation and political power, or, in other words, of the advance of the principal cause of reform, the general assembly, at the last annual session, and but just before it has been so boldly, but untruly asserted or assumed, that all hope of obtaining reform in the constitutional mode, was vain and illusory, passed two bills, such as had frequently before been rejected, which, when confirmed, will give an increase of six representatives to the most populous sections—two to the city of Baltimore, and four to the people who now compose the counties of Baltimore and Frederick!!

Can any sane mind believe, under these circumstances, that the real, and main object of the recusant electors and their abettors, in the course they have pursued, was reform in the constitution? But one answer, in substance and truth, can be given to this question. It is as manifest that the ostensible was not the real and main object, as that the assumptions upon which their measures were predicated, were, and are utterly destitute of foundation, untrue, and have been disproved by unquestionable facts.

We feel warranted by the facts which we have stated, and by the evidences of public sentiment in every quarter of the state, in expressing the fullest confidence, that whenever, and in whatever peaceable and orderly manner, the people of the state shall have clearly indicated the kind and extent of further just, reasonable and proper amendments desired by them, that their wishes will be carried into effect, in the regular manner, and with as little delay as a just and prudent consideration of, and the necessary action upon them, will admit of.

As a change in the basis of representation, is the great question of reform most generally desired and justly insisted upon, we beg leave to suggest for consideration, as a fair compromise of the conflicting views and interests in relation to the nature and proper extent of such change, and as suited to our condition and local circumstances, that our constitution, in this respect, be altered so as to conform, as nearly as our circumstances will justify, to that of the United States: that the representation in the house of delegates be based on population of federal numbers, limited however, by a maximum for the larger counties, and the city of Baltimore, and by a minimum for the smaller counties and the city of Annapolis, and that a senator be allowed to each county, and the city of Baltimore.

And lastly,

Gentlemen of the house of delegates,

It is with you to consider of the necessity or expediency of exerting the powers with which you are clothed by the constitution, "as the grand inquest of the state, to inquire into the complaints, grievances and offences," which have occasioned you to be called together.

With humble supplications to Divine Providence, that all our labors may be directed and controlled by virtue and wisdom, and result in the promotion of the welfare and prosperity of the state,

We remain, with the highest consideration and respect, your obedient servants,

THO. W. VEAZEY.

MARYLAND LEGISLATURE.

A sufficient number of the new senate to form a quorum, having failed to attend at Annapolis, the house of delegates adjourned on Saturday last, after having adopted the following order, submitted by Mr. Gough, as a substitute for one offered by Mr. Risteau, which was a mere motion for adjournment, sine die, without allusion to the circumstances under which the legislature was convened.

"Whereas, the firm, dignified and energetic stand taken by his excellency, governor Veazey, in his proclamation, convoking an extraordinary session of the legislature to defeat the revolutionary designs and proceedings entertained and carried on by the recusant electors, with the view of overthrowing the constitution and form of government, has superseded the necessity of any immediate legislative action on that subject, by inducing a sufficient number of the aforesaid recusant electors, to the performance of their duty; And whereas, it is the opinion of this house that immediate action on the various other matters referred to its consideration, by the message of the governor, received on yesterday is not indispensably requisite; And whereas, it is uncertain whether a quorum of the senate can be assembled without considerable delay and consequent expense to the state, therefore,

"Ordered, That it is expedient that this house shall adjourn immediately, without day."

The Annapolis "Republican" of Tuesday last contains the following sketch of the questions which were considered during the brief session, which cannot fail to interest our readers and be useful for reference.

THE SESSION OF A WEEK.

The house of delegates, nearly every member of which, obeying to the governor's proclamation, attended at the seat of government on Monday last, found themselves in a position entirely new, and not without its difficulties.

The electors had failed to provide a new senate. The wisdom and foresight of the enlightened framers of our state constitution was made strikingly manifest, as we evidenced the importance of that arrangement therein, whereby the term for which either branch of the legislature as well as some of the other most important offices are elected, is made to depend not upon a specified time, but upon the fact of successors being provided to assume their duties. The time wherein new elections shall take place, is fixed, but if from any cause an election fails to be effected, the government is not thereby allowed to expire, as the recusant electors imagined, but is continued in the hands of those last elected, until a new election is effected. The people of this state have been perfectly familiar with this valuable trait in their constitution, as it operated upon those most important officers, the sheriffs of the several counties, the tenor of whose appointments is arranged in this respect similar to that of the senate and house of delegates. The authority of a sheriff does not cease upon a specified day, but upon the election and qualification of a person to assume his duties. The value of this arrangement has long been obvious in his case. Its still greater value in regard to legislative bodies has just been tested, though it is quite likely that few constitution makers of the present day would have duly estimated its importance.

The governor accordingly in his proclamation convening the general assembly, intimated in the preamble, that the senate elected in 1831, continued to be the senate of Maryland, and the inference was that their attendance was required by the proclamation.

On the very eve of the day when their attendance was required, and after several of them had actually reached the spot, a new senate is elected, and thereby their term of service terminated.

Several technical questions immediately arose. The executive proclamation had in due form summoned "THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF MARYLAND," to meet on a given day, allowing them, as the constitution requires "at least ten day's notice." It was strenuously contended on one hand, that though the general assembly had had ten day's notice, yet that the new members now elected to constitute one branch thereof, had not had ten day's notice, nor had any proclamation been issued that they could recognize as embracing themselves—and further, some maintained that even if they or a quorum of them should attend, in consequence of informal notification, the legality of holding a session with them, would be contested on the ground of their not having had the notice which the constitution stipulated. The members who entertained these opinions, most if not all of them, objected to forming a house of delegates, and proposed that the members should return home without forming a quorum.

This was objected to by a majority of the body, upon the ground, that as they have been summoned by the executive, according to the provisions of the constitution, they were compelled to obey. The executive power in this respect is of the very last importance, and an evasion, even though unimportant at the time, might furnish precedent of most disastrous effect.

The idea that the executive might countermand their own proclamation was started and gravely considered. Though not forbidden expressly by the constitution, yet such a measure would be treading very closely indeed upon the margin of sacred ground. Of nothing were the framers of the constitution of Maryland more jealous, than of the executive power to prorogue the legislature, under an exercise of which the previous province had so severely smarted from the very first settlement of the country. This would not exactly be proroguing, but it would be so near it, that any future governor who might summon a legislature, if he ascertained upon their reaching the seat of government, that his own or his party's views would be thwarted by the body, would not hesitate to plead as precedent the present exercise of the power to issue a counter-proclamation, and thereby send the members home again. This view of the subject we presume operated with the executive to reject the idea.

On the other hand as the constitution forbids one branch to adjourn a session without the concurrence of the other—it was questioned whether one branch having convened and the other not, the one could rightfully adjourn without waiting for the other. The constitution not having contemplated such a case, is silent thereon.

Debates arose on several occasions, upon motions to adjourn, in which not only these difficulties were discussed, but others of somewhat similar complexion. Two of the electors elect of president and vice president, are also members elect of the new senate, and it was insisted upon by Colonel Ely and some others, that those gentlemen could not constitutionally fulfil the duties of electors, if they previously qualified as senators, because the constitution of Maryland forbids members of the state senate to hold any office of trust or profit under the United States government.

Another difficulty was still more embarrassing. There were four or five bills which passed the last legislature, for amending the constitution—two of them involving the great question of REFORM—one for creating a new county upon the Western Shore.

(Carroll county), and the other for increasing the delegation of the city of Baltimore. If both houses assembled, and a session of the general assembly was convened under the proclamation, it was maintained by some gentlemen of high legal attainments, that those laws must be confirmed at this extra session, or they could not be constitutionally confirmed by the subsequent annual session; the constitution requiring that such proposed alterations must be confirmed "by the next succeeding general assembly, and at the first session thereof."

Other legal gentlemen standing equally high, gave it as their decided opinion, that those laws might be confirmed at the annual session, and their only doubt was, whether they could constitutionally be confirmed at an extra session held previous to the period fixed by the constitution for holding the annual session.

To obviate those difficulties, the idea was suggested of adjourning this extra session over to the very day before the annual session commences, and hereby, by letting the one run into the other, both would be in fact "the first session." Upon examining this proposition, it was found also full of difficulties. The practice of the legislature of Maryland was found to have afforded two or three precedents in favor, but Jefferson's Manual of parliamentary or congress usage was directly to the contrary. He lays it down, and apparently with good reason, that a session convened by executive authority, can by no means supersede the constitutional requisition, that a session must commence at the period fixed by the constitution, and any session commenced previously, must cease before that commences.

There were serious difficulties in all these questions. To take up the constitutional subjects, and give to them the deliberation which their importance demanded, would consume much more time than it was desirable or convenient to appropriate to the extra session; to have them defeated by refusing to consider them "at the first session after such new election," would be treating their advocates ungenerously—and yet, to pass upon them at a session whose legality of decision would be matter of great doubt, ought to be avoided if possible.

The best way in the opinion of many, of avoiding these embarrassments, was for the house to adjourn, without waiting for the senate to form a quorum, and thereby leaving the annual session to be undisputedly "the first session" of this general assembly.

The general expectation that a sufficiency of the new senators would attend within the week, to form a quorum, and enable the two branches to attend to one or two of the most urgent subjects requiring legislative action, particularly the election of a senator of the United States, in the place of the lamented Goldsborough, and an act to authorise the treasurer to receive the state's portion of the surplus revenue, induced a majority of the house to remain in session for some days. Saturday arrived however without bringing a quorum of the senate, whereupon the house determined to adjourn.

REFORM CONVENTION.

Baltimore, Nov. 16, 1836.

According to previous notice, the delegates to the reform convention of Maryland, assembled this day—when it was ascertained that the following counties and city had chosen delegates:

Allegany, Washington, Frederick, Montgomery, Baltimore county, Baltimore city, Anne Arundel, Harford, Cecil, Kent, Caroline, Queen Anne's and Somerset.

The convention, on motion of Benjamin C. Howard, of Baltimore city, appointed the hon. Charles S. Sewall, of Harford county, president, and George Cooke, of Anne Arundel county, secretary.

The convention adjourned from day to day, until the 19th, when their deliberations closed. During its sittings all the counties aforesaid were represented, excepting Allegany, Queen Anne's and Somerset. On examination of the returns from various counties where polls had been opened to receive votes for the delegates, it was ascertained that a majority of all the votes taken for president on the first Monday of November, in nine counties and the city of Baltimore, having a free white population of 203,000, out of 291,000 of the whole white population of the state, had been given to their convention ticket.

On motion of John S. Tyson, of Baltimore county, the following members were appointed to prepare and report to the convention resolutions for its adoption:

John S. Tyson, Benjamin C. Howard, Francis Thomas, John A. Carter, Washington Hall, James W. Williams, George Cooke.

November 19th, 1836.

The chair, on behalf of the aforesaid committee, reported the following resolutions, which were read and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the unexpected call on the part of the executive upon the members elect to the house of delegates, and of the old senate to assemble at Annapolis, on Monday next, has rendered it expedient to postpone the meeting of the reform convention to a day when ample opportunity shall have been afforded to understand fully the reasons which have induced the executive to adopt this extraordinary procedure, and to ascertain the results of their deliberation.

Resolved, That this convention repels proudly and indignantly the aspersions cast upon its members, and those whom they represent, in the late proclamation of governor Veazey, and regards its doctrines as unsound and dangerous—its language undignified, and its temper and spirit unbefitting the executive of Maryland. The friends of conventional reform have neither done nor designed any thing inconsistent with their duties as peaceable citizens, or in violation of the laws of the state. They have proposed to adopt measures, solemnly sanctioned by the bill of rights of Maryland, to ascertain whether a majority of the people of the state desire a convention assembled to devise and submit for their adoption that which they certainly do not enjoy, a republican form of government.

Resolved, That the people of Maryland, like those of every other republican community, have the right to change the form of government which they have voluntarily adopted whenever it may appear to them expedient to do so, and of this inalienable right our ancestors neither did nor could deprive us.

Resolved, That this right should be exercised cautiously, temperately and with great deliberation; but if a majority of the people of the state should determine, by solemn vote, to establish a new government, it would, by virtue of such sanction, become the regular and only government entitled to respect or obedience, and those who would refuse to obey it, ought to be considered enemies of the public peace and order.

Resolved, That we believe that a majority of the people of Maryland desire to change the present constitution, by a direct vote in favor of or against a new one to be submitted to them by a convention, and are unwilling to await the slow and uncertain action of the legislature, the organization of that department of the government being such as to preclude all reasonable hope of their redressing the grievances of which the people have so long complained.

Resolved, That if the theory of those opposed to conventional reform be true, the people of Maryland are placed in an extraordinary position, differing wholly from our brethren in other states in the union who have control over their constitution, and can fashion it to suit their interests, wishes or even prejudices, whilst we are debarred from exercising the same power over ours, being compelled to lie under the government of associated counties, having a confederacy instead of a republican government.

Resolved, That if the theory of the constitutional reformers be true, that our ancestors had a right to transfer the power of altering the constitution from the people to two legislatures, they had also the right to ordain that there should be no alteration in any way whatsoever, a conclusion to which the intelligent freemen of Maryland can never be brought to assent.

Resolved, That we have no confidence in the opinion that the legislature, if a new senate had been chosen, would have gratified the known wishes of conventional reformers; neither do we believe that this will be done by the old senate and new house of delegates. We anticipate that at a day not far distant, those impressions will become general if not universal, and with that expectation we think it will be expedient hereafter to open the polls again throughout the state, and invite the people to clothe with the necessary power, a convention, to submit to them a form of government, for acceptance or rejection.

Resolved, That the essential difference between a republic and monarchy, consists in the power of the people in the former peacefully to change the features of the constitution, as well as the men who administer it, whereas, in a monarchy such a change must necessarily be accompanied with violence and civil war. Whatever therefore tends to create a resistance to the will of a majority of the people, who desire to change their mode of government, must spring from some anti-republican quality in the government which the people originally established.

Resolved, That the votes given for the delegates to this convention in some of the less populous counties of the state are especially encouraging, as they indicate that magnanimous sense of justice in the bosoms of generous and just Marylanders wherever located, which guided and governed those who framed the present constitution, and bids us hope that the day is now rapidly approaching when a convention of delegates from every county and city will be held fully empowered to harmonize all conflicting views and wishes which now prevail in the state, by some honorable compromise of the claims of the population and of the counties similar to that which clothed with immortal honor the labors of the convention of 1789, in the formation of the existing constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That a very large majority of the people are favorable to conventional reform, and would have manifested more fully than has been done, this wish at the late election, but for the pendency of the presidential election, and the prevalent belief with a portion of the people that the legislature would authorize a convention empowered to grant the reform in the constitution imperiously required by every consideration of justice and propriety.

Resolved, That the friends of conventional reform desire a new constitution to be submitted to the people for adoption or rejection, containing among others the following provisions:

1st. The election of the governor by the people, and the abolition of the council.

2d. The election of one senator from each county and the city of Baltimore, directly by the people.

3d. The reapportionment of the house of delegates so as to do justice to the populous districts, and at the same time give to the small counties, and the city of Annapolis, ample power to protect their interest.

4th. The abolition of all officers for life, the appointment of judges for a limited time, by the joint action of the governor and senate.

5th. The election of clerks and registers by the people.

6th. Limitation and restraint on the powers of the legislature in the future grant of charters.

7th. The whole constitution to be so arranged and digested as to be free from uncertainty and obscurity.

Resolved, That this convention will meet at the city of Annapolis, on the first Monday of January next, unless otherwise notified by the president thereof, and that it is recommended earnestly and respectfully to the people of those portions of the state not represented herein, to choose delegates in time to meet this convention, when it shall again assemble.

Resolved, That the chair appoint a committee to prepare and publish an address to the people of Maryland, enforcing and explaining the views and opinions maintained in the foregoing resolutions, and that said committee be authorized to nominate a central reform committee for the state.

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be presented to the Trades' Union for the use of their hall.

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be presented to the president and secretary for the dignified and able manner in which they have discharged their respective duties.

Signed, C. S. SEWALL, president,
GEORGE COOKE, secretary.

OPINION OF C. J. INGERSOLL, ESQ.

"WITH REFERENCE TO THE U. STATES BANK AND THE QUESTION OF VESTED RIGHTS."

Philadelphia Nov. 15, 1836.

Charles J. Ingersoll, esq.

DEAR SIR: As you have been elected a delegate to the convention to "propose amendments to the constitution of Pennsylvania," the undersigned, members elect of the legislature, are desirous that you should make known publicly your views on the general powers of the convention, and particularly with reference to the United States bank, and the question of "vested rights."

We are induced to make this call on you from the belief that your experience in public life, will add weight to your opinions.

Very respectfully,

A. M. PELTZ,
SAMUEL STEVENSON,
PETER RAMBO,
D. ETTER,
WM. ENGLISH,
THOMAS LEWELLEN,
WM. RHEINER, Jr.

Forest Hill, Philadelphia Co. Nov. 24th, 1836.

Messrs. A. M. Peltz, Samuel Stevenson, Peter Rambo, D. Etter, Wm. English, Thomas Lewellen, Wm. Rheiner, Jr., member elect of the legislature of Pennsylvania—

GENTLEMEN: In compliance with your letter of the 15th inst. by which you condescend to ask my views for publication, I beg leave to separate the two topics you mention, and beginning with the U. States bank, I wish to be understood as considering it as representing state banks altogether. Contrary to, perhaps, prevailing sentiment, in my humble opinion, bank charters, and above all, the charter of that bank, may be repealed by act of assembly, without a convention; and such act will not be contrary to the constitution of the United States. I propose to consider, separately, first, the state authority, and secondly, the federal authority connected with banks.

Rather than present any view of my own, it will be more acceptable and effectual to submit those of the earliest republicans of Pennsylvania, who fifty years ago established a precedent precisely in point, resting on principles of right, and illustrated by arguments, a departure from which since, has been the source of great evil to the commonwealth. The bank of North America became a law of the state of Pennsylvania, by an act dated the 1st of April, 1782, which was repealed by a subsequent act of the 13th September, 1785. In the following year, petitions being presented for the renewal of the charter, were referred to a committee consisting of Messrs. Clymer, Robinson, Lilly, Rittenhouse and Edgar. Animated, elaborate, and acrimonious debates ensued, in which Messrs. Clymer, Morris, Fitzsimmons and Robinson were the principal speakers for the bank, and Messrs. Findley, Smilie, Edgar and Whitehill against it. Of these discussions, a digest will show that the arguments then used were the same which prevail at present; and that parties were divided then, much on the same principles of politics and economy which separate them now. The gentlemen sustaining the bank—most of them were its projectors, stockholders and directors, and recommended it as a fiscal measure, beneficial to commerce and credit, contending that in granting bank charters the legislature acts in a ministerial capacity; that granting charters is an act of agency, distinct from the power of making laws; and that charters so granted cannot be abrogated; that laws are general rules, which extend to the whole community; whereas, charters bestow particular privileges upon a certain number of people; that as in taking away charters, the legislature acts judicially, it has no power to take them away; because it cannot act judicially; that charters are a species of property to be forfeited only by misconduct when proved by judicial proceeding, with the benefit of trial by jury. The doctrine of vested rights was asserted by some of the speakers in favor of the bank, principally by Mr. Morris, and the power of the legislature to revoke a bank charter which it had granted, was denied. On the other hand, the opponents of the bank referred to the minutes of the house, granting the charter, for a vote against the clause, which was proposed to empower a future assembly to alter or amend the charter, which clause was rejected for the express reason that the charter must necessarily be always in the power of the house. They asserted that charters, as originally granted in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, to towns and cities, exempting them from the general vassalage then prevalent, were sacred instruments, because they secured to the persons on whom they were bestowed their natural rights and immunities, that charters are sacred or otherwise, not because they are granted by legislative or sovereign power, but according to the objects for which they are granted; that if a charter is given for a monopoly, whereby the natural and legal rights of mankind are invaded, it would be dangerous to hold that it cannot be annulled; that all charters granting exclusive privileges, infringe on the great charter of mankind, whose happiness is the supreme law; that the legislature did not repeal the charter of the bank for misbehavior of the bank, or proceed on any allegation of forfeiture, but taking the matter upon much higher ground, enquired whether the bank was compatible with the safety and welfare of the state, of whose interests they were the guardians. Let us suppose, said Mr. Smilie, a legislature so lost to all sense of their duty, and so corrupt as to give a charter of monopoly to five men, for all our East India trade, and that the next legislature, beholding this monster in face of the constitution, has not the power to give redress—of what use would be annual elections? If the house cannot afford a remedy in such a case, the people must have recourse to the means God and nature have given them for redress. The right of the house to repeal charters was debated in the council of censors, and a member of that body, now in this house, and in favor of the bank, conceded the right of the legislature to revoke them. The charter of the bank was not taken away for what the president and directors had done, but from a conviction of its dangerous tendency. The former house, considering that the bank was a bar to the improvement of the country and to agriculture, thought themselves fully justified in taking away the charter. The bank has not suffered; the stockholders have gained enough. Why should we injure our country in favor of an institution incompatible with the public welfare? The question at present is, said Mr. Whitehill, whether the state shall give way to the bank or the bank to the state; for the bank is set up as a party in the state, it has created great disturbance. The house did not take away any of their property; the charter was not their property; it was a piece of sealed writing, which the house might burn when it pleased. Their property is as safe as it was. The late house of assembly did not take away the charter of the bank for any crime, nor charge the directors with having forfeited the charter. They took up the consideration of the matter upon general principles. If charters cannot be repealed because they are contracts, it affords a great invitation to fraud. Charters of public corporations, when not found agreeable to the welfare of the people may be taken away by the legislature. Two instances of this sort have occurred in this state—one was the charter of the college of Pennsylvania, and the other the charter of the proprietaries. All governments, said Mr. Findley, being instituted for the good of the society to which they belong, the supreme legislative power of every community necessarily possesses a power of repealing every law inimical to the public safety. But the government of Pennsylvania being a democracy, the bank is inconsistent with the bill of rights thereof, which says that government is not instituted for the emolument of any man, family, or set of men. Therefore this institution being a monopoly, and having a natural tendency by affording the means to promote the spirit of monopolizing, is inconsistent, with not only the frame but the spirit of our government.—If the legislature may mortgage, or in other words charter away portions of either the power or privileges of the state, if they may incorporate bodies for the sole purpose of gain, with the power of making by-laws, and of enjoying an emolument of privileges, profit, influence or power, and cannot disannul their own deed, and restore to the citizens their rights of equal protection, power, privilege and influence, the consequence is, that some foolish and wanton assembly may parcel out the commonwealth into little aristocracies, and so overturn the nature of our government without remedy.—This institution is inconsistent with our laws, our habits, our manners. What security can we propose to ourselves against the eventual influence of such wealth, conducted under direction of such a boundless charter.

The last house did no injustice to the bank by repealing its charter; they took away none of its property; the holders have their money; therefore it is not like an agrarian law, as the gentlemen alleged. They may still keep a private bank, and as a private bank is all the constitution admits of, so it would have the same advantages in trade and more security to the people than a chartered bank.

Mr. Morris having said that the assembly has the sole right of granting charters, but no right to take them away, that in Great Britain the sovereign grants charters, but he cannot take them away, the laws of the land having pointed out another mode of annulling them; and that it might as well be said of the assembly of this state having exercised their sovereign authority for the establishment of a land office, from whence grants of lands are made to individuals, that it has the right to exercise the same sovereign authority by destroying that office, and resuming the lands again, which would be exercising the power to give and the power to take away, but that the assembly has no right to such power.

Mr. Finley answered that against the right of the legislature to dissolve such charters it has been often said that body might as well disannul the patents of our lands, and for the same purpose agrarian laws have been improperly mentioned—but what do these arguments mean? Is dissolving the charter of the bank the same thing as entering into it to take away the gold and silver from the owners? The dissolution of the charter is merely for the public use. The right of the legislature is so clearly confessed by gentlemen of legal knowledge, it is so essential to the safety of government, that it would be an insult to the good sense of the house to say any thing more about it.

And Mr. Smilie added that the question of the right of the house to take away a charter had been pretty well discussed, and seemed to be well understood; that two of the members on the other side had conceded the point, and that though the others had not, yet their arguments amount to that when our situation is considered. As charters are granted by the assembly, they can be revoked in no other way than by the assembly. They can not be taken away by the courts of justice as they are given by the legislature.

We are one great family and the laws are our inheritance; they are general rules and common in their nature; no man has a greater claim of special privilege for his hundred thousand pounds than I have for my five pounds; the laws are a common property; the legislature are entrusted with the distribution of them; this house will not, this house has no right, no constitutional power to give monopolies of legal privilege, to bestow unequal portions of our inheritance on favorites.

Finally after a protracted discussion, which is well reported by Mr. Carey, and dedicated to Dr. Franklin, then president of the commonwealth, (well worth republication at large at this time), the vote on the adoption of Mr. Clymer's resolution for a special committee to report a bill to repeal an act to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of North America, was negatived by a vote of 28 yeas to 41 nays.

Thus among the earliest acts of legislation by the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, was the repeal of a bank charter, without any allegation of forfeiture, but upon the ground of its public detriment. Vested rights were pleaded, though not very strenuously, by some few of the advocates of the bank. But it was generally acknowledged, and completely demonstrated, that the legislature is empowered to resume a bank charter without judicial proceeding or interposition, or any charge of misconduct in the bank, whenever the public good requires it.

At the subsequent session banking influence so far prevailed as to procure a recharter for the bank for fourteen years instead of a perpetuity, and with a moderate instead of a large capital.

But this does not affect the force of the precedent of repeal; and it is impossible to read the debates, from which the few preceding extracts have been taken, without being struck by the wisdom and foresight of the forefathers of republicanism.

All their arguments apply at the present moment; and establish both the power and the policy of legislative resummptions of bank charters whenever the public good requires it. No property is disturbed by it, no vested interest divested—a privilege conferred on a few individuals in derogation of common right is revoked as it may and should be whenever its public inconvenience is acknowledged.—The bank and its stockholders are left in the full enjoyment of all the property they ever had, not a cent of which is taken from them, but a monopoly or privilege, perhaps improvidently granted, and certainly contrary to the common rights of all who do not share in it, is recalled by the power which granted it, because it proves injurious to the community.

It is not however on this precedent and these views of our own statesmen, that the argument rests alone. I shall select one of the many instances afforded by British history to the same effect, in which the most enlightened and respectable of modern English statesmen, about the period of the repeal of the charter of the bank of North America, pursued the same course in an analogous instance, and maintained it by reason, authority and eloquence never surpassed; in which though ably opposed, and indeed defeated, yet the principle was fully established, and the right in question conceded even by those who successfully denied the policy of its exercise on that occasion.

The coalition ministry, as it was called, brought forward Mr. Fox's well known bill for revoking the charter of the East India company, and I shall here insert a short view of the discussion in the house of commons on that subject.

A petition was presented from the lord mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common council assembled, setting forth—

That the petitioners observe by the votes that a bill is depending before the house, for vesting the affairs of the East India company in certain commissioners, for the benefit of the proprietors and the public; and that the said bill which directs a seizure and confiscation of powers, privileges and property granted by charter, secured and confirmed by various acts of parliament, hath exceedingly alarmed the petitioners, and raised their fears and apprehensions at so unconstitutional a measure: and therefore praying that the said bill may not pass into a law.

Mr. Secretary Fox said—It is objected that the charter of the company should not be violated; and upon this point, sir, I shall deliver my opinion without disguise. A charter is a trust to one or more persons for some given benefit. If this trust be abused, if the benefit be not obtained, and its failure arises from palpable guilt, or (what in this case is full as bad) from palpable ignorance or mismanagement, will any man gravely say, that trust should not be resumed, and delivered to other hands, more especially in the case of the East India company, whose manner of executing this trust, whose laxity and languor produced, and tend to produce consequences diametrically opposite to the ends of confiding that trust, and of the institution for which it was granted? I beg of gentlemen to be aware of the lengths to which their arguments upon the tangibility of this charter may be carried. Every syllable virtually impeaches the establishment by which we sit in this house, in the enjoyment of this freedom, and of every other blessing of our government. These kind of arguments are batteries against the main pillar of the British constitution.

Had I lived in the reign of James the second, I should most certainly have contributed my efforts, and borne part in those illustrious struggles which vindicated an empire from hereditary servitude, and recorded this VALUABLE DOCTRINE, THAT "TRUST ABUSED IS REVOCABLE."

He allows (Mr. Dundas) the frangibility of charters, when absolute occasion requires it, and admits that the charter of the company should not prevent the adoption of a proper plan for the future government of India, if a proper plan can be achieved upon no other terms.

To this reasoning of Fox, Burke added one of the most masterly of his memorable speeches, from which the following extract is taken, as the whole was revised and published by himself.

To show this, I will consider the objections, which I think are—

First: That the bill is an attack upon the chartered rights of man.

As to that, I must observe, that the "phrase of the chartered rights of men," is full of affectation, and very unusual in the discussion of privileges conferred by charter of the present description.—But it is not difficult to discover what end that ambiguous mode of expression, so often reiterated, is meant to answer.

The rights of men, that is to say, the natural rights of mankind, are indeed sacred things; and if any public measure is proved mischievously to affect them, the objection ought to be fatal to that measure, even if no charter at all could be set up against it. If these natural rights are further affirmed and declared by express covenants, if they are already defined and secured against chicanery, against power and authority, by written instruments and positive engagements, they are in a still better condition; they partake not only of the sanctity of the object so secured, but of that solemn public faith itself, which secures an object of so much importance. Indeed this formal recognition by the sovereign power, of an original right in the subject, can never be subverted, but by rooting up the holding radical principles of government, and even of society itself. The charters, which we call by distinction great, are public instruments of this nature. I mean the charters of king John and king Henry the third. The things secured by these instruments may, without any deceitful ambiguity, be very fitly called the chartered rights of men.

These charters have made the very name of a charter dear to the heart of every Englishman.—But, sir, there may be, and there are charters, not only different in nature, but formed on principles the very reverse of those of the great charter. Of this kind is the charter of the East India company. Magna charta is a charter to restrain power, and to destroy monopoly. The East India charter is a charter to establish monopoly, and to create power. Political power and commercial monopoly are not the rights of men; and the rights to them derived from charters, it is fallacious and sophistical to call "the chartered rights of men."

These chartered rights, (to speak of such charters and of their effects in terms of the greatest possible moderation), do at least suspend the natural rights of mankind at large; and in their very frame and constitution are liable to fall into a direct violation to them.

It is a charter of this latter description, (that is to say a charter of power and monopoly), which is affected by the bill before you.

The bill, sir, does, without question, affect it; it does affect it effectually and substantially. But having stated to you of what description the chartered rights are which this bill touches, I feel no difficulty at all in acknowledging the existence of those chartered rights in their fullest extent. They belong to the company in the surest manner; and they are secured to that body by every sort of public sanction. They are stamped by the faith of the king, they are stamped by the faith of the parliament; they have been bought for money, for money honestly and fairly paid; they have been bought for valuable consideration, over and over again.

I therefore freely admit to the East India company their claim to exclude their fellow subjects from the commerce of half the globe.

I admit their claim to administer an annual territorial revenue of seven millions sterling; to command an army of sixty thousand men; and to dispose (under the control of a sovereign imperial discretion, and with the due observance of the natural and local law) of the lives and fortunes of thirty millions of their fellow creatures. All this they possess by charter and by acts of parliament, (in my opinion) without a shadow of controversy.

Those who carry the rights and claims of the company the furthest do not contend for more than this, and all this I freely grant. But granting all this, they must grant to me in my turn, that all political power which is set over men, and that all privileges claimed or exercised in exclusion of them, being wholly artificial, and for so much, a derogation from the natural equality of mankind at large, ought to be some way or other exercised ultimately for their benefit.

If this is true with regard to every species of political dominion, and every description of commercial privilege, none of which can be original self derived rights, or grants for the mere private benefit of the holders, then such rights or privileges, or whatever else you choose to call them, are all in the strictest sense a trust; and it is of the very essence of every trust to be rendered accountable, and even totally to cease, when it substantially varies from the purposes for which alone it could have a lawful existence.

This, I conceive, sir, to be true of trusts of power vested in the highest hands, and of such as seem to hold of no human creature. But about the application of this principle to subordinate derivative trusts, I do not see how a controversy can be maintained. To whom then would I make the East India company accountable? Why, to parliament to be sure; to parliament, from whom their trust was derived; to parliament, which alone is capable of comprehending the magnitude of its object, and its abuse; and alone capable of an effectual legislative remedy. The very charter, which is held out to exclude parliament from correcting malversation with regard to the high trust vested in the company, is the very thing which at once gives a title and imposes a duty on us to interfere with effect, wherever power and authority originating from ourselves are perverted from their purposes, and become instruments of wrong and violence.

If parliament, sir, had nothing to do with this charter, we might have some sort of epicurian excuse to stand aloof, indifferent spectators of what passes in India and in London. But if we are the very cause of the evil, we are in a special manner engaged to the redress; and for us passively to bear with oppressions committed under the sanction of our own authority, is in truth and reason for this house to be an active accomplice in the abuse.

That the power notoriously, grossly abused, has been bought from us is very certain. But this circumstance, which is urged against the bill, becomes an individual motive for our interference lest we should be thought to have sold the blood of millions of men, for the base consideration of money.

We sold, I admit, all that we had to sell, that is, our authority, not our control. We had not a right to make a market of our duties.

I ground myself therefore on this principle—that if the abuse is proved, the contract is broken; and we re-enter into all our rights; that is, into the exercise of all our duties.

Our own authority is indeed as much a trust originally, as the company's authority is a trust derivatively, and it is the use we make of the resumed power that must justify or condemn us in the resumption of it. When we have perfected the plan laid before us by the right honorable mover, the world will then see what it is we destroy, and what it is we create. By that test we stand or fall; and by that test I trust that it will be found in the issue, that we are going to supersede a charter abused to the full extent of all the powers which it could abuse, and exercised in the plenitude of despotism, tyranny and corruption; and that in one and the same plan, we provide a real and chartered security for the RIGHTS OF MEN cruelly violated under that charter.

It would be impossible to adduce reason more convincing, clothed in language more beautiful than this noble vindication of the vested rights of man, as superior to chartered privileges.

In the course of the present debate, Scott, (the present lord Eldon), Dallas, Erskine, Plomer, Kenyon, Macdonald and Mansfield, six chief justices, as they afterwards became, and the seventh also a high judicial functionary, took part, uniting their more professional doctrines with the great statesman-like views of Burke and Fox. Not one of these great lawyers denied the right or powers of parliament to revoke charters whenever the case of adequate state necessity arises. The principle was granted by all, and the whole question resolved into one of policy.

I am not unmindful of the alleged omnipotence of parliament: but in this respect it has no power that does not belong to the legislature of Pennsylvania. Nor do I overlook the fact that some of the speakers in parliament, like some in the assembly of Pennsylvania, asserted the vested and indefeasible right in a corporate privilege. But such assertion was refuted by the opposite arguments on both these occasions. Ever since the first attempt to repeal laws of mortmain, vested rights have been pleaded against the constantly asserted right to improve the public condition. Titles of nobility were vested rights. Entails and primogeniture were vested rights; with more reason than state bank charters are vested rights. The least spark of liberalism has never failed to shew its light against all such pretensions. In England the enlightened patriots, Milton, Locke and others of old times down to those of the present day, who are uprooting charters innumerable, have uniformly asserted, with Burke, the higher right and supreme law of liberty and equality, above the claims of even property, much less privilege. Indeed it is the right of property to be freed from privilege, of equality to be joined with liberty. It is the right of individual industry and of free labor to be protected against privileged orders and artificial immunities, detrimental and derogatory to all but those who enjoy them. We republicans should be degenerate offspring of the English whigs if we refrain from dealing radically with such vested rights. Nor is there any difficulty till we pass from the question of legislative power to that of its supposed qualification by our federal government, which is the supreme law.

Secondly. The only question arises on the clause of the federal constitution prohibiting state laws, impairing the obligation of contracts: a just and salutary provision to protect contracts between individuals from unjust state legislation. After it had remained more than twenty years a dead letter, the supreme court of the United States, in 1810, applied this prohibition to a law of Georgia granting land to individuals, which was construed to be a contract, that must not be impaired, by another law of the same state, revoking the grant; and in 1819, the court determined that a royal charter for a college granted before the revolution, is a contract, which the state of New Hampshire, after the recognition of American independence, would impair by a law changing the college into a university. Encouraged by these and other like constructions, frequent attempts were made, to bring various laws within the constitutional interdict, as impairing the obligation of contracts, and to prohibit all judicial powers to the state legislatures. But the supreme court, overruling most of these attempts, determined that retrospective laws, which do not impair the obligation of contracts, or partake of the character of ex post facto laws, are not contrary to the constitution; that there is nothing in it which forbids the legislature of a state to exercise judicial functions; or to divest vested rights, provided the law divesting them does not impair the obligation of contracts: and the judges have taken care to make it known that none of their determinations have intimated that a state statute which divests a vested right, is repugnant to the constitution of the United States.

If, as seems to be the prevailing opinion, they have construed the kindred clause against ex post facto laws as confined to criminal laws, adopting Blackstone's erroneous and always controlling assertion, that court have impaired, if not destroyed, an excellent conservative guard provided by the constitution, and, in fact, a principle of natural justice, against unjust legislation; and while construing the clause against laws impairing the obligation of contracts in the year 1827 the judges were so irreconcilably divided in opinion on its meaning that the state judiciaries and the community are unable since to know what it means.—Thus the ex post facto clause has been constructively rendered almost useless; and the clause against impairing contracts applied to laws by embarrassing construction has left the whole subject in doubt and difficulty. By recent appointments there is now a majority of that bench, not involved in these perplexing contradictions, and when these clauses of the constitution come once more to be considered by the supreme court, the public may expect a final, harmonious and satisfactory interpretation of them.

The question, whether a state bank charter is a contract so obligatory on the state that it cannot repeal or reform it, never has been passed upon by the supreme court of the United States; and I respectfully submit that bank charters are not contracts within the constitutional prohibition. A bank charter is a grant of privilege, and not property, the ordinary subject of contract; privilege in derogation of common right, which the state should be at liberty to resume whenever public interest requires it; which when resumed affects no private right of property, and impairs no contract concerning it. This distinction is pointedly acknowledged by an authentic publication from the United States bank in the National Gazette of 23d September last, which, after enumerating the items of the bonus paid to the state for the charter, proceeds to say: "For all these benefits the state in return gave absolutely nothing. They merely furnished what is called a charter, that is, they said that these stockholders should be called the bank of the United States, and be able to sue for their debts—a convenience this in managing their capital, but adding not a dollar of advantage to that capital, any more than the mere piece of tape which is used to tie up a bundle of notes gives value to the notes." The true distinction is forcibly shewn in this view of the subject by the bank itself. The incorporeal means by which a bank is impersonated are totally distinct from the pecuniary means which form its capital; the former being granted by the state, the latter subscribed by the stockholders. The state gives authority to transact business like an individual exempted from individual liabilities; and the stock is managed with the advantages of that exemption. But by granting the charter the state gives no property. It leaves the capital or property whatever the stockholders make it; and by repealing the charter the state resumes merely the incorporeal privilege, leaving the property as it was.

Almost any dealing between a state and an individual may be construed to be a contract in some senses of the term. But it is clear that every contract does not fall within the constitutional interdict. Salaries and marriages are created by contract, yet the salary granted with an office created by law may be recalled by a subsequent law from reasons of state, without impairing the obligation of the original contract between the officer and the state. The contract of marriage may be dissolved by law without exposing it to be annulled as unconstitutional. It is giving at least force enough to the constitutional interdict, when it is construed to prevent laws impairing the obligation of contracts not only between individuals, but also some laws deemed contracts, between states and individuals, such as direct grants of lands. But to inflict this prohibition on every law a state may make, would be equally insufferable by the business and by the sovereignty of a state. Nor is it pretended that it can be. The clause must have some limit beyond its mere terms, or it would unbind society. As all laws then are not contracts, what laws are contracts? I answer that personal rights, the rights of individual property, and laws concerning them, are those alone contemplated by the constitution.—They alone are the ordinary subjects of contracts. There is no obligation on a state not to resume a privilege granted in derogation of common right.—The constitution was not made for privileges, and in the sense of the constitution there is no contract or obligation when the object is privilege. If a charter were granted to a corporation sole, as it might be, as well as to a corporation aggregate, for example to the president of the United States bank alone, instead of the president, directors and company conferring on him and his successors in that office all the privileges and immunities conferred on the body of stockholders, might not the state afterwards revoke such ill-advised privilege, without violating the constitution, or impairing the obligation of a contract? It never could have been, in contemplation of the constitution that such a corporation should be protected as a binding contract which state legislation cannot regulate or repeal.—When a bonus is paid, it is the price of privilege; and therefore perhaps restoration of the bonus must accompany resumption of the charter. But it does not follow that even if there is a species of contract so far as respects the bonus, that the state is incapacitated from resuming the privilege on refunding the bonus. By so doing the commonwealth would be reinstated in its sovereign rights to recall a privilege injurious to the public. If it should not refund the bonus, the law of revocation would only so far impair the obligation of the contract; (if a law even selling privilege can be deemed a contract obligatory) for a law may be unconstitutional in part without being void altogether. Repealing a charter affects only the privilege and still leaves all the capital to the stockholders.

There is an expression of chief justice Marshall in the case of the Providence bank, taking for granted, for argument's sake, that a bank charter is a contract. But that it was so taken for granted, merely for argument's sake, as was asserted at the bar, is clear from the judgment pronounced, which is that for a state to tax a bank is not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of a contract by the charter. This judgment goes far to the conclusion, that the sovereign rights of states remain to be exercised over banks without violating the constitutional protection of contracts; for the reason of the thing cannot be that banks may be destroyed indirectly, through the taxing power, and not repealed directly by the same sovereign power in another exercise of it. In fact a practical construction has been put on the power of states to regulate banks, and with universal acceptance throughout the United States, by the laws suppressing small notes, which if carried up to the denomination of notes contemplated, might work a repeal of some of their charters—an improvement in which Pennsylvania was first, I believe.

The Georgia case, the New Jersey case, and the Virginia case, in which state laws were adjudged contracts, and posterior laws deemed unconstitutional for repealing them, were all cases in which land was granted, so that all these cases turned directly on grants of private property resumed. The Dartmouth college case, was also a case involving a grant and the possession of large property, which although held in trust, was nevertheless taken by the New Hampshire law from the original trustees or their successors, and placed in the disposition of others created by that law. The distinction between all this series of adjudications and the case of bank charters is therefore obvious. There are many considerate persons who question the constructive extension of obligatory contracts to mean laws at all, believing that the constitution contemplates individual not public transactions. There are others who think that this construction was strained beyond right or reason in the case of the Dartmouth college. My purpose is not to gainsay these decisions of the supreme court; but to distinguish bank charters from them.

Far from disparaging the supreme court of the United States or the great chief justice who was for thirty years its presiding genius, constitutional history must still record that during the first twenty years of this union that court never sentenced a law to be a contract; that when at last it did so, the law in question was a direct grant of lands to individuals; that the whole judgment is engrossed with making the constitutional meaning of the mere word contract the same as Blackstones' meaning of the word grant; that even then it was the judgment of a bare majority of a divided court, such a majority as no longer ventures to determine constitutional questions; that this judgment was pronounced without the benefit of full argument at the bar, and without foreseeing the unmanageable embarrassment from giving judgment on the word contract, without attending to its associated word obligation. Mr. Dallas perhaps, and Mr. Forward certainly in their published letters, yield the contract of a bank charter without a question: but I trust those learned gentlemen will think better of it. Americans are of all others the most docile to judicial authority, and I should be sorry to disturb this reverence. The constitutional historian of England has said that the bigotry of lawyers leads them to defend every pretension to which their received standard of authority gives a sanction. A most eminent and learned judge of the supreme court of the United States, whose accession to it was soon followed by a flood of cases, including that of the Dartmouth college, bearing hard on state sovereignty, may perhaps recollect the warning of a friend that receding or reaction must be the only alternatives of such departure from the Madisonian understanding of the constitution.

All considerate friends of the federal constitution must view with alarm so formidable an increase of its judicial powers by construction as that which requires courts to deprive states of sovereign authority over the already six hundred banks, and probably six thousand other corporations, which by special privileges and perpetuities, now engross the circulating medium and much more of the property, the business and the welfare of the whole country. Even if the supreme court had by any one or more of its judgments countenanced this deprivation, it would not be unreasonable to expect a reconsideration of it. As far as the direct question of bank charters is concerned, the supreme court has never passed upon it; and we are at liberty to discuss it free from the weight of their authority.—That court it is submitted, will give to one clause of the ninth section of the first article of the constitution, much less, and to another clause of that section much more meaning, than its framers contemplated, if they restrict the prohibition of ex post facto laws to those concerning crimes only, and if they extend that against laws impairing the obligation of contracts to bank charters. The first lets loose all the mischiefs of retroactive legislation, which the federal constitution interdicts. The last withdraws from state sovereignty power indispensable to its well being. The country would be subjugated by bank corporations, instead of being governed by states. By construing laws to be contracts within the latter prohibition, the supreme court brought themselves to irreconcilable conflict of opinion, leaving the country at large, in what an ancient writer justly calls that wretched servitude which is caused by vagueness and uncertainty of law. That elevated tribunal for its own sake, especially the surviving judges who were parties to a conflict of construction so deplorable in its effects, must desire to review the clauses in question, and give them altogether an interpretation at once conservative of the private rights of men, the sovereign rights of states, and the duration of the federal constitution.

Nothing is more unsatisfactory than the construction of constitutions by the literal meaning of words. It is a rule of municipal law that written instruments should speak for themselves, without explanation from witnesses. But it is a principle of politics that cotemporaneous commentary or historical recollection is of more reliance than literal interpretation. By this better light, we are informed and well assured that the constitutional provision concerning the obligation of contracts means nothing more than to protect private rights and personal interests; contracts of property, not grants of privilege; private grants, not incorporeal hereditaments and perpetuities. Mr. Luther Martin, in his report to the legislature of Maryland says so expressly—he had no idea of any other state law than such as interfere between private debtors and private creditors. Mr. Madison, in his luminous vindication of the clause in question in the federalist as expressly confines it to personal security and private rights: not only so, but he as obviously excludes from it all incorporated privileges and special immunity. He calls the clause a constitutional bulwark against legislative interference in cases affecting personal rights, against such legislation as becomes jobs in the hands of influential and enterprising speculators, snares to the more industrious and less informed. The object was, he says, such a thorough reform as would banish speculation in public measures, inspire general prudence and industry, and give a regular course to the business of society.—What was this business of society? Not banking. What were prudence and industry to be exercised in or upon? Not corporations. What was the mischief to be remedied by this salutary provision as Mr. Madison understood and recommended it?—The jobs of influential and enterprising speculators. His uniform opposition to the whole credit and paper system is well known. It was this aversion which at last subdued his repugnance to the bank of the United States as unconstitutional, and prevailed on him to sanction it as indispensable to control the numerous state banks, which had usurped and contaminated the constitutional currency. The framers of the constitution never contemplated the case of state banks at all. Such institutions were not anticipated. It is well known that chief justice Marshall considered them repugnant to the constitution. One of his last judgments, that on the Missouri state certificates, assumes for its basis (and it was concurred in by a majority of the court) what judge Thompson says, "renders it difficult to escape the conclusion that all bank notes issued by a state, or under state authority, or permission, or bills of credit falling within the constitutional prohibition." In that case judge McLean likewise says, "If a state legislature pass an ex post facto law or law impairing the obligation of contracts, it remains a harmless enactment on the statute books, until it is brought to bear injuriously on individual rights." It was far from the anticipation of the constitution that innumerable banks could be held sacred from all state interference, as obligatory contracts to be upheld by the judiciary in perpetual, irresponsible and intangible succession. Such a result is not only not countenanced by the clause against laws impairing the obligation of contracts, but the philosophy of the whole section of the same article contradicts it. Mr. Madison could never have denounced laws, regulating the issues, the by laws, and the business generally of banks as contrary to the first principles of the social compact and to every principle of social legislation. The letter of the convention to the states recommends the constitution to their adoption as leaving to each of the states all rights of independent sovereignty.—What shall we say of Mr. Madison's eloquent and prophetic denunciation, on the same page of the Federalist, against "the pestilent effects of paper money on the industry and morals of the people, and on the character of republican government, constituting an enormous debt against the states, or rather an accumulation of guilt, to be expiated no otherwise than by a voluntary sacrifice on the altar of justice of the power which has been the instrument of it."—if the same great prophet is to be made one of those short-sighted lawgivers who by the next clause concerning contracts has perpetuated the very power of pestilent evils they were so anxiously guarding against, and offering up a solemn sacrifice to atone on the altar of justice for their accumulated guilt. The construction which makes contracts of bank charters breaks this altar of justice, protects the guilty and perpetuates the pestilent effects of paper money which the constitution was to have sacrificed. The constitution never intended to make a contract of every state bank charter.

The last clause in the same article forbids the states to grant titles of nobility, as another article lays congress too under the same interdict. Construe this clause literally as the word contract is construed in the adjoining clause; and the consequence is inevitable that both congress and the several states may confer all the privileges and immunities, the entails and promogeniture; in short, perpetuate all the evils of nobility; provided that in so doing they avoid the mere title. While no one will deny that the prohibition strikes at a thing, at a class of persons, at a privileged order, not at their denomination by a word; just as the word contract designs to protect those personal rights and that private property which form its common subjects, not to comprehend treaties, ordinances and acts of state; nor above all to vouchsafe special privileges, derogatory to common rights, and more inconsistent with free government than nobility itself. To raise bank charters into contracts intangible by state law, is at the same time to annihilate the state governments; reducing them below corporations; to deprive the federal government of its indisputable regulation of coin, and the value thereof; and to authorize a privileged order more inconsistent with our institutions than a titled nobility.

But now taking leave of the mere clause against laws impairing the obligation of contracts, and looking to the reason of things, I proceed to shew by other views of the subject, that the U. S. bank does not hold its charter by contract in the sense of that clause. Granting all that can be said for the Yazoo case, and the case of the Dartmouth college, and all the others before alluded to; and yielding to the obligations of contracts all that even the broadest or wildest construction of that phrase has ever dreamt of, there is an acknowledged and settled limit to corporate immunity, and an acknowledged pale of legislation, which all jurisprudence proclaims.—That limitation and authority pervade the cases determined by the supreme court of the U. States.—It is, that all public corporations, and such as partake of political power, are necessarily within the power of legislation. The bank of the U. States was adjudged by the supreme court of the United States to be constitutional solely on the ground of its being such, that is a public or political; as contradistinguished from private corporations. Such is the whole strain of the argument, and the very pedestal of the lofty decision against the law of Maryland taxing the branch. And when, some years afterward, the supreme court was prevailed upon to review that judgment, on the memorable occasion of the taxing law of Ohio, chief justice Marshall solemnly and earnestly in the name of the court denied that the bank was for the management of a private concern, or founded on a contract between individuals, having private trade and private profit for its great and principal object, as was asserted by the advocates of Ohio. The bank, said he, is not considered as a private corporation, but as a public corporation, created for public and national purposes. The mere business of banking, he adds, is in its own nature, a private business, and may be carried on by individuals or companies, having no political connexion with the government: but the bank is not such an individual or company. Strong, plain and decisive as this acknowledgment and decision are, they need no enforcement. Even without their high authority, however, as judgment, I should venture respectfully to submit as reason that banking institutions which make and regulate most of the circulating medium, must be public corporations and political institutions, amenable to law as such, to be dealt with for reasons of state, and subjected to general legislation.

But relieved from all occasion for further argument to this effect, I use the decisions of the supreme court of the United States in the two cases of Maryland and Ohio, as I did the Pennsylvania and English precedents of the bank of North America and the East India company, as conclusive far beyond any reasoning of mine.

Beside the distinction, therefore, between privilege and property, and the mere meaning of the terms obligation and contract, we are thus authorized by the highest judgment and plainest reason to consider the former bank of the United States a public agent of political organization, and not a mere private corporation; and the only corollary remaining is whether the bank of the United States as chartered by congress, and the United States bank as chartered by the legislature of Pennsylvania are one and the same; a proposition that answers itself. That bank of the United States is the present United States bank, rechartered for state purposes, as it was formerly for purposes of the United States; in more intimate political connexion with the state government; a public corporation, without which that government would be deranged in all its functions. The act of assembly of the 16th February, 1836, erects the present stockholders of the bank of the United States, to an amount not exceeding the present capital of the bank, into a corporation and body politic. The title of the act is an act to repeal certain tax laws, and to continue and extend the improvements of the state, by rail roads and canals, and to charter a state bank to be called the United States bank. The first section repeals those taxes; (then about to expire by limitation), other sections regulate the by laws and privileges of the bank; and others place the internal improvements and common schools of the state under its contributions for their support. Thus the bank has been made as it were the state itself. Its resources, territorial and intellectual amelioration, welfare, policy, power and existence are associated with the bank.

At the meeting of the stockholders on the 20th February, 1836, the reasons assigned by the president for accepting the new charter, were that the capital was all paid without the necessity of obtaining a new one; that bearing the same name, continuing in the same place, and with the same organization, it enjoys its established credit, as well as its old connexions abroad and at home, and inherits a circulation of twenty-two millions.

Thus the identity is indisputable: and it is difficult to conceive how such a political connexion between the commonwealth and a corporation, such a complete unity of interest, can be deemed a common contract which the state for thirty years is obliged not to affect by legislation without impairing the obligation. If so, the state in granting the bank charter has surrendered its own.

If the federal judiciary may bind the state irrevocably and immutably to such a contract, Pennsylvania is no longer a state. All the attributes of sovereignty are gone. The laws of the state are subject to the by laws of the bank; and whether a canal boat shall ply, or a child be educated, depends not on the resources or laws of the state, but on the income and dividends of the bank. If the bank should become insolvent, its assignees might still hold the state bound by the contract, even though the bank should be no longer able to continue the improvements and education of the state. If the stockholders, their successors or assigns, should dispose of the bank charter to citizens of other states, (as it is understood the United States bank have, since their late charter, purchased a bank in New Orleans) or to foreigners, the contract would even then, if it be such as is alleged, remain binding on the state. Though inhabitants of Europe, of Asia, or of Africa should become exclusive proprietors of the stock, if it be held by intangible contract with the state, the state could not meddle with it; and it is not a forced or extravagant fancy to imagine the United States at war with a nation owning the United States bank of Pennsylvania, and compelling the supreme court of the United States to annul a law of Pennsylvania resuming the charter. This distressing condition of the state is indeed more stringent than was imagined, till the publication before mentioned by the bank in the National Gazette of the 22d September last, which announces the fact, (otherwise incredible) that "official application was made by the legislature to the bank to know whether the stockholders would accept a charter from Pennsylvania; that the answer was, that it would be accepted on certain terms; and that the legislature and the governor accordingly passed a bill for rechartering the bank on payment of certain sums." The compact, therefore, which created this union of bank and state was, it seems, solicited by the state as its resource for taxes to be repealed, roads and canals to be made, and schools to be founded. Without expressing any opinion on the policy of such arrangements, it is plain that the state has power to change them as its exigencies may require, or it has no power at all. If the old bank of the United States was a public agent, the new bank is more—it is a public succedaneum. It is not merely currency that is supplied and regulated, but state income and support. It is, I repeat, the state itself. An English statesman called the finances of England, the state of England, as an absolute monarch of France said, that he, the king, was the state. The bank must be within the political power of the state, or the state within the fiscal power of the bank from their intimate relations. It falls therefore directly within the only principle on which the federal judiciary sustained the bank of the United States; and is a stronger instance of that principle.

In the case of the Planter's bank of Georgia, chief justice Marshall considers the case of a state stockholder in a bank, and says that when a government becomes a partner in a trading company, it divests itself, as far as concerns the transactions of the company, of its sovereign character, and takes that of a private citizen. But this principle does not affect that we are considering, of a state in political, no pecuniary connexion with a bank.

A South Carolina court has determined that a debt due to the bank of South Carolina, which is owned entirely by the state, is not a debt entitled to state priority of payment; and a North Carolina court has determined that the state bank of North Carolina cannot give its books in evidence, to prove an overdraft by one of its debtors, because the bank, as the chief justice said, is only a private corporation. But these peculiar adjudications, confined to the local laws of public priority and the rules of evidence, are distinguishable from the doctrine of the supreme court of the United States, that a bank which aids the treasury, and furnishes the circulation of a government, is a public institution. It would be inconvenient to allow banks priority as public creditors, in the payment of debts, or to declare their books equal to public records as matters of evidence. But it by no means follows from such premises, that they are private corporations, on the ground of contract for all the purposes of the constitutional protection of contracts from posterior legislation.

An American Law Treatise on Corporations, divides them into public and private; and classes banks as of the latter denomination. But this is without reference to the question we are considering, and without reference to any authority for it, but such as also does not regard that question. In the Dartmouth college case, the great question was, whether a college is a private or public corporation. The decision was, that by private foundation, public charities become private, though incorporated. Insurance companies, canal, bridge and turnpike companies are supposed to be also private. But political corporations, for the government of towns, counties, &c. though involving private interests, are allowed to be public institutions, of which government preserves the regulation.—The civil code of Louisiana, divides all corporations into political and private, and defines the former to be those which have principally for their object the administration of a portion of the state, and to whom a part of the power of government is delegated to that effect, which is nearly if not exactly the relation between the United States bank and the state of Pennsylvania.

Thus my endeavor is accomplished to shew that all sovereignties have the right to resume charters for reasons of state; that it is a right which the state of Pennsylvania exercised in the instance of the bank of North America, before it yielded by the present federal constitution, some part of its sovereignty; and that in the only clause of that constitution which can be appealed to, there is no surrender of the state sovereignty over bank charters: while in cotemporary understanding, subsequent events, and the reason of things, there is conclusive evidence that this power remains with the state.

Other reasons of a more abstract character might be added, though I trust the foregoing does not need corroboration. In the Georgia case so often alluded to, chief justice Marshall says: It may well be doubted whether the nature of society and government does not prescribe the limits to the legislative power; and it is the peculiar province of the legislature to prescribe general rules for government. May we not then seriously doubt the authority of any legislature to devolve upon twenty private assignees for thirty years the great public trusts, annually recurring, of supplying the income, supporting the schools and furthering the internal improvements of the state?

Are these duties which those annually elected by the people and annually accountable to them, can devolve upon others not elected by the people, and not accountable to them? Furthermore, when such profound investigators of the principles of free government as Locke and Jefferson doubt the power of one legislature to bind another at all, may it not be questioned whether any legislatures are under the obligation of contracts but such as make them? If the highways, the navigable rivers, and the currency of states may be sold or transferred by their public agents by contract to private assignees, which contracts bind generations, there is no occasion for elective or legislative government at all, but all its functions may be made over to a few individuals.

By the report of the secretary of the treasury of the 5th January last, there were five hundred and fifty-eight banks in the United States reported, since when the bank of the United States and many more have been erected. Thus, there must be now several thousand bank stockholders, privileged by special exemptions from the course of law; whose directors, by charter in effect perpetual, change the standard and value, and tax all property, the exclusive emolument of this privileged order. Mr. Jefferson said of this state of things, before it was aggravated as it is that "the bank mania is one of the most threatening of our false imitations of England. It is raising up a moneyed aristocracy in our country, which has already set the government at defiance; and although forced to yield a little on the first essay of their strength, their principles are unyielded and unyielding. They have taken deep root in the hearts of that class from which our legislators are drawn, and the sop to Cerebus from fable has become history. Their principles take hold of the good, their pelf of the bad, and thus those whom the constitution has placed as guard to its portals, are sophisticated or suborned from their duties. That paper money has some advantage must be admitted: but its abuses are also inveterate: and that it, by breaking up the measure of value, makes a lottery of all private property, cannot be denied. Shall we ever be able to put a constitutional veto upon it?" A distinguished member elect of the convention to improve the constitution of Pennsylvania, judge Hopkinson, declared in his place in congress that he considered "the litter of banks lately created in Pennsylvania as the offspring of private legislation and legislative fraud." Those were the banks which governor Snyder tried to prevent by the veto. Governor Wolf recently applied that check to other banks. Governor Ritner tried it also, but in vain; and in his inaugural address he likewise denounced our banking as a fraud. Should frauds be contracts protected by the judiciary from legislative interference?

Gambling in bank stocks, and others of which they are the stimulants, is now the most pernicious offence in the catalogue of vice and immorality.—Stocks are gambler's dice, and legislators the journeymen who make them. Five thousand of them are annually engaged in their fabrication. Enterprising and influential speculators, branded by Mr. Madison, have increased in numbers and boldness far beyond those he reprobated. Fortified by charters, they are the outlaw barons of the day; with numerous united, well informed, and unscrupulous retainers; often, as Mr. Jefferson says, the makers and interpreters of laws, and the regulators of public opinion. They stigmatize those who question their dominion, as jacobins, levellers, agrarians, radicals and revolutionists. They maintain public journals; they publish learned treatises, to suit their purposes, on law, currency and political economy. They have foreign correspondents who reverberate their abuses from abroad. They venture to disgrace whoever exposes their ravages on property, as piratical invaders of its vested rights. They claim the American prodigies of liberty and industry, as productions of paper money, corporate privileges and licentious speculation; and they find dupes enough to believe them. Poor and inconsiderable as this speculating and privileged class is compared with the mass of the community, they have in privileges and special immunities, levers that move the world.

To extinguish such privileges cannot divest vested rights or right of any kind: nor should securing property from such depredations on it, be regarded otherwise than with satisfaction by all those who are anxious for the security of property. Those sober people before characterized by Mr. Madison as weary of jobs and speculations, together with all men of property, must see that it is their interest. Every industrious man is a man of property, whose five pounds, as was well said by Mr. Findley, in the debate on the bank of North America, are as important to him, as a rich man's hundred thousand pounds to him. The working men of the towns, whose much abused Trades Unions are but struggles forced upon them, to rescue property from privilege, and wages, fuel, and subsistence from paper money; and the rural population, that mass and majesty of yeomen, whose property is worth ten thousand times that of all the rich, the speculating, and the influential put together, the whole producing class, with even most of the consuming, must be convinced, that divested of prejudice and mystification, it is the interest of all to disfranchise a few of the monstrous and intolerable power by law, to unsettle the standard of value, and speculate on prices at their secret and selfish will. No part of the community has any social or political right whatever to such monopoly. A Baltimore mob destroyed the dwellings of those accused of abusing it, and other such outrages may be expected if it is not abolished; for a nation born of a Boston riot, will be always apt to resent by revolutionary energy oppressive privilege sanctioned by law. But legislative justice will prove a security against popular tumult, as the abolition of privilege is the best guarantee of property.

Nor perhaps would its extinguishment be so injurious to the disfranchised themselves, as their clamorous retainers cause the timorous and unthinking to apprehend. Monopolies and privileges are held by the invidious and costly tenure of perpetual resistance to the constant efforts of the mass to recover their rights; and those who from habit deem them indispensable to their emoluments would find that private, unchartered and responsible associations, are their gain as well as that of all the rest. The significant publication by the bank in the National Gazette of the 23d September last, puts this strikingly by the avowal that its charter "adds not a dollar of advantage to the capital any more than the mere piece of tape which is used to tie up a bundle of notes, gives value to the notes." While the country was in its infancy and poor, it was perhaps politic to compromise with corporations as the means of creating capital, though even this is very questionable, and there is now no reason nor any excuse for them.

It will be a great and an easy reform which restores to the people their equality, to the states their sovereignty, and to the union its supremacy over coin and currency. The federal government has done much towards this restoration. But the states can do still more. While a large body of most intelligent citizens has been deriding the attempt to restore hard money as absurd and impracticable, it is already half done—there is twice as much of it now in the United States as there was when the derided attempt began. Establish gold as the invariable standard of value for the wages of the wonder working industry, and for the prices of the immense productions of this enterprising country, and the incredible prosperity of the past will be transcended by that of the future, relieved from the shocking vicissitudes and depreciation of our monetary system.

It so happens that the party which claims to be most careful of vested rights has cast on the common people the guardianship of property in this banking strife. It has been a curious spectacle for the last few years to the calm observer to see the men of property as they are called, endeavoring to dislodge a chief magistrate, contending as strenuously and successfully for property as he ever did as a soldier for victory. His successor by his letter to Mr. Williams of Kentucky, a paper which would do honor to Mr. Madison, has proved his adhesion to a cause which has become the great desideratum of the American government.

Having thus, gentlemen, at too great length, discussed one of the subjects of which you have done me the honor to ask my views, I beg leave to reserve the powers of the convention for another letter.

Remaining, very respectfully, your humble serv't.
C. J. INGERSOLL.

LETTER FROM GENERAL TALLMAGE.

The following letter from our respected townsman, general Tallmage, president of the American institute was received here, says the New York Gazette, a few days previous to his return from Europe. It is dated at St. Petersburg, August 18th, 1836—

"I wrote to you about two weeks since, and sent a communication from Mr. Clay in relation to the indigo plant from Tiflis. He obtained from a president of a society, a small quantity of the seed, and I sent to Moscow for more, but without success.

"The city of Moscow is a place of great interest, combining events of antiquity with those of modern times, and exhibiting many of the peculiarities of an Asiatic city. For the first time I there attended a Tartar church, and witnessed the ceremonies, and the language of the Mahomedan worship. The congregation was collected by a loud howling call of a person from a minaret of the church, and not by the ringing of any bell. The ladies of my party were not only permitted to remain with me as spectators, but the principal minister proffered us a seat upon the steps used to light the candles, while every other person in the house was either prostrate or seated cross legged on the open floor in the full observance of their devotion. Their habits and religion admit not of the presence of any of their own females, nor recognize them as accountable beings, to whom the door of salvation can be open. The Greek church is the established religion of Russia, and while it has many peculiarities, it has many resemblances to the Catholic church. Their places of worship are more numerous than any other sect, and peculiar, in having from three to ten steeples or domes on every church. Moscow is indeed remarkable for its numerous churches. Its profile view presents a forest of spires, domes and steeples. Many of them are literally filled with bells, but, unlike ours, and of various sizes and tones, they are suspended, immovable, and the skillful bell-ringer with cords to the various hammers, produces the ringing, and works out their delightful chimes. The size, tone, variety and perfection of the bells surpass expectation. The great bell of Moscow, so famed in history, and which has lain buried in the ground for more than one hundred years has been recently dug out and raised. Its height and diameter is about 20 feet, and its weight is above 200 tons.

"The Kremlin yet stands the monument of ages; and those parts of the palaces of the Czars which have withstood the buffeting of time, and survived the wreck of wars, are there to bear witness of by-gone days. Moscow, like the phoenix, has risen from her ashes, renovated and improved. Her wounds are healed, and her scars are scarcely visible. Her population has returned, and with an energy and enterprise, which promise improvement in her condition. She is fast advancing in manufactures—has many factories of silk and cotton, and several others are now in progress of erection. I saw at Moscow and on my return met on their way there, many bales of New Orleans cotton—this commerce will be much increased in a very few years.

"There is throughout Russia a growing attention to manufactures, and they have the full encouragement of the government. This is a matter of some irritation to our English friends, who are kindly supplying them fabrics to supersede home productions, and with books and essays on free trade, to convince them of their errors against their own interests. It is, however, made evidence of patriotism in the nobility and men of fortune, to embark in manufactures; many establishments, and especially of cotton, are springing up in various places. The production of iron and duck has the vantage ground; but it is pleasing to view the various other manufactures in their infant condition, struggling into prosperity, and in so many respects resembling the condition of our own country, a few years ago, when in "the golden days of her commercial prosperity," less amount of bread stuffs passed from our city out of the Hook, than has since turned eastward to the market furnished by the manufactories of New England—and before the New York canals had proved a nursery for our seamen, by opening Albany as a new and better market to our fisheries than I believe any other place in the world.

"The government has various extensive manufactories at Alexandrofsky, a few miles from St. Petersburg, where machinery is also made. The superintendent informed me that they could not supply one-quarter of the cotton machinery ordered, and they are obliged to look to England for machinery for several cotton factories now erecting. It has often been asked of me, how and where we obtained our machinery in America? and it was a matter of surprise when I answered, that we made them in America: and that I believed we could furnish them in Russia as good and as cheap, and with the most modern improvements, as they could be obtained from England; and without the added costs of about 40 per cent. for getting them out of England. The English law against the exportation of machinery, being undoubtedly intended for the good of other people, and only to prevent their injuring themselves with the use of improper instruments, before being sufficiently instructed by the books sent them in favor of a "free trade." This subject is worthy the attention of our machinists, and of great interest to our commerce.

"It may with propriety be remarked, that the head man of one of the principal machine establishments in Manchester, and perhaps the greatest in the world, is an American, and I believe from Providence. The principal manufacturer employed by the king of Prussia, is from Baltimore. No person in Europe can shut his eyes to the fact, that measures are pursued for the improvement of the internal condition of the different kingdoms by the encouragement of domestic productions, especially in manufactures, and particularly by Russia, Prussia and France, and recently by the Germanic commercial union—less violent, but becoming more effective than the memorable continental system of Napoleon. The agriculture, commerce and manufactures of America, have a deep interest in the present and coming state of things in Europe.

"The public buildings of Russia are fine, spacious and imposing, but to me do not seem to present any particular subjects of architectural study. The Isaacs church at St. Petersburg, is colossal in its dimensions, and in the size of its materials, and is surpassed by few modern buildings in Europe. It is surrounded by granite columns, seven feet in diameter at the top, eight feet at base and fifty-six feet shaft, with bronze Corinthian capitals finely executed; and as a whole it is very imposing but I think there are too many columns; and they appear crowded. The Kazam church is a noble edifice. There are the monuments of Suvaroff and Katusoff, so well known to our day and the pages of history. In this church, as in several others, are hung, upon the walls, the keys of the cities captured in the course of their many wars; and their domes and walls are festooned with the flags of their conquered enemies. This custom is carried so far that some of their churches appear almost like a magazine of military trophies.

"The Russian common people have a curious custom of holding an anniversary in their burial grounds, by a collation to the memory, and on the graves of their deceased friends; but it sometimes degenerates into excesses and irregularities.

"At the Pra Bragenski church, (a spacious and beautiful building), we saw exhibited by the chief priest, the ceremony of annual offering, of flowers and fruits, upon a richly gilded altar, as a propitiation to the harvest and the season. The emperor and empress attended on behalf of their subjects, attired in costly dresses. Female train bearers bore up her robes, and they passed through the many thousands pressing to witness the ceremony. One of the churches is surrounded with a fence made of captured cannon—the larger ones serving as the principal posts. At the Kazam church is shown the spy glass of marshal Davoust left behind in the flight of the French army. At the Kremlin rest, in marshaled order, and open to public view, several hundred cannons, the captured trophies of that memorable and mad campaign—and at the palace of Czarka-selo is shown to favored visitors, the portfolio, maps, plans, &c. and the camp table furniture of Napoleon, left by him at Moscow in his precipitate flight from winter and the Cossacks.

"The ancient crown, jewels, furniture and apparel of the czars are curious and incomparably rich in gold and precious stones. The many presents from Asiatic princes are rich, unique and grotesque. The cabinets of minerals are rare and extensive, and among them is a magnet holding in suspension an anchor of iron weighing more than two hundred pounds. The armory exhibits every variety of ancient warlike instruments, especially of eastern peculiarity, from the simple bow and arrow to the cannon made to discharge stone balls, with a calibre equal to receive a small barrel.

"Our visit to Russia has been one of much gratification and delight. We have been received with kindness and entertained with generous hospitality, and have had many demonstrations of friendly feelings towards our country. The fete given on the birth day of the empress was beautiful and splendid. The pass-times of the day, and the court dinner and supper had much of interest. The palace and gardens at Peterhoff are modeled somewhat after those of Versailles. The gardens are as extensive, the fountains much more abundant, and the water works more bold, and quite as beautiful. The illuminations, arches and transparencies, were full, high, rich and brilliant—and the trellised avenue—said to be more than three miles in extent—spangled with lights, and mingling their reflections with the flowers, shrubbery, trees and water works, presented a fairy scene imposing and beautiful beyond description. One or two hundred thousand spectators thronged the busy scene, enlivened and animated by bands of music: trumpets proclaimed the coming host, when the emperor with his family, the ladies and attendants of the court, and the invited guests, seated upon low carriages, open like double sofas, rode through the assembled multitude, passing in procession the lighted cascades, the arches and illuminated avenues. The fete continued the two succeeding days, for the court and guests, who were entertained with amusements, feasting, balls and unrestrained social intercourse with the emperor and family. Then followed a review of the fleet in the Finland bay, exhibiting sixty-eight vessels of war, of which twenty-eight were ships of the line, including several of one hundred guns each—they appeared in good condition, manned and well found, and successively fired their salutes, in good order, as the steamboats with the company passed by.

"Russia abounds with more palaces than any other country I have seen; perhaps in some instances they are less perfect, as specimens of the arts, but quite as extensive and well adapted to their intended purposes. Many of them are rich in the interior, even to excess, and so as to become tawdry; and all of them are supplied with extensive grounds and gardens, laid out with modern taste.

"The palace and rooms in which the empress Catharine was entertained by her favorite prince Potemkin, and which is so pleasingly described, I believe in some of our annuals, is yet with the fixtures, in preservation and beauty.

"The fete at Peterhoff was but the beginning of the court recreations at the numerous summer palaces. Remaining but a few days at each, the court removing from place to place; enlivened by theatres, balls and every variety of amusements. Military spectacles, of great interest, were often exhibited, and with every variety of troops. Specimens of Cossack skill, as riding and firing, when in full speed were displayed. One day 50,000 troops in equal divisions exhibited, save the use of balls, all the action and varied incidents of actual battle. On another a pursuing army of 20,000, with their baggage train, passed in view, and crossed a river on a bridge of boats, made in less than one hour, and under the resisting fire of a fleeing enemy. The military spectacle closed with a review and inspection, in one collected mass of 80,000 men, of every variety of equipments, and every peculiarity of costume, and with all the implements and baggage train necessary for actual service. Extensive and brilliant fire-works ended this part of the display. Well trained horses were provided for the gentlemen visitors, who, thus mounted, were permitted to accompany the emperor, surrounded with his staff.

"The emperor had several exchange horses ready on the field, upon which he moved with unequalled activity and was every where at the crisis; while his visitors, hurrying onward often came up behind the occasion; indeed it was sufficient occupation for most of them to keep out of the way of the moving columns. The place of a spectator was no sinecure upon a battle ground, embracing an area of many miles in its varied and rapid movements. The empress, sometimes on horseback, but usually in her carriage, and with a few invited ladies, passed among the battalions, witnessing and animating the busy scene, and occasionally resting at head-quarters under the imperial banners.

"The emperor is the soul and spirit of this moving mass. He is forty years of age, and as we say, "above six feet, and well proportioned." He seems to have been chosen from the fifty-two millions of his own subjects, if not from the whole of collected Europe, as a specimen man. He mingles unreservedly among his people, and is always to be distinguished by a deferential opening in the crowd wherever he stands or moves. He is diligent and untiring in his attention to the concerns of his empire; liberal in his policies, but cautious in making innovations in established usages. With a firm constitution, a cultivated and vigorous intellect, he is kind in his manners and free in conversation; and is exempt from those conceits which would hinder his frequent and pertinent enquiries concerning the interests, habits, usages and ideas of other nations and countries. The empress is the daughter of the king of Prussia, so advantageously known as the founder of the most perfect system of free schools in the world—and which we have republished and adopted in our country with such just commendation. She has all the benevolence of character which might be expected from such a parentage, and, in the language of Byron, "she is one made up of feminine attractions"—rigid in the etiquette of her court, yet she has a rare gift, and willing disposition to put those around her at ease, and make them happy. They are blessed with a fine family of promising children. Distinguished for their private worth, and estimable in any condition of society, the most interesting part of the imperial spectacle was the pleasing opportunity to observe the cordial intercourse of this family, and witness their private relations and domestic happiness.

"French is the prevailing language of the court while Russian, German and English are continually spoken, and well understood. The imperial family all speak with fluency and ease, these four languages.

"Inquiries are often made here after our American literature; they have the works of our Cooper and Irving; and showing by their side those of Hall and Trollope, they ask if some fair description of our country cannot be obtained for them?—adding, that as the English and French writers misrepresent them, they presume the same is done of us. What have we to send? Why sleep the graphic powers of our talented countrymen? A concise description of our country, its society and manners, its soil and its rivers, its agriculture, commerce and manufactures, canals, rail roads, internal improvements, naval architecture and steam power—and, contrasting its condition some twenty years ago with its present advance, especially in population, wealth, prosperity and power, and, above all, a country without a debt, and dividing its surplus revenue amongst its people—would reach stationary Europe, perhaps as a work of fiction, but, teaching by example, have an essential influence, and benefit our country, and profit the author, more than any other work that can be imagined. Europe is now seeking this information.

"Our commerce might be much increased with this country, where many kindnesses are proffered to Americans, and all the facilities afforded which are allowable, under the laws and usages of the government. The emperor has his attention pointed to the vexatious quarantine enacted at Elsinour, injurious alike to the commerce of America and Russia. There is cause to hope its removal, or, at least, its modification.

"I send this by the next post, and shall follow in a few days; and hope soon to be with you, and with my friends in my country, and at my home."

FOREIGN EXTRACTS.

The Courier Francais gives a letter of the 9th ult. from Athens, containing some particulars of the trial and condemnation of the journal the Sotir, and the events by which it was followed. According to the correspondent of the Courier, the responsible editor of the Sotir, assisted by his counsel, M. Skouffo, the principal editor of that journal, and another advocate, contested the competency of the president Enian, and a new judge, named Belieario. The tribunal, however, overruled the objections of the responsible editor, and moreover condemned him to a fine of 20 drachmas for having urged them. The observations of the accused parties were interrupted by the law officers of the crown, who declared that the ordinances already issued were irrevocable. The advocates of the responsible editor immediately retired, and the latter, having attempted to follow them, was arrested by order of the president. A riot then ensued amongst the auditory who, with loud cries of "Down with the oppressors!" proceeded to liberate the prisoners.—At half past eight in the evening the tribunal pronounced sentence, and immediately withdrew, amidst the hisses of the crowd. By the terms of the sentence, the responsible editor is condemned to a year's imprisonment and a fine of 200 drachmas, and M. Skouffo is suspended from the exercise of his profession as an advocate. Both have appealed against the sentence to the Areopagus; but M. d'Armanseperg, without awaiting the decision of the higher court, has suspended the publication of the Sotir. A subscription had been opened at Athens and elsewhere to discharge the amount of the fine, and it was expected that the journal would shortly reappear.

The Aulic chamber of Vienna has taken off several prohibitions, and reduced the duty upon several articles of importation. It has also suppressed the tax of ten per cent. hitherto required for permits for certain articles of merchandise, which previously could not be brought into the country for sale. For example, permits for the introduction of French wines were only granted to the higher dignitaries and opulent families for their own consumption. However, lately, several depots of French wines have been formed in the interior of Austria, and they are advertised to be sold, wholesale and retail. [Constitutionnel.]

A letter from St. Petersburg announces that the emperor was expected to return to that capital in the first week of the present month.

A mere bonfire! Doeff, in his "recollections of Japan," relates the particulars of a fire which raged twelve hours in the city of Jeddo, and which consumed all the houses, and every thing within the space of three leagues (nine miles) in length, and a mile and a half in breadth! Among the buildings destroyed, were fifty-seven palaces of princes; and there were 1,200 persons either burnt to death or drowned, among whom was the daughter of the prince of Awar. The young lady met this fate by the giving way of the Nipon Bas, a famous bridge in Jeddo, under the weight of the flying multitude. Thin walls of clay, timbers and partitions of deal, matted roofs, and roofs of shingle, sufficiently account for catastrophes which must far exceed in frequency and violence even those of New York or Constantinople. This fire was extinguished by rain.

A serious contest has arisen between the Ottoman porte and the representatives of France and England, not only upon the increase of the tax on the exportation of silk, but upon the principle which causes these constant exactions, and the effect they will produce upon European commerce in Turkey. It is well known that the chief of the customs, after prohibiting the colonial coffee, which is in such consumption in the east, has done the same by the Asia Minor silk, which is an article of even greater exportation than the former. The porte has been obliged to accede to both articles, but has not indemnified the merchants, who have experienced considerable loss by this event. The chief of the customs is nothing but an instrument. Whilst the French and English merchants were deprived of the purchase of these silks, considerable quantities were sent by the Russian ones to the manufactories of Moscow. By a manifest violation of all treaties, the increase of the exportation tax was not applied to them. At the very same time that the ambassadors were promised the redress of their wrongs, the custom houses of Scala Nova, Metelin and Trebisonde, were preventing the sailing of their vessels by new exactions. No commercial system can be founded upon a base which is both arbitrary and retroactive. It is to be hoped that the sultan will at length put an end to such proceedings. [Courrier Francais.]

Statistics. In the article "France," of the Dictionnaire Geographique Universel, now publishing in Paris, by a geographical society, the following statement is given of the capital of the French soil, and of the revenues of the empire. The arable lands are worth 13,890,800,000 francs; the woods, vineyards, meadows and other lands, 2,828,800,000; ponds and marshes, 31,920,000; rustic buildings, 3,000,000,000; cattle, valued at the lowest price, 16,708,941,676; poultry, 51,600,000 head, at 1 franc, 51,600,000; swine, 3,900,000 head, at 40 francs, 156,000,000; asses, 2,400,000 head, at 25 francs, 60,000,000; farming utensils, 3,000,000,000; total, 39,522,061,676 francs. To this may be added the annual receipt from manufactures, 1,820,102,000; agriculture, 4,678,708,000; colonies, 40,880,000; foreign countries, 346,020,000; in warehouse, 52,000,000; total, 6,937,210,000 francs. The produce of the taxes of every class is 924,410,000 francs.

The following is a brief abstract of a report made on the various revolutionary societies of Switzerland, whose proceedings have led to the existing disputes between that country and France.—The associations were six in number—1. La Jeune Europe; 2. La Jeune Pologne; 3. La Jeune Italie; 4. La Jeune France; 5. La Jeune Allemagne; 6. La Jeune Suisse. La Jeune Europe was founded by Mazzini, in April, 1834. It concluded at Lausanne on the 10th of April, 1835, an alliance with the French republicans then confined at St. Pelagie.—On the 24th of January a treaty was concluded between it and the Carbonari of Corsica. La Jeune Pologne had a committee of horror, to which all persons not noble were obliged to yield a blind obedience. La Jeune Italie had correspondence with secret societies in Paris and London, the object of which was to unite all Italy into one state. La Jeune Suisse was instituted in the spring of 1835, in consequence of the addresses published by La Jeune Europe. M. Drue was president of the association, and drew up the statutes of the society. The plan extended to all the cantons; and general meetings of delegates were held who were in communication with La Jeune Europe. A correspondence was kept up between the whole of the societies and their agents in every country in Europe.

The Swiss Republican states, that the grand council of Zurich has transmitted some instructions to its extraordinary deputation on the course to be adopted by it during the extraordinary session of the diet convoked for the 17th instant. The deputation is required to vote in favor of the resolution of the diet in the affair of Conseil, at the same time offering to furnish every explanation to France as to the motives of its vote. Should difficulties arise the deputation is instructed to take part in the deliberations relating to the acceptance of the mediation of a foreign power between France and Switzerland. The deputation is invested with full powers, subject to the necessity of conforming to the letter and the spirit of the instructions above referred to, and is likewise authorised to take part in all deliberations and resolutions having for their object to maintain the independence and security of Switzerland. The Republican states, in conclusion, that a motion made in the grand council for reprisals against the blockade of France failed in obtaining a majority of votes.

A sketch of the military forces of Switzerland, given by the Journal des Travaux de la Societe Francaise de Statistique Universelle, shews that these forces consist of—1. The federal contingents, amounting to 72,000 men. 2. Cantonal reserves, organised federally, the number of which amounts to 120,000 men. 3. Ten thousand men of capitulated troops, who, in case of war, are to return to their country. In such case also, there must be further added to these, 202,000 soldiers, the men from 45 to 60 years of age, who, although gone out of the reserves, and exempt from service, would be ready to fight for the defence of their families and the maintenance of the national independence. The Swiss have no cavalry, because in their country it can be of no utility, but under the name of carbiniers they have excellent marksmen, being all chamois hunters, whom this sport renders extremely skilful in taking and hitting the mark.

ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

From the Providence Journal of Nov. 17.

SURPRISING PHENOMENA OF ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to communicate to the public, through your columns, some particulars of a wonderful case of magnetical somnambulism, which has occurred in the village of Pawtucket, under my own operation. I am going in the first place, to relate the bare facts, as they could be seen by every one present; I shall afterwards make a few remarks, to show the great philosophical importance of those facts.

The subject of these experiments is a young lady well known in this place, where she has been residing over ten years. There is but one opinion concerning her character: that she is surpassed by no one in purity of mind, disinterestedness, laborious habits, and religious disposition. But, alas! in this "valley of tears" and hard trials, called the earth, happiness is not frequently in proportion with virtue. Miss Cynthia Gleason has been for eight or nine years laboring under a complicated nervous and functional disease, which baffled all the skill of physicians. It would be too long, and perhaps insignificant, to describe here the various symptoms of this complaint. I will say only that, in consequence of it, the sleep of the patient had become difficult, short, very much troubled by pains, and always followed with a dullness of the mind and heaviness of the system, for several hours after awakening.

I need not say that I was a perfect stranger to Miss Gleason, and that she was, for her part, entirely ignorant even of the words animal magnetism, when she heard of it for the first time, by her attendant physician, the respectable Dr. Manchester, of Pawtucket. This gentleman proposed to her to try an experiment with the hope that she might receive some benefit from it. She very cheerfully agreed; and, in consequence, I was brought to her lodging, by Dr. Manchester, on Sunday, the 6th inst. at half past four o'clock in the afternoon. I must state here that I was very much pleased to find her perfectly calm and sober; I have acquired since the first visit the full conviction that she is one of those persons upon whom "imagination has very little empire." Miss Gleason told us, among other things, that she had not much faith in animal magnetism, and that she would "defy any person to put her to sleep in this manner." I observed to her that I did not think myself that I could put her to sleep at the first trial, as I intended to magnetize her only fifteen or twenty minutes, with the view of establishing a mere communication between us. Her pulse, taken by Dr. Manchester, gave eighty-four pulsations per minute before the operation. I commenced, and in the course of twenty-five minutes we perceived that her eyes grew dim and her lids fell heavily down—in thirty minutes she was profoundly asleep—pulse gave sixty-four pulsations. We tried her senses in every possible manner; nothing could disturb her; the sleep lasted half an hour; I caused it to cease by a few gestures with my hand at several inches distant from her face.

The next day I resorted again to the patient's house, at a quarter before four in the afternoon, together with Dr. Gardner and E. Walcott, esq.—Miss Gleason told us that she had slept very well all the night, and felt better than usual; the operation commenced at four o'clock, exactly; and, although the patient, according to her own avowal, tried to keep awake, she was fast asleep in ten minutes. On the next day the number of her attendants was still greater. Sleep was produced in seven and a half minutes; on Wednesday in six minutes the desired effect was obtained.

As the patient had already experienced some benefit by these operations, she manifested to us the desire of being magnetized once in public, in order, said she, to convince the unbelievers, and establish a truth so important to religion and the health of mankind. I must also state, as another proof of the qualities of her heart, that she took this resolution for my reputation's sake, viz: to prove that I was not an impostor, and that my labors really deserved more encouragement than I have hitherto obtained.

Therefore, having previously consulted all my friends about it, and received their unanimous approbation, I concluded to accept Miss Gleason's proposal. The intended experiment took place on Thursday last, at the Pawtucket hotel, before an audience of one hundred and seventy persons, comprising the medical faculty and a part of the clergy of the village.

I commenced operating at a quarter before eight o'clock. In the course of four minutes the patient shut her eyes; then I got up and suddenly thrust with my foot against the floor the chair upon which I was sitting; no sensible effect was produced by this noise. Finally, in five minutes, the lady appearing profoundly asleep; I left her, and commenced my lecture, which lasted nearly three-quarters of an hour, and was listened to with much interest.

Miss Gleason continued sleeping during that length of time. When the lecture was over, we resumed our experiments. We proceeded to ascertain whether the lady was really in the magnetic sleep. We pinched her, pricked her with a pin, tickled her lips, nostrils and eyelids with a bit of paper; no sensation was manifested. A gentleman put his mouth close to her ear, and asked her in a loud voice if she was not tired of sleeping, and wished to get up? She remained perfectly deaf to the sound of this loud voice; another man whistled in a most thrilling manner, and clapped his hands; but all the disturbance was without effect upon her. Hartsborn was held suddenly under her nose for some moments, and though she must have inspired the strong effluvia, no sign of unusual sensation was manifested. Several persons spoke to her in succession, and she took no notice of what they said. Then I stood at the distance of a few feet from her, and mentally requested her, without touching her, to give me her hand, and she immediately held out her hand towards mine. I wished her to leave my hand, and she did immediately. Some other individuals tried the same experiment, but without success. A handkerchief was put over her eyes; I stretched again my hand, and she gave me hers without hesitation. There could be no collusion here, because the bandage being fixed closely over her eyes effectually shut up every avenue to her mind, except that by which the mysterious magnetic sympathy is imparted. This last experiment was so fairly made, and so successful, that one of the medical gentlemen present, who had been incredulous until this moment, acknowledged that he was convinced. Then, after telling in a low voice to the ladies and gentlemen who were standing around her, that I was going to cause her, by my will, to open her lids without awakening her, I made a motion upwards with my fore-finger, at the distance of three inches from her face, and immediately we saw her open her lids to the utmost width; there she sat still, perfectly motionless, and gazing at me in the most intent manner. She looked exactly like a wax figure.

With the view of ascertaining whether she was still in the state of magnetic insensibility, I darted suddenly my fingers near to her eye-balls in rapid succession; yet she winked not, and appeared as insensible as a blind person. Rev. Mr. Taft, having noticed that her pupils were extremely dilated, suggested the idea of placing two blazing lamps before her eyes; so we did, and yet the sudden glare of light thus falling on the unprotected pupil was as ineffectual as so much light on the eyes of a corpse. I make a motion downwards with my hand, and the lids were closed again.

At my request, Edward Walcott, esq. asked the somnambulist to drink of water that he presented to her; even he put the tumbler to her lips, but she took no notice of it. I mentally asked her whether she wished for some water; she answered, in a tone audible to those who were around her, that she "did not feel thirsty." I mentally again urged her, to take some: then she opened her lips, grasped at the tumbler, and drank two or three swallows of the liquid.

And, after she had slept one hour and a half, I walked six or seven feet from her, and, by waving my arm once only, I awakened her immediately.—She awoke quite exhilarated, and to use her own words, "as bright as a dollar." She had no recollection of any one circumstance that had transpired.

Among the persons present, the following gentlemen are ready to certify for the truth of the above statement: rev. Mr. Taft, rev. Daniel Greene, rev. Thomas Worcester, of Bridgewater; Drs. Manchester, Gardner, Cleveland, Bucklin, of Valley Falls, Carpenter; Edward Walcott, John Street, Samuel Lord, esqrs.; George Crawford, superintendent of the Franklin Print works; Mr. Barshall, professor of the Hebrew, French and German languages at Brown university, &c. &c.

There will be, to-morrow, another communication on the same subject, containing the report of four professors of Brown university, and two other gentlemen.

EXPERIMENTS IN ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

MR. EDITOR: I announced on Thursday that the report of four professors of Brown university, and of some other gentlemen, should be published in the paper of Friday; but since we have consulted together, and concluded, after mature reflection, that it would be much better, in every respect, to attend a few experiments more, before presenting this document to the public, signed by every attendant, and followed with the due certificates. Of course, the report of three or four sittings will have more weight than one only. However, in order not to disappoint your readers, I am going to offer them, in my own name, a short narrative of the facts, as they took place on Tuesday evening last. This narration is made up chiefly with the notes taken by one of the professors during the sitting.

Were present at this sitting, and may be referred to for the truth of the following statement, rev. Dr. Wayland, president of Brown university; professors Caswell and Chace; Mr. Shepherd, a tutor in the college; rev. Edward B. Hall, Drs. Tobey, Manchester, &c. &c.

8h. 8m. Pulse full; 84 beats per minute.

8h. 9m.—I commenced magnetizing her by "willing simply," without resorting to the usual manipulations. I was sitting beside her, at two feet distance.

8h. 10m.—She nodded and looked drowsy.

8h. 11m.—Sound asleep; somebody clapped loudly his hands; another moved her in the chair; she did not awake.

8h. 11½m.—I then magnetized by the usual manipulations.

8h. 15m.—Pulse less full; beat about the same.

The patient was breathing calmly, and her eyes were perfectly shut, as in the natural sleep.

The experiments then commenced. We proceeded, in the first place, to ascertain the suspension of sensibility.

1. A large tavern bell was rung close to her ear; no perceptible change took place; loud shouting in her ears produced no more effect.

8h. 20m.—Respiration 32 per minute; hands colder, pulse 84.

2. A pistol was fired in the room, within five feet of her head; not the slightest change was manifested, whereas some other persons were obliged to leave the room, on account of the violent impression made upon their organ of hearing.

3. A bottle of ammoniacal gas was placed under her nose; respiration became quicker, and she appeared disturbed by it, yet there was no appearance of waking. I was then in the next room.

4. The nostrils were tickled with a feather; no change was perceptible.

8h. 30m.—Pulse 80; respiration 26; hands growing colder.

5. At the suggestion of Dr. Tobey, I caused her to open her lids, simply by moving upward my fore finger a few inches distant from her face. The pupils seemed to be as in the natural state. A lamp was brought suddenly before them, and produced no effect on the pupil, and apparently no sensation at all. I thrust violently my finger toward her eyeball; no perceptible change took place.

Other experiments and observations.

1. I whispered to the person standing next to me, in so low a tone that the sound of my voice could be heard by no other person in the room, that I would mentally ask her to give me her hand. Her eyes were exactly closed; I held my hand a short distance above hers; she immediately raised her hand and grasped mine.

2. Dr. Wayland wrote on a paper, "Tell her, mentally, to clasp her hand." I mentally put the question. She shook her head negatively, but said and did nothing. A few moments after I mentally put to her again the same question. She shook again her head negatively, but did not execute my will.

3. She then began to talk aloud, and told us an amusing anecdote concerning a man she had met in the street.

Professor Caswell. Where did you meet him? No answer.

Writer. Where did you meet him? Somewhere down the street.

Various other questions were put to her, but she would answer no other one than mine.

I mentally asked her where is Dr. Manchester? She answered, I should like to talk to Dr. Manchester about my stomach.

Dr. Manchester. How does it feel? No answer. Writer, (aloud). Do you hear Dr. Manchester? Yes.

Dr. Manchester. Do you feel bad? No answer. Writer, (aloud). Do you feel bad? Yes.

6. A paper was handed to me on which was written "lift up your right hand." Without a word being spoken, she immediately raised it at my mental request.

7. (I, aloud.) Do you see any people around you? No. Did any one come with me this morning? Three or four from Providence, (true).—Who were they? President Wayland, Dr. Tobey, professor Chace and some other.

8. Signs were made to me to tell her mentally to grasp my hand, and then on raising it for this purpose, when Dr. Wayland interposed his, she took no notice of it, but still moved hers towards mine, and moved it one side and the other as I moved mine. She finally grasped it. This was varied and repeated several times, and uniformly with the same result, although there was a large slate placed constantly before her face and chest, in order to prevent entirely the natural vision.

9. I asked, aloud, whether she should like to be magnetized? Yes. Having done so, I asked her if she recollected having replied to my request to magnetize her? She said no.

10. Dr. Wayland grasped her hand, and then by signs requested me to tell her mentally to take my own hand. She, immediately obeying my "wish," pulled her hand away from Dr. Wayland, and grasped at mine.

11. Then I whispered to professor Chace that I would make her give her hand and answer to Dr. Wayland. I wished her to do this, and immediately she grasped at Dr. Wayland's hand.

Dr. Wayland. (Aloud.) What was the weather this morning? Stormy—(true.) How is it now? Clear—(true.) When did it clear off? This afternoon—(true.) How many looms did you attend to to-day? Five—(true.)

12. A small tumbler of water was brought, and I asked her aloud if she would have some water.—She said yes; she took the tumbler, and, raising it to her mouth, drank some. Some chloric ether was then poured into the tumbler, which gave a strong taste to the liquid; she drank some of it, and having been asked by me what taste she found in it, she replied, "no other than that of water." During these experiments a handkerchief, folded several times, was kept over her eyes.

13. I then whispered that I would make her mistake the liquid for paregoric. I gave her again the tumbler; she drank, and I asked her what it was? She answered, "It tastes like wine."

14. Rev. E. B. Hall, sitting close to her, put several questions, to which she made no reply. At Mr. Hall's request, I wished her to hear him, and she answered him immediately. Dr. Tobey also spoke to her, and she made a reply which in all appearances was for the doctor's question. Somebody noticed that she had answered Dr. Tobey, although no communication had been established between him and her. Then I wished her to remain deaf to every voice but mine; and immediately she ceased to answer the questions made to her by the other gentlemen.

15. Dr. Wayland—"How many looms do you usually attend?" No answer. Dr. W. then made me signs to request her mentally to reply to him.—I signified that I had done so. Dr. W.—"How many looms do you usually attend?" "Three: sometimes four." Dr. W.—"You would not answer me before: why now?"—"Because Mr. Poyen told me to." Dr. W.—"Why do you take my hand?" "Because Mr. Poyen told me to." Dr. W.—"But you ought to obey me as well as him." She pulled away her hand, apparently in displeasure.

Nine o'clock, 25m. pulse 72.—The same experiment was tried by some other persons, and with the same results.

16. A slate was held between her eyes and me. Then I extended my foot—she raised hers until they met. Having made a sign that I would mentally tell her to withdraw it, she immediately did so. She would follow my foot with hers wherever I turned.

17. (I aloud.) "You have drunk some water, have you not?" "Yes." "Recollect that when I awake you." "Yes."

18. I retired the length of the room, and endeavored to wake her by simply willing it; in one minute I succeeded so far as to open her eyes, and give every appearance of waking. I then advanced, and by the usual manipulations immediately awoke her. Time, 9h. 38m.

19. "Do you recollect to have taken any thing?" "Yes, some water." "Any thing else?" "No."

When fully awake, she said she felt fatigued—she usually felt refreshed by the magnetic operation; was totally unconscious of every thing that occurred while asleep; did not know how long she had been asleep.

Her pulse was not taken after she awoke.

ANOTHER SNAKE STORY.

From the Wheeling Gazette.

About a fortnight ago, as the Mogul steamer, bound from New Orleans to St. Louis, was proceeding up the Mississippi, and had arrived in that part of the river directly opposite to the clids of Selma, an immense aquatic serpent was observed, at the distance of a quarter of a league, by several of the passengers, to direct its course towards the vessel with all that awkwardness of motion so peculiar to large unwieldy bodies, lifting at times a large portion of its enormous body above the surface of the water, and desirous, as it were, of taking an extensive view around and ascertaining the immediate cause of the agitation of its watery dominions.

As the vessel approached, straightway the lengthy monster of the deep began to distort its hideous and misshapen body into a variety of the most fantastic gyrations; at one time, darting impetuously forward its voluminous folds in a direct line towards the vessel with an undulatory motion, which excited in the minds of the female passengers, in particular, serious apprehensions for their immediate safety; at another, submerging its head and the anterior part of its squamous body in the surrounding element, and lashing it with inconceivable fury into a broad and whitening sheet of circumambient foam. My informant who happened to be a passenger on board, assured me that its total length must have been from seventy-five to eighty feet, and that the circumference of its body, which, in bulk, resembled that of an ordinary sized tree, could not have measured less than from 5 to 6 feet at least.

Alarm to a considerable extent pervaded the minds of many on board, lest in the event of its nearer approach, it might fling its prodigious folds across the boat, and thereby unfortunately consign all on board to a watery grave. The man at the helm was forthwith ordered to tack without delay, and steer as wide of it as present circumstances and the depth of the channel would permit; while the carpenter and some others of the boat's crew were ordered to be in immediate readiness, with axes and other instruments of destruction, in order to sever the monster's body, in case it should come unfortunately in contact with the vessel. Most happily, however, for the safety of all, no such necessity existed. At length, when the unwieldy animal, after repeated efforts, found itself incapable, by reason of its enormous length, of overtaking the boat—straightway it appeared to experience all the frightful agony of maddening disappointment and despair, writhing and distorting its squamous body into succession of the most marvellous and intricate convolutions, and rearing itself again into the attitude of some tall and stately pillar, at which time its resplendent hues, radiant as the rainbow, and beautifully diversified with alternate stripes of green and gold, and sundry linear variations of color, which, varying with every change of light, reflected a gleam of inconceivable lustre and beauty in the rays of the setting sun.

A gentleman on board, by the aid of a small microscope, was enabled to take an accurate observation of its body, and of its head, in particular, which, he remarks, from its extraordinary magnitude, and the singular elongation of its jaws, denoted the monster's uncommon capability of swallowing bodies of no ordinary dimensions. As the vessel gradually moved away, leaving the aquatic monster of the deep immeasurably behind—it then, for the last time seen by the passengers, appeared to be stationary, with its body reared aloft in the attitude of a colossal arch, its head and tail, appearing in the distance, to rest only upon the waters. Whether this animal, so extraordinary in its size, and apparently ferocious in its nature, is, according to the classification of fishes by Linneus, to be ranked among the larger species of sea serpents, or not, I leave to others, at present, better acquainted with the subject to determine.

Since writing the above, I have been informed by a gentleman of a similar one seen by him a few years ago, while travelling up the Missouri river.—Whether these animals are indigenous with these waters, or have originally come from the sea hither, indeed I conceive form a fit and interesting subject of inquiry for the naturalist. Should the above prove in any wise interesting to your very intelligent readers, it will afford gratification to

FOREIGN CHRONICLE.

The sultan Mahmoud is virtually half a Christian. It may not be generally known that his mother was a French lady of Martinique who was captured by Barbary corsairs on her passage to France, and by a vagary of fortune ultimately installed in the seraglio of the then sultan as the favorite sultana. From her Mahmoud has inherited his good sense, his chivalrous courtesy and his liberal principles.

The English language. Ascham, in the epistle prefixed to his "Toxophilus," 1571, observes that "Mayne Englishe writers usinge straunge wordes as Lattine, Frenche and Italian, do make al things darke and harde. Ones," says he, "I communed with a man which reasoned the Englishe tongue to be enriched and encreased thereby, sayinge: 'Who will not prayse that feast, where a man shall drinke at a dinner both wyne, ale and beere?' Truly (quoth I) they be al good every one taken by itselfe alone; but if you put malmesye and sack, redde wyne, and shall make a drinke neither easye to be knowen nor holson for the bodye."

A good fat fee. The Agra Ukhar of May 21 says that the rajah of Lahore had lately dismissed his English surgeon, Dr. Harland, for refusing to relieve his highness of a paralytic affection of the face, unless he was first paid a lak of rupees as a fee. A lak is equivalent, we believe, to some thousands of dollars.

Lord Brougham. A dinner is to be given to lord Brougham at Edinburgh, a mode of doing him honor which is not much relished by certain of his own party. The Examiner says:

"When Brummell quarrelled with the prince regent, he said, 'Egad, I'll punish the shabby dog; I'll bring the old king into fashion.' In like manner some radical, hostile to the ministry, proposes to punish it by bringing lord Brougham into fashion. They are dragging him out like a piece of furniture drawn from a lumber-room, and scouring and furnishing and rubbing up the varnish, and vamping and coaxing together broken joints, and trying to persuade themselves that it is, after all, a very handsome article, which will serve its turn vastly well if it be not looked at too closely."

The sister of Miss Penelope Smyth (princess of Capua) has just been married to a nobleman of Naples.

Two splendid English carriages, the ornaments of solid silver, are to be shipped to Rio for the coronation of the juvenile emperor.

Hoxne church, Suffolk, which is the oldest erected by the East Angles, has lately received the donation of a superb organ from gen. Kerrison.

Shooting parsons. In the published list of game certificates for the county of Derby we observe 22 names with REVEREND attached to them; and in the Yorkshire list there are 91.

The Austrian government, after its disgraceful cruelties to the Lombards, has granted an amnesty to 54 persons banished thence since 1822, for political delinquencies.

In order to accelerate the completion of the Greenwich railway which is raised on iron columns over the road, 5 to 600 men have been employed upon it night and day.

The 48th or Northamptonshire regiment, which gallantly turned the disasters of Talavera after the rashness of the guards, is stationed at Manchester, after 18 years absence in India.

The amount of water cresses daily consumed in Paris and which are gathered chiefly about Chantilly, is computed at £250.

When queen Anne, wishing to compliment Dr. South upon one of his sermons, observed that it was too short, he made the since famous reply that he would have made it shorter if he had had more time. Would that modern speakers and writers would employ a little more frequently of this meliorating process! For, in truth, "a crude abundance is the disease of our American style." Bulk, rather than quality, seems to be the measure of value, and our writers naturally enough study addition, rather than subtraction.

The wooden walls of Old England are to be built of French oak; 300 loads of which, that had been floating down the Loire from Brittany, have reached the Portsmouth dock yard. This is capturing French naval timber sooner than lord Nelson did it.

A hoax. A Paris letter writer says—"A hoax was practised on the academy of sciences, at its last meeting on Monday. An unknown individual ushered in, while the academy was sitting, a fellow dressed as a South Sea Islander, whom he represented as a native of Polynesia. The latter performed his part remarkably well, remained standing in the centre of the hall, staring wildly at those around him, and even showed several parts of his body that had been tattooed. He of course attracted much curiosity; but what was the disappointment of the assembly when M. Geoffroy de St. Hilaire announced that the savage was an European sailor."

Turkey. It is said that the Russians have played sultan Mahmoud a shabby trick in restoring to him his fortress of Silistria in a very dilapidated condition, and stripped of every gun that was good for any thing. The insurrection in Bosnia has been completely put down.

Madame Malibran denied on her death bed that she had ever been addicted to intemperance. A friend of hers for many years, sir George Smart, corroborates this denial, in the most explicit terms. The excitement incident to performances such as hers might well be mistaken for intoxication.

A colossal statue to Shakspeare is to be erected in London, designed by doctor Carque. It is to be raised on an elevation of 200 feet above the level of the Thames. The pedestal is to be 50 feet, and the statue 80 feet high. This is a larger statue than was ever erected to any individual. The cost to be £20,000. The king and queen had consented to be the patron and patroness of the project.

The tomb of OFFA has lately been discovered in digging a vault in the church of Ifamel. The coffin was stuck about four feet beneath the surface, and taken up entire. An inscription was discovered on the coffin, proving the remains to be those of OFFA, the celebrated king of the Mereians, who built the Abbey of St. Albans and who died in the eighth century. The coffin is said to be a very curious piece of workmanship.

Stealing dogs' tails. The singular bounty offered in Sydney, New Holland, for killing dogs by producing in evidence their tails, has led to the practice among the loafers of that convict colony, to curtail the appendages of all the animals of this species running abroad as a more brief way of reaching the reward in question. The municipal government now wisely require the carcass also to be produced.

Among the curiosities in the national library at Berlin, is said to be the identical bible used by Charles I, on the scaffold.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

Specie. The influx of silver into the United States from Mexico and Cuba, via New Orleans, appears to be very great this season. We scarcely open a New Orleans paper in which the arrival of some thousands of dollars is not mentioned. On the 11th ultimo, $120,000 were received by De Lizardi & Co. from Havana, and but a short time before $50,000 were received by the same house from the same place.

The editor of the Philadelphia National Gazette states, on competent authority, that there is at this moment in Mexico an amount of ore, valued at fifteen millions of dollars, remaining useless on the surface, on account of the scarcity of quicksilver; the process of smelting depending, in a great degree, upon an adequate supply of that metal.

Opening of the first rail road in Maine. The first locomotive ever put into operation in Maine was that which commenced running on the 21st ultimo; on that part of Bangor and Piscataqua rail road just completed, as far as Old Town. The vast lumber trade here and at Orono, through both of which the road passes, makes this road one of great importance.

Promotions in the army. Major John Bliss, 1st infantry, to be lieutenant colonel in 6th infantry, vice D. Baker, deceased. Captain and brevet major John Garland, 8d infantry, to be major of the 1st infantry, vice Bliss, promoted. First lieutenant, J. W. Cotton, to be captain of the 8d infantry, vice Garland, promoted. First lieutenant, A. S. Miller, 1st infantry, to be captain, vice Boyce, resigned. First lieutenant, L. T. Janison, 5th infantry, to be captain, vice T. Hunt, resigned.

Exploring expedition. This expedition will rendezvous at Norfolk forthwith, and sail some time during the winter. It will consist of the United States frigate Macedonian, master commandant Armstrong, bearing the broad pendant of commodore Thomas Ap C. Jones:

The barques Pioneer, lieutenant com. Tatnall, and Consort, lieutenant com. Glynn—both built for the service at the Boston yard:

The store ship Relief, lieutenant com. Dornin, built at the Philadelphia yard, and the schooner Pilot, built at the New York yard. [Fred. Arena.

Farewell to steam! There seems no limit to the surprising inventive faculties of our countrymen. We learn by the Freehold, (N. J.) Inquirer that on the 8th December, and following days there will take place in that town under the direction of an examining committee, a series of experiments with a new propelling power for rail roads, invented by Mr. U. Emmons, of that town, and called the spring power locomotive. The speed is computed at from 70 to 100 miles per hour! and that entirely effected by springs, of which there are 500 in the locomotive. No danger of explosions here.

Slander. A suit brought by Nicholas Mills, of Richmond, Va. against Joseph Mason, a merchant of Petersburg, Va. for slanderous words uttered by the defendant's wife in reference to the plaintiff's daughter, came on for hearing at the present term of the superior court, now in session at Petersburg, and after occupying eight days, terminated on Saturday last. The jury after retiring for a few moments returned a verdict of damages to the amount of five thousand dollars against the defendant, accompanied by a special verdict, expressing in the strongest terms, their entire confidence in the innocence of the accused. Forty witnesses were examined on the trial.

Gen. George W. Jones has been elected as the delegate in congress from the territory of Wisconsin by a large majority. The vote stood—for Jones 3,522—Meeker 669.

Reduction of duties. We are assured, says the New York Star, that a numerous and respectable petition will immediately be sent to Washington, after the meeting of congress, to reduce the duties on coal, cheese and butter; these are articles which the poor ought to receive at much lower rates.—Also to reduce, or wholly take off, the duties on foreign wines and distilled spirits. In our notice the other day, we stated that 1,200,000 bushels of grain are yearly distilled in this city and environs, but it appears that 2,000,000 is the correct quantity. To take the duty off of foreign spirits will give us plenty of bread, and no more intemperate men than at the present.

Valuable cargo. The bark Fanny, which cleared at New Orleans on the 11th ult. for Havre, had on board 2,263 bales of cotton, weighing 912,922 lbs. valued at $159,597.

The Cincinnati Republican states that the hon. G. L. Kinnard, of Indiana, who was so badly scalded by the recent distressing accident on board the steamboat Flora, is in a fair way of recovery.

Destructive fire. On Saturday morning last, a destructive fire broke out in Johnstown, Montgomery co. N. Y. which destroyed a large number of buildings and their contents, covering a loss estimated at $30,000. Among the buildings destroyed was the Episcopal church, with its fine bell and the old organ, presented to the church by sir William Johnson before the revolution.

Vermont. The legislature of Vermont adjourned a few days since, after passing one hundred and sixty acts. Among them is one requiring the state treasurer to receive its share of the surplus revenue, whenever paid by the United States, and deliver it over to trustees to be appointed by the several towns for that purpose, in proportion to the population of the several towns in 1830, to be loaned to the citizens at six per cent. the principal to remain the property of the several towns, unless called for by the United States; the interest to be appropriated to the support of common schools; distribution to be equalised after 1840, according to the then population of the towns.

Wisconsin territory. The territorial legislature of Wisconsin, assembled, for the first time, by proclamation from governor Dodge, at Belmont, Iowa county, on the 25th ultimo. On the following day, the governor issued his message, an extract from which appears in the Chicago American. He recommends the legislature to immediately organize the several courts necessary for the administration of justice;—also, that the legislature memorialize congress to grant the right of pre-emption to actual settlers; to make appropriations for internal improvements; to cause harbors to be surveyed and constructed; and light-houses to be built; to organize and arm the militia, &c.

A bank failure. In consequence of the recent failure of the president of the Nahant bank, at Lynn, Massachusetts, there was a run on the institution last week, for specie, and the result of which was, as we are informed by our Boston correspondent, and also by a gentleman who left that city last Saturday, that the bank, unable to meet its notes with specie, was obliged to stop payment.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

¶ The annual message of the president of the United States was transmitted to both houses of congress on Tuesday last, and is inserted in subsequent pages. It being the last of general Jackson's annual messages it was, from the peculiar condition of the country, looked for with much anxiety, and has, we think, disappointed both parties by the moderation of its tone, and the calm dignity of its language in reference to our foreign relations—especially in its comments upon the position we occupy in the controversy waging between Texas and Mexico. That portion of it which relates to the currency, is also viewed by the opponents of the administration with less alarm than the former doctrines advanced by the president; for although their experience is opposed to the effects which he asserts have been produced by the creation of the deposit banks, they believe the worst fruits of that system have been witnessed, and that in the calm which will speedily succeed the late contest, a more enlarged and liberal plan for managing the fiscal concerns of the country will be mutually agreed upon. The act for the distribution of the surplus revenue, which received the reluctant consent of the president, is viewed as the source of many evils to the state governments and the people. It is not our province to discuss that measure in the bearings presented; but there is one operation of it that has escaped the president's attention, which is, in our opinion, pregnant with more mischiefs to the people than can result from the most liberal distributions of the surplus. We allude to the measures of the deposit banks to meet the demands of the government for the distributive funds in their possession; for to meet those demands, they must necessarily curtail their discounts to the amount of funds subject to the draft of the treasury, which it may be necessary to transfer from one state to another. And thus the surplus, instead of enabling the deposit banks to benefit the people, is made the source of annoyance and vexation by unsettling the fiscal relations of the country—for we all know the guarded policy of banks, which induces them to view each other with distrust, and to graduate their issues by the issues of other institutions. It is on this principle that the curtailment of one or two millions of discounts by a deposit bank, or its refusal to grant discounts to the same amount, checks the ability of other banks to relieve the people—and hence some of the difficulties which at present embarrass the money market.

Under the present system it is, we think, impossible to devise a plan by which the revenue can be used as the basis of discounts by the deposit banks, without producing the evils which are now felt in so much bitterness. For if the reductions are ever so gradual in anticipation of the annual drafts of the treasury, the effect will be the same, though its consequences may not be so immediate—As those banks cannot from the peculiar manner in which they are constituted, act with that unity which will maintain a proper equilibrium in the fiscal relations of the states: and they must, therefore, either keep the government funds locked up in their vaults, or use them subject to the fluctuations which the anticipation of the annual demands may create.

The other topics are discussed in a becoming spirit, and, as a whole, the message will be generally acceptable to the people.

¶ We have on file a number of articles relating to the present difficulties in the money market, and the alleged misconduct of the officers of certain banks, which shall have a place in our next. As a specimen of the former, we insert the following from the Providence "Courier," which cites it as a "common case."

A transaction. The following transaction, which took place in Boston during the last week, will give some idea of the straits to which even the rich are reduced: A rich man had borrowed ten thousand dollars of an institution, which circumstances required that he should pay on such a day. He gave his notes to one of our banks for six months, on interest, and obtained notes of the bank. He then paid a broker one per cent. to get the money for him, giving those notes as security. The broker obtained the money at two and a half per cent. a month for six months! Thus eighteen hundred dollars! were paid for the ten thousand dollars.

lars for six months. How many can afford such sacrifices long?

¶ The letter of Mr. Biddle, president of the bank of the United States, to the hon. John Quincy Adams, in relation to the affairs of that institution, will be found in the present sheet, and is particularly interesting in connection with the president's strictures upon the late bank.

If the capital of the United States bank had been distributed, and the charter broken up, the division, according to Mr. Biddle's letter, would have been as follows:

There were, in all, 3,417 stockholders:—Of whom there were Pennsylvanians 590, other citizens of the United States 2,267, foreigners 560.

To these the funds would be appropriated as follows:

To the New England states	$3,111,000
New York and New Jersey	4,569,000
Delaware, Maryland and the District of Columbia	2,027,000
Virginia and North Carolina	894,000
South Carolina and Georgia	3,031,000
Other states	99,000
Foreigners	9,163,000
The government of the U. States	6,278,000
Pennsylvania	5,219,000
Pennsylvania, owning little more than five millions, now has the use and management of thirty-five millions of capital.

¶ The express mail, bearing the president's message, arrived in Baltimore from Washington in 2 hours and 5 minutes, having left the latter city at 20 minutes past 12, and arrived in the former at 25 minutes past 2 o'clock. It arrived in Philadelphia at a quarter past 9 o'clock on the same night, and in N. York at 5 minutes past 2 on the next morning.

¶ The present sheet contains the report of the commissioners of N. Hampshire appointed to investigate the "Indian Stream difficulties;" see page 231.

THE MONEY MARKET. Notwithstanding the continuance of the pressure, Saturday passed off without any commercial disaster. The payments of merchants on that day, are said to have been eight millions, and not a note lay over. An opinion is gaining ground that the crisis is past, and that the money market will shortly be easier. We hope so. On Friday, in Philadelphia, the United States bank discounted 900,000 dollars, and the Girard bank $300,000. Things were becoming easier there.

[N. Y. Com. of Monday.

In reference to the above, the New York "Express" says, that the 900,000 dollars which the U. States bank discounted in one day, was in merchants' notes; and that when this great discount was made, the directors had before them southern paper, which, if cashed, would have given the bank $6,000 nett profit for the exchange.

A GREAT DAY. The amount of notes which fell due on Friday and Saturday was very great, especially among the grocers. On Saturday the amount paid into the banks was estimated at eight millions of dollars. Every merchant's note was promptly paid.

FROM FLORIDA. The Jacksonville Courier of the 24th ult. contains a letter from col. Mills, confirming the accounts received a few days ago, of two actions with the Seminoles, by the forces under general Call. The Wythlacoochee was crossed on the 18th of November, with the friendly Creeks, commanded by col. Pierce, three hundred regulars and col. Mills' battalion of East Florida volunteers. On the same day, a detachment of the Tennessee volunteers encountered and defeated the Indians at Warm Spring, not far from the Wahoo Swamp, supposed to be about four hundred strong; nineteen were found dead after the action. Next day, gov. Call met, it is supposed, the whole body of the enemy in the Wahoo Swamp, and after a short brush, it being night, he thought it best to retreat a short distance, to encamp, where he intended to remain until he effected a junction with the other division of the army. The whole American force that had left Fort Drane, is two thousand two hundred.

MICHIGAN. A state convention is to be held on the 14th inst. for the purpose of reversing the decision of the former convention rejecting the terms presented by congress for the admission of that territory into the union as a member of the confederacy. There is little doubt that the new convention will accept the terms of admission. It will be seen, however, in our items of election news, that she has chosen electors of president and vice president, as if she was already a member of the union.

FROM MEXICO. A letter to the editors of the New York Daily "Express," dated Mexico, October 22, says—It is not improbable that Mr. Ellis, the American charge at Mexico, will soon demand his passports, and go home. I learn that he has sent to the government a long list of complaints, DEMANDING answers within a reasonable time, and also reparation for the violation of the flag of the United States in the seizure of an American brig at Vera Cruz.

It is the report that he will go home if these demands are not answered satisfactorily. I learn that many days have elapsed, and that no answer has been given. I am certain that he will go home if no satisfaction is given. Mr. Ellis at the present time is in poor health, which may delay his departure, or protract his negotiations.

On the part of the priests and the present government, there is no good feeling towards the U. States. North Americans live an uneasy life here, not knowing what to expect from day to day. I send this letter to take its chance by the way of Havana.

TEXAS. The hon. Wm. H. Wharton, appointed minister to this government from Texas, with full powers to procure the acknowledgement of the independence of that country and its annexation to the United States, has arrived at New Orleans.

The government now consists of Samuel Houston, president, M. B. Lamar, vice president, T. J. Rusk, secretary of war, H. Smith, secretary of state, S. F. Austin, secretary of the treasury and George Fisher, secretary of the navy. We have before us inaugural addresses from president Houston and vice president Lamar, which, with some resolutions passed by the congress, in relation to the recognition of the independence of the country, shall have a place in the next "REGISTER."

Two commissioners had arrived from Mexico, to negotiate for a peace and an arrangement of difficulties. They had been allowed an interview with Santa Ana, but the propositions they were authorised to make had not transpired.

The blockade of Matamoras has been raised by president Houston.

The Texas Telegraph was again suggesting and advocating, by authority as supposed, the appointment of general James Hamilton, of South Carolina, to the chief command of the Texian armies.

"CAPT. ETHAN ALLEN HITCHCOCK, of the U. States army, and aid to gen. Gaines in his Florida and Sabine campaigns, has been appointed governor of Liberia. He is a very efficient officer and an estimable man."

[We find the above in the New York papers. It is true, we believe, that captain Hitchcock has been offered, by a unanimous vote of the board of managers, the office of governor of Liberia, but it is not known whether he accepts the appointment. We cordially unite in the favorable opinion expressed of his qualifications, which, indeed, we deem superior to those of any other citizen within our knowledge for the office in question, and therefore, as friends of the society, we sincerely hope he will accept the trust which has been tendered to him.

A BUSINESS TRANSACTION. The N. Y. Journal of Commerce states that Mr. Stevens, a jeweller in Dey street, who was some time ago robbed of a large amount of jewelry, for the recovery of which he offered a reward of 4,000 dollars, was accosted in the street a few evenings since, and told if he would call at a certain house, at an hour named, and pay the 4,000 dollars, he should receive back his jewelry. He did so—paid his money, and received his property.

THE PRESIDENT'S HEALTH. From the "Globe" of Tuesday. The health of the president has gradually improved, but he is still extremely feeble, and unable to meet company. He gives his attention, a few hours every day, to communications laid before him by his cabinet; but he is absolutely interdicted by his physician (Dr. HUNT) from receiving his friends, as the effort to converse threatens a return of the hemorrhage, which, in his present weak condition, might be attended with instant suffocation.

THE MILITARY COURT OF INQUIRY, as will be seen in another part of this sheet, is now duly organized at Frederick, Md. Gen. Scott opened his defence on Tuesday, and the examination of witnesses commenced on Wednesday. Gen. Gaines had not yet reached that place, having been detained at Mobile by the indisposition of his lady, who, we regret to state, died in that city on the 29th ult. after a protracted illness.

EXPRESS MAIL. We learn from the Globe, that an arrangement has been made, by which the express mail going east, will leave Washington, during the session of congress, at six o'clock in the evening, arrive in Baltimore at 8½, in Philadelphia at 6½ next morning, and in New York at 8 the next evening.

An attempt was made on Sunday morning to stop the express mail south of Philadelphia, on the Gray's ferry road beyond the bridge.

The express mail of yesterday, between this city and New York, was discovered to be on fire, which was not extinguished until two of the paper bags were partially destroyed. [Nat. Gaz.]

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. Andrew Jackson, jr. to be secretary under the 6th section of the act to reorganize the general land office, approved the 4th of July, 1836, in the place of A. J. Donelson, resigned.

Matthew Burchard, of Ohio, to be solicitor of the general land office, in the place of Wyllis Silliman, declined.

PENNSYLVANIA. The legislature commenced its session on Monday last, gen. Cunningham (anti-V. B.) was elected speaker of the senate—for Cunningham 18, A. H. Read 13, David Middlecoff 1 and William T. Rogers 1. Lewis Dewart (V. B.) was elected speaker of the house. The whigs run John Parker, and the anti-masons Walter Oliver. Dewart received 68 votes, John Parker 9, Walter Oliver 19, Hopkins 1.

VIRGINIA. On Monday last the legislature of this state commenced its session. Stafford H. Parker was unanimously elected speaker of the senate, and Linn Banks, without opposition, speaker of the house of delegates.

The majority, officially ascertained, for the Van Buren ticket in this state, is 6,893 votes. Other votes, "not strictly in form," says the Enquirer, and therefore not counted, would have made the total majority in Virginia for the Van Buren ticket 7,433.

NORTH CAROLINA. The hon. Robert Strange has been chosen a senator of the United States by the legislature of this state, to fill the temporary vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Man-gum. The vote stood thus:—Strange (V. B.) 85; Settle (whig) 83; scattering, (a whig vote) 1.—The legislature has determined, almost unanimously, to accept that portion of the surplus revenue allotted to North Carolina under the deposit act.

SOUTH CAROLINA. The legislature of this state met at Columbia on Monday week. Patrick Noble was elected president of the senate, and D. L. Wardlaw was elected speaker of the house of representatives. From the message of gov. McDuffie we have published an extract relative to the revolution in Texas, which cannot fail to command the attention of our readers.

GEORGIA. The Augusta Sentinel of the 2d inst. announces the resignation of colonel George W. B. Towns, a member of the house of representatives from this state. His resignation only extends to the present session of congress, and not to the seat to which he was elected in October. He gives as a reason for his resignation the vote of the state for judge White, which he thinks equivalent to an instruction to resign.

ALABAMA. Col. McKinley of Lauderdale, has been elected a senator from this state, in place of Mr. Moore, whose term of service expires on the 4th of March next. The vote stood, for McKinley 72, for Hopkins 45.

MISSOURI. The legislature of this state met at Jefferson on the 21st ult. Mr. Jamison was elected speaker of the house without opposition. We have not seen a copy of the governor's message.

ARKANSAS. This state has passed resolutions directing its senators to vote in favor of Mr. Benton's expunging resolutions. The legislature has also chartered two banks, one a state bank with a capital of a million and a half of dollars; the other a real estate bank with a capital of two millions of dollars.

SENATOR PORTER. The Louisiana Advertiser of November 25, says: "The hon. Alexander Porter expects to leave his residence at Oaklawn, in Attakapas, about the 10th of December, to resume his seat in the senate of the United States, by the time congress is ready to commence active business."

THE ANNUAL TREASURY REPORT was transmitted to both houses of congress on the first day of the session. It shall have a place in our next—in the meantime we avail ourselves of the following abstract of its contents prepared by the editors of the "Intelligencer."

Receipts and expenditures for 1836. The balance in the treasury on the 1st of January last was $26,749,803. The receipts for 1836 are estimated at $47,691,898, of which the receipts from customs for the three first quarters have been $17,523,151, and the receipts from lands $20,048,029. The expenditures for 1836 are ascertained and estimated at $31,435,032, of which the payments for the military service, (including fortifications), during the three first quarters, have amounted to $13,010,061.

Deducting the expenditures of the year, ascertained and probable, from the receipts, the balance which will be in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1837, is estimated at $43,005,669, and, deducting the "unavailable funds" of $1,080,000, leaving "the available balance" $41,925,669. [This does not include the balance to the credit of the post office department at the end of the year, estimated at $513,920.]

Revenue and expenditures for 1837. The receipts are estimated as follows: customs, $16,500,000; lands, $5,000,000; bank stock and miscellaneous, $2,500,000. The expenditures (including 1,000,000 dollars for usual excess of appropriations beyond estimates) are estimated at $26,755,831.

Imports and exports. The imports during the year ending 30th September, 1836, are ascertained and estimated at $173,540,000, shewing an increase, compared with the preceding year, of $23,644,258. The exports during the same period are ascertained and estimated at $121,789,000, of which 101,105,000 dollars were domestic products, and the residue foreign, exhibiting an aggregate increase, compared with the preceding year, of $35,423, and an amount exceeding the average of the last three years by $3,829,150.

The surplus revenue. The recommendations of the last annual report are renewed, and reductions suggested of duties on raw materials of foreign origin used in some of our important manufactures, and next on articles of comfort and necessity for the people generally. A prohibition of the sale of the public domain to any but actual settlers is also mentioned as another mode of curtailing the revenue.

The public money. An account is given of the measures adopted in pursuance of the act of June 23d, 1836, to regulate the deposits of the public money, and some recommendations are made of prospective provisions on the subject, such as authority to discontinue as deposit banks, when no longer necessary, those selected under the late act, &c.

The mint and the currency. The coinage of the mint, from the 1st of January to the 1st of November, 1836, has been, of gold, $3,619,440, and of silver, $2,877,000. The establishment of a gold coin of one dollar is again urged upon congress. The quantity of gold now in the country is estimated at $15,000,000. The secretary of the treasury calculates the whole specie in the country in October, 1833, at thirty millions of dollars, and the whole specie now in the country at seventy-three millions. Various speculations on the subject occupy a number of pages in this part of the report.

Miscellaneous. The report concludes with several suggestions of a miscellaneous character, among which the renewed recommendation of the adoption of measures for regulating steamboat navigation must meet with very general approbation from all those who have as much horror as we have of those appalling catastrophes which class themselves under the head of "steamboat disasters!"

THE TREASURY. Treasury department, Dec. 2, 1836. In compliance with the resolution of the senate of the 1st July last, directing that, "during the ensuing recess of congress the secretary of the treasury cause to be published, at the commencement of each month, a statement of the amount of money in the treasury subject to draft, and, also, the amount standing to the credit of disbursing officers," the undersigned hereby gives public notice, that the amount of money in the treasury subject to draft, as shown by the running account of the treasurer, was, on the 1st instant, $42,899,167 49, and "the amount standing to the credit of the disbursing officers," as shown by the latest returns received, was $4,177,219 88. Of the amount of money in the treasury subject to draft, the sum of $430,822 64 belongs to special trusts, and is not applicable to the public service.

LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.

RESERVED RIGHTS. The following excellent hit is not without its moral.

Standing upon our reserved rights.

"John," said a gentleman to his coachman, "go to the well and get a pitcher of water."

"Excuse me, sir," said John, "it is not my business."

"True! true! I had forgotten. Harness the horse, and put to, John, and bring the coach to the front door."

"Yes, sir."

The coach is brought.

"Thomas—take the pitcher, get into the coach, John will drive you to the gate. Get a pitcher of water and let John drive you back again to the door, and he may then put up."

Query. How much trouble did John save himself by not going for the water.

LIEUTENANT WILKES of the navy, who recently went to England and France, for the purpose of purchasing instruments for the South Sea expedition, has met with a highly flattering reception, and has been singularly successful in procuring the scientific aid which he required. The New York Times says that the law authorising the expedition has commanded the admiration of the scientific men of Great Britain and they are loud and warm in the commendations of the liberal minded and enlightened policy to be carried into effect by our government. The just expectations, not only of the people of this country, but of the scientific men of England, must not, and we are sure will not, be disappointed.

THE TENNESSEE VOLUNTEERS now in Florida have borne themselves with a gallantry deserving the highest praise. After they had left Fort Drane, on their first march towards the Wythlacoochee, a detachment of sixty of their body was detailed as a front guard, and when they were about seeking a suitable place for encampment for the night, the following incidents occurred. They are related in the official account of the officer of the day:—

"Some Indian camps on the left were discovered, which showed conclusively that Indians were not far distant—upon further scrutiny, an Indian poney was discovered tied, not far off, at sight of which the whole front with simultaneous movement charged at high speed, which charge was kept up for 3 or 4 miles, signs still becoming stronger, until at length we discovered a band of Indians retreating at full speed. We pursued and effected the capture of twelve, and the killing of fourteen, that had been seen: some escaped towards the Wythlacoochee, what number I am unable to say, but suppose there might have been fifteen or twenty that escaped. It affords me great pleasure to say that on that occasion each man acted with no less gallant bearing than would have distinguished a Roman soldier in the proudest days of the empire. The conduct of each officer and soldier on that occasion merits special comment, but time and opportunity forbid that I should dwell upon particulars. Permit me to say however that major Upshaw acted with distinguished gallantry in the charge, and during the affray he pursued an armed warrior to the edge of a thick hammock and despatched him by splitting his skull by a blow from his Bowie knife—while the Indian was deliberately raising his rifle to his shoulder to shoot his assailant. Capt. Grundy and 15 of his company charged in a body, with great enthusiasm, the capt. himself despatching an armed warrior by a shot from his yager."

THE DEPOSITE BILL. At an internal improvement convention at Nashville, on the 12th ult. the honorable Adam Huntsman, member of congress, took occasion to deny a rumor that president Jackson intended to recommend a repeal of the distribution or deposit bill in his next message. We quote from the report of his remarks—

"General Jackson was deliberately, and from full conviction, committed to the support of the principles developed in that bill. He spoke, he said, authoritatively, and from facts which came personally under his own observation. He was present when the deposit bill came from the senate. It was handed to general Jackson, who said that in its present shape he would veto it from constitutional principles, but that he could frame an amendment which, if adopted, would meet with his full approbation, and enable him to approve it without any sacrifice of principle. He was requested to do so—and retired with the attorney general, B. F. Butler, wrote the amendment, which was copied by his secretary, Mr. Donelson, and handed to Mr. Anthony, a devoted friend of the president's from Pennsylvania, who offered it in the house, where it was finally adopted, and being then fully and unequivocally expressive of Jackson's sentiments, was approved by him, and is now the law of the land."

To the editors of the National Intelligencer.

Washington, Dec. 8, 1836.

Messrs. Gales & Seaton: On looking over your paper of the 5th December, I see something which purports to be an extract of a speech of mine, delivered at the rail road convention, which was held in October last, in Nashville. It is true that I had the honor of being a member of that convention, and it is equally true I made a speech. But, as the reporter of it has entirely mistaken my language upon that occasion, I will take the liberty of correcting it by stating, through your paper, what I did say.

In answer to a remark of a gentleman who alleged that the president intended, at the ensuing session of congress, to recommend the repeal of the deposit bill, I replied that I did not believe he had any such intention: that it was pretty well understood in congress that, in the shape which the bill came from the senate, the executive had some constitutional objections to it, and would most probably veto it. I furthermore stated, that I had been informed by such authority, or sources as left no doubt in my mind of its correctness, that the president had said that an amendment or section could be framed which would steer clear of constitutional objections; and that he had been requested to point out the terms of such an amendment, and that, by the co-operation of the attorney general, the amendment which was ultimately offered by the member from Pennsylvania (Mr. Anthony), and adopted by both houses, had undergone the revision of the executive; and, inasmuch as the president had a full and thorough knowledge of all its bearings, and had given it his approval, I did not believe he intended to recommend its repeal, as the same reasons which would have operated in his mind in regard to its repeal would have induced him to have placed his veto upon it instead of approving it, in the first instance.

This is the substance of what I stated in the convention.

A. HUNTSMAN.

THE MILITARY COURT OF INQUIRY. The Fredericktown (Md.) Herald of Saturday gives the following account of the meeting and proceedings of the military court of inquiry in that city.

"Our town is at present enlivened by the presence of many of the most distinguished officers of the United States army, who are in attendance on this court. Among them are the following:

"Maj. gen. Macomb, maj. gen. Scott, brig. gen. Atkinson, gen. Sanford, col. Bankhead, col. Kenas, col. Lindsey, maj. Huson, captain Cooper, captain McCall, capt. Hitchcock, capt. Green, capt. Dimmock, capt. Lee, capt. Newcomb, (resigned) formerly of the United States army.

"The court, consisting of maj. gen. Macomb and brig. generals Atkinson and Brady, proceeded to business on Monday last. There duty was to inquire into the causes of the failure of the southern campaign, and also into the propriety of the publication of certain orders by general Gaines, or other officers.

"As a court of inquiry is somewhat unusual in our country, some curiosity has been felt to know the course and mode of their proceedings. The court is held in public, (the house lately occupied by Casper Weaver, esq. being used for that purpose) and many visitors, both male and female, have attended the investigation. All the officers attend in full-dress uniform, and the judge advocate conducts the trial. The proceedings, when we have been present, consisted of nothing more than the mere reading, by the judge advocate, of the communications from and to the war department during the southern war, with an occasional remark or explanation from general Scott, whose conduct is at present considered by the court.—Although from the fact that the proceedings are conducted almost entirely in writing, they are not calculated generally to interest those who are not familiar with the whole subject, or who do not understand the minutiae of the campaign, yet the presence of so many of the noble and gallant officers, who have oft-times planted the standard of victory upon the camps of their country's enemies, has an imposing effect. They now having exchanged the field for the forum, are solemnly engaged in the trial of one of their fellow officers, who, like themselves, has often won the applause of his countrymen by his bravery and daring, but has been unsuccessful in the late contest, surrounded, as it appears to have been, with numberless difficulties, which cannot be appreciated by those not having experienced them.

"General Gaines, it is said, objects to general Macomb as a member of the court, so far as he is concerned. The severe indisposition of his lady, we understand, detains him for the present at Mobile."

THE EXPLORING EXPEDITION. We are happy to perceive that all diligence is used in fitting out the vessels destined for this interesting and important service. We were yesterday favored with an opportunity of examining the interior and appliances of the fine staunch store ship, lately built at our navy yard, under the immediate superintendence of commodore Barron. No pains seem to have been spared to render her in all respects suited to her destination. She carries a small armament on her upper deck, and is calculated to receive about 8,000 barrels of freight. The health and comfort of her crew will doubtless be much promoted by the effectual though simple apparatus for ventilation, invented by that officer, capable of producing a complete renovation of the air of her hold in the course of a few minutes. We observed also an improved apparatus in the cook's department adapted to the use of anthracite, and learned that she has already on board a three years' stock of that fuel. Should our explorers find themselves at the south, passing a winter in a scene analogous to that of Melville island, they will, no doubt, among other discoveries, ascertain that the human faculties are wondrously quickened by a due application of this most excellent combustible. We heard it stated that she is to sail in a day or two for her rendezvous at Norfolk, where she will take in her stores.

[Poulson's Philadelphia American.]

IMPORTANT SUIT. An action has been in course of trial in the United States Circuit Court for the last three days, which is of a very important nature, as it affects the community at large. In the cause referred to the bank of Bridgeport, appeared as the plaintiffs, and sought to recover from Lewis L. Nevins and others, defendants, the sum of $3,000, which, in July 1833, was put on board the Providence steamboat for the defendants for the plaintiffs, but which, along with a large amount of other money, was stolen from the steamboat previous to her leaving this city.

This is the second suit which has arisen out of this loss. The first was brought by the plaintiffs against the proprietors of the steamboat, and sought to make them, as common carriers, liable for the amount stolen; having failed, however, in that cause, they now proceeded against the defendants for not having taken sufficient care of the money previous to the steamboat actually starting for her destination; and also, on account of the amount sent having failed to reach the persons for whom it was intended.

His honor, judge Thompson, charged the jury at very great length, and urged as the material point for their consideration; first, whether the defendants had contracted with the plaintiffs to put the money on board the steamboat which he stated, according to the evidence of Mr. Morgan, if he was to be believed they clearly had; and, 2d, whether in doing so they had by their servant been guilty of negligence, or had used due and proper care and caution. It being three o'clock when the learned judge had finished his charge, the jury were directed to bring in a sealed verdict in the morning.

About 11 o'clock at night, the jury having been utterly unable to agree, two of them became ill, and soliciting, obtained the permission of the court to go home, which they did. Yesterday morning they all came into court, and stating their inability to agree, were discharged.

THE PEA PATCH. This is an island in the river Delaware, the title to which has long been in dispute. A suit involving the title was tried last week in Trenton, by the circuit court of the United States. The lessor of the plaintiff resting his claim upon a warrant from the proprietors of West Jersey, as also upon a grant derived from New Jersey. The defendant is in possession under the general government, and their title rests upon an act passed by the legislature of the state of Delaware in May, 1815. It presented the interesting question, how far the state of Delaware can extend her boundary under the deed of feoffment from the duke of York to William Penn, in 1682, of New Castle, and a twelve mile's circle. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff.

Messrs. Wall, Frelinghuysen and Southard were for the plaintiff.

James C. Green, the attorney general for the United States for New Jersey district, for defendants.

FROM THE SABINE.

Correspondence of the Newark, (N. J.) Daily Advertiser.

Fort Jesup, (La.) November 12.

We are resting upon our arms. Like that celebrated marshal who marched his troops up the hill, and marched them down again, we have moved in martial columns upon the enemy's territory, and are here again snugly fixed in winter quarters! I know not what the country may think of the operations of our forces on this frontier, but there is but one sentiment here, which is that money, time and character have been most ingloriously squandered. Dreaming in my quarters sometimes, I fancy myself the well-dressed puppet of a show, moved about with my fellow mutes to show off the dexterity and skill of the master juggler who moves the wires. I am trespassing, perhaps, but verily 'twere better to be a dog and bay the moon, than such a Roman. I shall be with you speedily.

Four companies at camp Sabine, three in the Caddo region, nine at the ultima thule of our operations, (Nacogdoches), and the same number in this forlorn position, is the present disposition of our strength. A gentleman came in yesterday from Columbia, (Texas), from whom we learn that every thing was quiet there. The authorities are more anxious to promote the arts of peace than those of war just now. The ravages of the war upon the agriculture of the country are now seriously felt.

Mr. Burnet had resigned the remainder of his term, and will, it is said, free himself from all responsibility as speedily as possible.

THE ARMY—OFFICIAL.

GENERAL ORDER, NO. 80.

Head quarters of the army, adj't general's office, Washington, November 30, 1836.

2d lieutenant W. B. Arvin, 4th artillery, 30th November, 1836.

Assistant surgeon W. A. Berry, medical staff, 19th November, 1836.

VI.—Surgeon Thomas Lawson having been appointed by the president the surgeon general of the army, will immediately proceed to the city of Washington, and enter upon the duties of his office.

By order of Alexander Macomb, major general commanding-in-chief. R. JONES. adjt. gen.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

MARYLAND.

Wednesday last being the day appointed by the constitution of the United States for the electors to assemble in the capitol of their respective states to cast the votes for president and vice president, the electors chosen in Maryland assembled in the senate chamber at Annapolis, and organized by appointing George Howard, esq. of Anne Arundel, president and Joseph H. Nicholson, esq. secretary. Mr. Purnell, one of the electors, being absent, the electors, in virtue of the act of 1833, ch. 261, proceeded to fill the vacancy in their body, and Thomas G. Pratt, esq. of Prince George's was elected.—The ten votes were then cast for William H. Harrison as president and John Tyler as vice president. The three certificates required were then prepared and signed, as were the credentials of the bearer of the return, J. H. Nicholson, esq.—and the college adjourned sine die.

After the adjournment of the college Mr. Purnell arrived, having been detained in consequence of the grounding of the steamboat, which did not arrive at Annapolis until 6 o'clock, P. M.

9,842 majority for White.

The new counties of Cannon, Coffee, Marshall, Bradley and Lauderdale, it is supposed, vote with the old counties from which they were respectively divided. The returns here given are therefore complete and official.

NORTH CAROLINA.

All the returns from this state have been received, and the official result is—26,910 for the Van Buren and 23,626 for the whig electors. Van Buren majority 3,284.

MISSOURI.

The St. Louis Bulletin of the 26th ult. contains the official presidential election returns from all the counties of Missouri except four. The Van Buren majority is 3,604.

ARKANSAS.

This state is gone for Mr. Van Buren. The majority not stated.

ILLINOIS.

The official returns from this state, give the Van Buren ticket 17,276 votes, and the union ticket 14,292 votes.

ALABAMA.

It is stated that the Van Buren majority in this state will be more than 4,000.

LOUISIANA.

The Van Buren majority in this state, is said to be 270.

MISSISSIPPI.

This is the only state to be heard from.

MICHIGAN.

This young state, anticipating the period of her admission into the union, has, it appears, actually held an election for electors of president and vice president of the United States, though not yet a member of the union. The Detroit Free Press, of November 26, reports the result, in a table "prepared from the official canvass of each county as returned to the secretary's office;" from which it appears that in nine counties out of twenty-two the opponents of the Van Buren electoral ticket did not vote at all, and that the result of all the votes actually received and counted gives for the Van Buren ticket an average of about 7,400 votes, and for the opposing ticket 4,080 votes.

A THIEF IN GRAIN.

New York, Nov. 22.

Police office.—Thieving extraordinary.—Mr. Homan, police officer, yesterday arrested a small humpback man named Thomas J. Aimes, charged with stealing from one of the hotels. On being examined at the police office he gave the following account of himself, and, on doing so, developed perhaps the most extraordinary series of thefts that was ever committed by one person in the same space of time. He stated that he is 81 years old, was born in Springfield, Massachusetts, arrived here last summer, and put up at Lovejoy's, near one of the ferries; staid there two days, stole a linen spencer and two handkerchiefs from one of the rooms, and left the house; he next went to the American hotel, and stole while he remained there three silver forks, a dark camlet coat, a dress coat with a velvet collar, and a gentleman's blue cloth spencer; from the American he went to the Eastern Pearl Street house, and remained there ten days, and stole some few articles of trifling value, and went to Congress Hall, where he stole two table spoons from the dinner table, and then went to the Philadelphia house and stole a silk umbrella, from thence he went to Blanchard's, and stole a pair of sugar-tongs and a hat; he next went to the Orange county house, in Courtlandt street, and stole from one of the rooms three shirts, a blue cloth vest, and a pair of drab ribbed cassimere pantaloons; then to the Commercial hotel, and stole a pair of boots, and left his old shoes in place of them; he next visited the National hotel, and stole at different times two silver butter-knives, and a tight-body coat; he then went to the City hotel, staid their four days, and stole a brown silk umbrella, a black coat from room 78, a sword cane, and an invisible green frock coat from room 117, a gold lever watch from room 17, (which he sold to a gentleman residing at Flushing), a figured silk vest, and two silk handkerchiefs; he then went to Lovejoy's, opposite the park, staid there a day or two, and stole therefrom a petersham overcoat; then went to the North American hotel, staid there one day, and stole four silver teaspoons and a hat; then went to Mrs. Smith's boarding house, opposite John Niblo's, and took a pair of cloth pantaloons and other articles, which he sold; he next went to the York house, took a black cloth vest and a blue surtout; then removed to Holt's hotel, where he stole a camlet cloak and two umbrellas; and then went to the Franklin house, took a camlet cloak from the third story, some shirts, a pair of pantaloons, a blue body-coat from an upper room, three silk handkerchiefs, a green tight-body coat, a petersham surtout, a drab surtout, two fur caps, and one umbrella, all of which he sold, and then went to the Otsego house, and while there stole a black surtout with a silk handkerchief in the pocket; he then cleared out and went to the Athenaeum hotel, and stole a pair of blue cloth pantaloons, a silk vest, and two large table spoons, which he sold, and then went to the Astor house, where he had frequently been before, and stole various articles from different parts of the house, namely, a valuable diamond finger ring from a room in the second story, a diamond breast pin from room 81, a blue frock coat out of the third story, a silver fruit knife, a pair of light colored pantaloons from the fourth story, and a carpet bag containing clothing, all of which he sold. He then left the city and went to Auburn, and stole a coat and other articles from one of the hotels, and set off for Buffalo, where he put up at different hotels, and stole from them two pairs cloth pantaloons, a green frock coat, several silk handkerchiefs and vests, a blue coat and a silver watch. He then went to Utica, where he was arrested and put in prison, on suspicion of being a thief, but was only detained one day and was discharged, and came down to Albany and put up at Crittenden's, and stole while he remained there one pair of black pantaloons and a gold lever watch from one of the parlors; he then went to another hotel and stole a few articles, and then left the place and went to Troy, where he put up at the principal hotels, and robbed them of a black frock coat, pair of boots, shirts, handkerchiefs, case of razors, silver spoons and forks, and having sold them all he returned to the city, and again went to the Astor house, and stole at different times, a black coat, pair of pantaloons, shirts, handkerchiefs, silver spoons and forks, and found a gold lever watch in the outhouse, which he sold with the other articles, and then went to Hartford and put up at the City hotel, and robbed it of a blue coat, several umbrellas, shirts and pantaloons, which he sold, and went to Springfield, and put up at one of the hotels, from which he stole two pairs of pantaloons, several shirts, a fur cap, and a silver watch, which he sold, and went to Northampton and Palmer Three Rivers; here, however, his luck failed him, and he could get nothing to steal. He then went to Wooster, put up at Brigham's, where he stole a brown frock coat, a pair of cloth pantaloons, two pairs drilling do. some shirts, a hat, a silver snuff-box, and a silver lever watch. He then went to Boston, and put up at the American house, and stole a black coat, two pairs cloth pantaloons, some stockings, handkerchiefs, and a pair of gold spectacles. He then went to the Marlboro', and stole a Boston wrapper, a bombasin coat, a pair of ribbed pantaloons, and a French gold watch, all of which he sold in Boston; and then went to Lowell, where he stole several articles from the hotels, and brought them to Boston and sold them. He then went to Providence, Bristol, and many other places, and stole trifling articles from different hotels, and then came back to this city, and went to the Pacific hotel, and stole a Boston wrapper. He then went to the Astor house, and stole a blue cloak, a drab surtout, blue surtout, a blue cloth cloak, and many other articles. This was the last act of his extraordinary performances as a larcenist, and for some time, at least, he will probably have no opportunities to repeat them. He was fully committed.

SLAVERY IN CHINA.

In a country as populous as China, where wages are extremely low, slavery can never exist to a very great extent.

The government gives full permission to the Tartar soldiers of the eight banners to buy slaves, who should, however, be duly registered. Poor people, when in want of the necessities of life, may sell their children; for it is better so the statute says, that their offspring live in bondage than starve.—

Merchants are permitted to buy them, but public officers are strictly prohibited to traffic in people under their jurisdiction.

Every owner of slaves is obliged to get them married; if, however, he fails to do so, he is amenable to the law. The children of such marriages belong to him; and though the parents may redeem themselves, their sons and daughters remain with the master. Marriages with free people are prohibited. A slave, after having gained his freedom, may become a citizen, if his behavior is such as to entitle him to that privilege.

The law provides also for the good treatment of slaves; but as they are considered as minors, their masters become responsible for their conduct. If they run away, they receive, for the first offence, only a few lashes; but when they repeat the same they are punished with merciless cruelty.

On the one hand the Chinese government gives ample power to the slaveholder, whilst on the other it constantly interferes with his rights. A master is not permitted even to manumit his slave, unless the district magistrate has sanctioned the measure; and he can refuse to give his consent for the most trivial reasons.

From the contents of the few laws upon the subject, it appears that numbers of the tribes on the frontiers and of the Meaoutsze are caught and sold. The practice, though general, is by no means legal.

In a country where a name for liberty does not even exist, it would be difficult to define slavery, unless the meaning of the word be the right of possession obtained by purchase. Viewing the matter in its true light, the sovereign is the only free man in the empire, because he has the power, either directly or indirectly, to enslave his subjects. A faithful minister calls himself a horse or dog; for the services which he performs bear a striking resemblance to those performed by those domestic animals. Slavery extends throughout all classes, with this difference only, that some privileged individuals bear the yoke of a few masters, whilst they exercise their power over many.

Slavery in China, however, is not so oppressive by many degrees, as in Siam and Cochin China, where the king divides his subjects among the grandees, and forces them to work for their masters from four to six months every year. The natural consequences of this oppressive regulation are utter poverty and wretchedness. In China, only the industry of the subject is taxed; and the supreme government has wisely ordained that the principal burden should not, apparently, fall upon the great mass of the people. As a descendant from a conqueror, the emperor owns all the lands, and, from the principle of might making right, justly demands a tax from the farmer. This is paid both in kind and money, and amounts to such a sum that the laborer can never, how much soever he exerts himself, amass a capital from the produce of the land. This may also account for the extraordinary circumstance that few large landholders are to be found in China; for the profits obtained from landed property are so small that capital can be much more advantageously employed in other branches of industry. A peasant, though seemingly free, works not for himself but for the emperor, and receives but a bare subsistence for his labor. Lest, however, the supreme government might be exasperated by the laboring classes, the taxes are virtually farmed. An officer is appointed over a district to collect a specified amount of taxes; if he does not furnish the stipulated sum he himself is responsible for the deficiency; if he oppresses, in order to collect something for himself, or merely to raise the necessary amount, and is accused of tyranny, his property is confiscated. The blame falls entirely upon him, whilst the government issues a soothing edict, declares its paternal care, and sends another benevolent tax-gatherer. Thus individuals have to bear the reproach whilst the high functionaries always maintain a high regard for the national welfare. The Chinese government does not exasperate multitudes by making exorbitant demands, but attacks rich capitalists, who must then either perish or indemnify themselves, some way or other, from the people.

This is one of the great secrets of Chinese political science. It accounts for a great many things, which otherwise appear to be riddles. The Chinese are slaves and a free people; they groan under oppression, and boast of a paternal government; though this appears a paradox, it is, nevertheless, a strict fact. The government reasons with the people as with freemen; it explains its acts, and even goes so far as to accuse itself of neglect; but woe to him who raises a voice and does not worship the condescending majesty of the rulers. Though oppressed on all sides they nevertheless are persuaded that the emperor's paternal love abhors and laments the pressure which bears them down, and that he is ready to hasten to their relief as soon as their sufferings are known. The fact is that theory and practice are sadly at variance, and the iron law of necessity makes slaves of men, who, under a better system of government, would, we think, hold forth an example to the world of contentedness, and of a love of order; and these qualities of the mind are, we presume to think, more general amongst all classes of this great empire than any other community of the world.

In the comparison between the minds of China and of Europe, the question of the rectitude of their opinions on the words honor, chivalry and liberty, are now becoming interesting. We will not say that it is the government opinion, but these words are unknown to the people, and are unappreciated by them. The subject is one of too great importance to be discussed in one number, and we may probably return to it when the port is clear of ships, and the attention can be given to it. We only now remark, that the Chinese system of government is an apt illustration of the principles of toryism and conservatism, which the emperor and his officers are able to enforce to an ultra degree, because the people are ignorant, and, consequently, submissive.

FINANCES OF PENNSYLVANIA.

GOVERNOR McDUFFIE'S MESSAGE.

We have received and read with much interest the message of the governor of the state of South Carolina to the legislature of that state, now in session. It is full of enlarged views of the duties of the state governments to foster education, &c. as the conservative principle in a free government, whose assiduous cultivation is no less necessary to prevent and repress bad government, than to insure the probability of good government, &c. After adverting to the necessity of guarding, in each state, against the intrusion of the governments or people of other states in their intestine affairs, the governor concludes his message with the following strong and emphatic observations on a subject which is of general interest to all the states, as having already received some attention at the hands of the congress and executive of the United States. [Nat. Int.]

"While South Carolina is thus indignantly repelling all foreign attempts to violate the sanctuary and endanger the existence of her domestic institutions, it becomes her in a peculiar manner, to abstain from every sort of interference with the domestic concerns or domestic controversies of all other states, foreign or confederate. The doctrine of non-interference is one of the most important in the code of international law, and there are no communities on earth who should hold it so sacred as the slave-holding states of this union. If, by their example in giving countenance to the unlawful enterprises of their own citizens against a neighboring and neutral power, they should weaken the influence of that principle among nations, they would commit an offence against their own institutions, by impairing the sanctity of their surest guaranty against foreign intrusion.

"Entertaining these opinions, I have looked with very deep concern, not unmingled with regret, upon the occurrences which have taken place during the present year, in various parts of the United States, relative to the civil war which is still in progress, between the republic of Mexico and one of her revolted provinces. It is true that no country can be responsible for the sympathies of its citizens; but I am nevertheless utterly at a loss to perceive what title either of the parties to this controversy can have to the sympathies of the American people. If it be alleged, that the insurgents of Texas are emigrants from the United States, it is obvious to reply that, by their voluntary expatriation, under whatever circumstances of adventure, of speculation, of honor, or of infamy, they have forfeited all claim to our fraternal regard. If it be even true that they have left a land of freedom for a land of despotism, they have done it with their eyes open, and deserve their destiny. There is but too much reason to believe that many of them have gone as mere adventurers, speculating upon the chances of establishing an independent government in Texas, and of seizing that immense and fertile domain by the title of the sword. But be this as it may, when they became citizens of Mexico, they became subject to the constitution and laws of that country; and whatever changes the Mexican people may have since made in that constitution and those laws, they are matters with which foreign states can have no concern, and of which they have no right to take cognizance. I trust, therefore, that the state of South Carolina will give no countenance, direct or indirect, open or concealed, to any act which may compromise the neutrality of the United States, or bring into question their plighted faith. Justice, stern and unbending justice, in our intercourse with other states, should be paramount to all the considerations of mere expediency, even were it possible that these could be separated. But they cannot. Justice is the highest expediency, and I am sure South Carolina is the last state in the union that would knowingly violate this sacred canon of political morality.

"If any consideration could add to the intrinsic weight of these high inducements to abstain from every species of interference with the domestic affairs of a neighboring and friendly state, it would be the tremendous retribution to which we are so peculiarly exposed on our south western frontier, from measures of retaliation. Should Mexico declare war against the United States, and, aided by some great European power, hoist the standard of servile insurrection in Louisiana and the neighboring states, how deep would be our self-reproaches, in reflecting that these atrocious proceedings received even a colorable apology from our own example, or from the unlawful conduct of our own citizens!

"There is one question connected with this controversy, of a definite character, upon which it may be proper that you should express an opinion.—You are doubtless aware that the people of Texas, by an almost unanimous vote, have expressed their desire to be admitted into our confederacy, and application will probably be made to congress for that purpose. In my opinion, congress ought not even to entertain such a proposition, in the present state of the controversy. If we admit Texas into our union, while Mexico is still waging war against that province, with a view to re-establish her supremacy over it, we shall, by the very act itself, make ourselves a party to the war. Nor can we take this step, without incurring this heavy responsibility.

ty, until Mexico herself shall recognize the independence of her revolted province.

"We have no official information of the precise state of our relations with Mexico. Enough is known, however, to satisfy us that the conjuncture is eminently critical. Let us be scrupulously careful that we do nothing to countenance, and all we can to prevent, the calamity of a war. We are now engaged in a fearful and doubtful struggle to reform our federal system of government, by throwing off the corruptions under which it is rapidly sinking.

"In this state of things a war with any country would be the greatest of calamities; for we could scarcely hope to come out of it with any thing but the mere wreck of a free constitution, and the external forms of a free government.

"But may heaven avert these inauspicious omens, and direct all your measures to the advancement of our true glory and lasting happiness as a free and favored people. GEO. McDUFFIE."

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES—LETTER FROM MR. BIDDLE.

From the National Gazette of the 2d inst.

The following letter, addressed by the president of the bank of the United States to a distinguished statesman, although private in its nature, will, we doubt not, receive from our readers that attention which it is entitled to claim from the importance of its subject, the interest of its historical statements, and the eminent authority from which it proceeds. We believe that since the excitements of the election are past, there is a growing disposition to be just to the institution, to acknowledge its merits, and to desire its permanency. Such dispositions cannot fail to be strengthened by the letter, which shews, in a new and clear light, that the bank is essentially Pennsylvanian, and that, after having asked for it, invited it, and enjoyed its benefits, both good feeling and good policy should alike dissuade us from disturbing its rights. We therefore cheerfully avail ourselves of the permission extended to us, to disseminate the truth and logic of Mr. Biddle's communication.

Philadelphia, Nov. 10, 1836.

MY DEAR SIR: I promised at parting to resume the subjects of our conversation—the condition of the currency of the United States, and the bank question in Pennsylvania. I shall now perform my engagement—beginning with an explanation of the controversy about the bank in Pennsylvania.

The bank of the United States chartered by congress but fixed in Pennsylvania, was always an object of state pride and state policy. It had been proposed by a Pennsylvanian, had always been governed by Pennsylvanians—and when the state lost, in the course of nature, its commercial ascendancy, the bank still maintained its superiority as the financial centre of the union. Accordingly when the charter was about to expire, Pennsylvania made great efforts to renew it.

Thus, in the year 1831, a resolution passed the house of representatives of Pennsylvania in the following form:

February 24, 1831.—"A motion was made by Mr. Ingersoll [C. J.] and read as follows:

Resolved, As the sense of the senate and house of representatives, that the constitution of the U. States authorises, and near half a century's experience sanctions, a bank of the United States as necessary and proper to regulate the value of money, and prevent paper currency of unequal and depreciated value."

This was modified as follows, in the senate, and finally passed, by a vote almost unanimous, both branches of the legislature on the 2d of April, 1831:

"That whereas the bank of the United States has tended in a great degree to maintain a sound and uniform currency, to facilitate the financial concerns of the government, to regulate foreign and domestic exchange—and has been conducive to commercial prosperity, the legislature of Pennsylvania recommends a renewal of its charter, under such regulations and restrictions, as to the power of the several states, as congress may deem right and proper."

The subject was resumed the next year. On the 2d February, 1832, the following resolution passed the senate unanimously, and the house of representatives by a vote of 77 to 7.

"Resolved, That the senators from this state in the congress of the United States be instructed, and the representatives requested, to use their exertions to obtain a renewal of the charter of the bank of the United States during the present session of congress—with such alterations (if any be necessary) as may secure the rights of the states."

So decided was the feeling in regard to the bank—that at the same session, while the question of rechartering the bank was under deliberation in congress, the following resolution was passed unanimously by both branches:

"Resolved, That connected as the prosperity of agriculture and commerce is with the successful financial operations and sound currency of the country, we view the rechartering of the bank of the U. S. as of vital importance to the public welfare."

The representatives in congress shared these opinions of their state—for out of their thirty votes, only a solitary member voted against the recharter of the bank.

All these proceedings of Pennsylvania were wholly voluntary—the stockholders of the bank taking no part whatever in them.

The bill passed by congress rechartering the bank being vetoed by the president, the bank began to make preparation for closing its concerns and distributing the capital among the stockholders. The division would have been as follows:

There were, in all, 3,417 stockholders:—Of whom there were Pennsylvanians 590, other citizens of the United States 2,267, foreigners 560.

To these the funds would be appropriated, as follows:

To the New England states,	$3,111,000
New York and New Jersey,	4,569,000
Delaware, Maryland and the District of Columbia,	2,027,000
Virginia and North Carolina,	894,000
South Carolina and Georgia,	3,081,000
Other states,	99,000
Foreigners,	9,168,000
The government of the U. S.	6,278,000
Pennsylvania,	5,219,000

From this you will perceive that Pennsylvania, owning little more than five millions, had the use and management of thirty-five millions, of capital, and those who governed Pennsylvania very naturally reasoned thus:

Pennsylvania has embarked in a great system of improvement, which has already cost more than twenty millions of dollars. She will want more.—But if the currency is deranged, she will not be able to borrow, and her citizens must pay back the ten or twelve millions which they owe to the bank, to be dispersed among rival states or sent to Europe. Will it not be wiser to retain the capital for Pennsylvania? There is no inconsistency in doing so.—Pennsylvania has done all in her power to preserve the bank as a national institution. Failing in this, if the union will not share with her its benefits, let no one complain that she appropriates them to herself. Under the influence of such views, Pennsylvania saw with anxiety the approach of the end of the charter. The directors meanwhile went on quietly winding up its concerns. They did not apply to the legislature of Pennsylvania, nor to any other legislature, for a charter of the bank. At last, when it became evident that the capital of the institution would leave Pennsylvania, a movement was made in the legislature. It began by a joint letter from the chairman of the committee of ways and means, and the chairman of the committee on banks, to the president, asking whether the bank would accept a charter from Pennsylvania. The letter is in these words:

"Harrisburgh, January 5, 1836.

"DEAR SIR: We have been informed that the stockholders of the U. S. bank would accept a charter from this state. It is proper, in our opinion, that this subject should, as soon as possible, be brought before the action of the legislature.

"We therefore take the liberty of addressing you as the organ of that institution on the subject.

"Be good enough to inform us upon what terms this can be effected. You will understand us: we wish to know the number of years that you would be satisfied to be chartered for—the amount of capital—also, the premium and other encouragements that would be given to the state in consideration thereof.

"You need not confine your answer to these particulars, as much additional information will be proper. Yours,

JOHN H. WALKER,
E. F. PENNYPACKER.

"N. BIDDLE, esq."

This was the first step in the charter of the bank. No memorial, no solicitation from the bank itself, but a formal and official application from the legislature to the bank, inquiring if the "bank would accept a charter from this state"—"upon what terms this can be effected"—"the number of years that you would be satisfied to be chartered for"—"the premium and other encouragements that would be given to the state."

The president of the bank, in his reply, put the subject on this footing:

"The question you perceive is, what inducements can be offered to the stockholder in the other parts of the union, or in other countries, to leave his funds in Pennsylvania rather than recall them home to be employed elsewhere. As a Pennsylvanian, devotedly attached to the interests and the fame of our state, I would give more to Pennsylvania than to any other state for the charter, and would endeavor to induce the other stockholders to do the same; yet where there are so many other states possessing equal power to grant a charter, the effort would of course be fruitless unless the charter from Pennsylvania, while it was beneficial to the state, presented a reasonable prospect of not being too burdensome to the stockholder. Both these objects should be, and I think can be, attained;—and he proceeded to explain what he deemed the true basis of an arrangement.

Accordingly, a bill passed for chartering the bank, "not to take effect until it shall have been accepted by the stockholders at a general meeting."

The stockholders, to whom this charter was thus offered, proceeded to examine it. They saw at once that the terms were very onerous: There were to be paid in money, $4,500,000
In subscriptions to internal improvements, 675,000
In premiums on loans when wanted by the state, 600,000

Making $5,775,000 besides other advantages. Nevertheless they resolved to accept it—partly because they had reserved out of their former earnings the means of paying the bonus, and partly because they were induced by the Pennsylvania stockholders to believe that when once the faith of the state was pledged to them, the character and the honor of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania were a sufficient guarantee against any invasion of their rights. This guarantee was given not merely under the usual solemnities of legislation, but especial care was taken by the legislature to satisfy these stockholders that if they accepted the charter they would never be disturbed. Thus, in the progress of the bill through the house of representatives, a section, (the 5th section), was introduced to this effect: "If it shall appear that the charter and privileges granted by this act are injurious to the citizens of this commonwealth, the legislature reserve full power to alter, revoke or annul any of them, at any time they may think proper."

The effect of that provision in exposing the rights of strangers to the caprice of a future legislature became obvious, and accordingly that 5th section was reconsidered in the house of representatives and amended as follows: "That if the said corporation, at any time during the continuance of the charter, shall abuse or misuse the privileges and powers hereby granted, then this charter shall be forfeited, and the said powers and privileges shall cease and become void."

To this it was objected that it might enable the legislature to claim the right of judging of these alleged abuses, and they were distinctly and decidedly informed, that if when the charter was offered to the stockholders it contained any such provision, it would be certainly and instantly rejected by them. Accordingly, when the bill reached the senate, a motion was made to strike out this fifth section, and substitute a provision, exactly similar to that in the old charter, that the fact of any violation of the charter should be first determined by the courts, before the legislature could repeal it. This passed by a unanimous vote of the senate—every member being in his place. And all attempts to give the uncontrolled right of repeal to the legislature were negatived.

Thus, a motion was made to amend as follows: "The privileges hereby granted to said bank shall be subject to such alterations and restrictions as the legislature may at any time hereafter think proper to enact for the better regulation of the banking institutions of this commonwealth, and shall be liable to such taxes, whether on dividends or otherwise, as the legislature may at any time hereafter impose."

It was rejected by a vote of eleven to twenty-two, being two to one.

Again—A motion was made to amend as follows: "Also, if it shall appear that the charter and privileges by this act granted to the bank herein mentioned, are injurious to the citizens of this commonwealth, the legislature reserve full power to alter, revoke and annul them, or any of them, at any time they may think proper."

This was rejected by a vote of twenty-one to twelve.

The facts thus briefly stated, present this case—A certain number of citizens of other states and other countries had a large amount of capital which they were about to withdraw from Pennsylvania. All the authorities of Pennsylvania interpose to prevent what they deem injurious to the state—they request these distant citizens to leave their funds in the state—they pass a law offering certain inducements for them to remain—and declare that if they will consent to stay, they shall never be disturbed. They trust to these promises. They pay a large sum of money with which the legislature is enabled to dispense with the taxes in Pennsylvania—to continue the public works in Pennsylvania—and to educate gratuitously the citizens of Pennsylvania. They do more—they subscribe voluntarily half a million of dollars to other Pennsylvania improvements—they establish three branches to lend money to citizens of Pennsylvania—they resume their active business in Philadelphia which probably saved that city and the whole state from the general bankruptcy which would have followed the winding up of its affairs. And now after all this, certain persons are endeavoring to induce the people of Pennsylvania to violate this solemn engagement—to break the plighted faith of the commonwealth—and to annul a contract which it voluntarily sought, nay, solicited from these strangers.

You will naturally ask by what process this is to be accomplished. There is a difference of opinion—some thinking it should be done by the legislature—others, by the convention—some, with a return of the bonus—some, without it. Now, none of these will be done—or can be done—and not one of them will even be attempted.

The difficulty with the legislature is this:—They asked the stockholders to take the charter—they received the stockholders' money and gave the charter. Now, if this is not a bargain—a contract—what is? What difference is there between this and the other engagements of the state? It takes my money and gives a paper declaring that I own certain land. It takes your money and gives you a certificate of debt—to another it says, build a bridge, or a canal, or a rail road, and you shall have a paper declaring that you may take toll. They all stand on the same footing. The constitution of Pennsylvania forbids the legislature from violating any one of such engagements. It contains what it calls "a declaration of rights," as follows:

"That the general, great and essential principles of liberty and free government may be recognized and unalterably established, we declare

"That no ex post facto law, nor any law impairing contracts, shall be made."

How, then, can the legislature make a law violating its own contracts? Even were it disposed to do so, it is forbidden by a power still higher than the legislature, or even the constitution, of Pennsylvania.

The constitution of the United States is a guarantee by all the states against any wrong done by any one state. That instrument declares that "this constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby—anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding; and that constitution declares that "no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." So obvious is this, that even Mr. Geo. M. Dallas, saw it. The character, he says, "is essentially a contract made by at least our nominal representatives with numerous persons, nine-tenths of whom are strangers to our soil, and each of whom contributed, in the payment of the bonus, some portion of his private property in execution of his share of its stipulations." "The rights which it imparted are now absolutely vested, and the constitution of the United States prohibits any state from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts." "I am aware," he adds, "of the natural and prevailing impression that the next general assembly might be called upon to pronounce the incorporating act null and void, on the ground of its having been fraudulently, surreptitiously and corruptly obtained." "But such a movement violates fixed maxims—making declamation equivalent to proof, forfeiting private property, and passing sentence of infamy without judicial trial. We must not debase our pursuit by any such hypocritical pageantry and summary injustice." And accordingly he recommends as the only remedy, the convention. But if the legislature cannot do it, how can the convention do it?

The convention is a body created under a law of the state, entitled "an act to provide for calling a convention with limited powers."

The act declares that the convention shall have power to propose amendments of the constitution, to the people, for their ratification or rejection, and "no other or greater powers whatsoever." "To propose amendments to the constitution." Well—what is there in the constitution about the bank? How can its repeal be put into the constitution? and if it were in the constitution, what force would it have against the paramount power of the constitution of the United States, which declares that no state shall impair the obligation of a contract, either by its laws and its constitution.

If then the legislature or the convention were to attempt such a breach of faith, not merely the people of Pennsylvania, but the people of the other states, whose citizens will be thus defrauded by Pennsylvania, would unite in putting down this usurpation.

But there is not the slightest danger that either the legislature or the convention will make this abortive attempt. There are not twenty men in Pennsylvania who would not scorn thus to degrade this ancient and honorable commonwealth. Nevertheless, that question shall be tried before the convention. It involves interests far deeper than the temporary existence of the bank—it concerns the whole character of our free institutions. If a convention in Pennsylvania can dissolve the obligations contracted by the legislature, so can a convention in New York or Virginia. If, when a legislature has pledged the faith of the state, its members may disperse, and reappearing in a few months as delegates to a convention, annul all the acts of that legislature—there can be no safety in dealing with the states. The hundred millions of money lent by Europeans on the pledge of the faith of the states—the thousand millions invested on the security of the engagements of the states, the titles to lands, and to all other property, bridges, turnpikes, canals, rail roads, banks, every private right, every corporate power, are wholly at the mercy of the state authorities, call them as you please, legislatures or conventions. The whole institutions of the country would become frauds. This must not be. It must be decided whether this Pennsylvania of ours is a virtuous community or a mere society of plunderers—nor will the honor of the state be relieved, either at home or abroad, from the stain which a few small politicians wish to fix upon her, until the convention adopts some solemn declaration that there is no power in this nation capable of violating the sacred engagements of the state authorities.—That should be done, and, if any efforts of mine may avail, that shall be done for the honor of this state, for the character of her sister states, and for the stability of all popular institutions. In the mean time there is not the least reason for anxiety about it. The question was agitated merely for the election and expired with it, and there is no party in the state at all desirous of resuming a controversy, which can only distract and injure the commonwealth. With great respect and regard,

Yours,
Hon. John Q. Adams, Washington, D. C.

INDIAN STREAM DIFFICULTIES.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS
To his excellency the governor of the state of New Hampshire.

The undersigned, commissioners, appointed under a resolution of the legislature of New Hampshire, approved June 18, 1836, "to repair to Indian Stream and collect and arrange such testimony as may be obtained to rebut and explain the charges and testimony obtained and preferred against the authorities and citizens of this state by lord Gosford, governor of the province of Lower Canada," have attended to that duty and now make the following report:

The charges made by lord Gosford are the three following, viz:

1. "The first and most serious is the irruption within the limits of this province (Lower Canada) of armed citizens of the United States, under the command of, or countenanced by an officer holding a commission in their militia, for the avowed purpose of attacking and forcibly carrying out of the province, several of H. M.'s subjects."

2. "The continued attempts of the state of New Hampshire, notwithstanding the repeated remonstrances of H. M.'s government, to exercise jurisdiction and to enforce its laws within a territory, which, until it shall be formally adjudged to be part of the United States, under the treaty of 1785, must be considered as still undetached from the original possession of Great Britain, and its inhabitants consequently within the protection of her government."

3. "The military occupation, by the state of New Hampshire, of the territory in question."

The commissioners, in order to present to your excellency and to the honorable legislature of the state a plain and intelligible account of the controversy relating to the Indian Stream territory, have given to the subject a more extended examination than was necessary simply to rebut and explain the charges of lord Gosford. The following statement of facts, it is believed, will clearly and unequivocally justify the state of New Hampshire in maintaining jurisdiction over this territory, and show that all the acts of violence there committed, are to be entirely attributed to the attempt of certain individuals in Lower Canada to extend the authority of that province over the territory in question, since the pretended award of the king of the Netherlands, the state of New Hampshire having exercised quiet, peaceable and exclusive jurisdiction over the same from the peace of 1783 to a period subsequent to said pretended award. In the year 1789, a committee was appointed by the legislature of this state for the purpose of ascertaining the boundary lines between the state of Maine, then Massachusetts the province of Lower Canada, and this state. This committee attended to the duties assigned them, and established and marked by suitable monuments, many of which are now remaining, a boundary line of the state, including all the territory now in dispute, and making the head of Hall's river our northwestern boundary monument. That the committee were right in their construction of that part of the treaty of 1783, relative to this subject is manifest from the following:

1. This is the only head of Connecticut river that intersects with the highlands dividing the waters which fall into the Atlantic from those which fall into the St. Lawrence.

2. This is manifestly and notoriously, by far, the most north westernmost head of Connecticut river, that claimed by the British government being manifestly the most NORTH EASTERN head of Connecticut river.

3. The Magalloway river, a branch of the Androscoggin, takes its rise many miles north and west, not only of that branch of the Connecticut claimed by the British as the north westernmost head, but also north and west of Indian Stream, so that pursuing the highlands indicated by the treaty, one would never arrive at the head waters claimed by the British government as those indicated by the treaty, but would have to leave the highlands and cross the Magalloway river to attain the object.

The above fact of the true source of the Magalloway river, it is believed, is not noticed in any geography nor laid down upon any map of the country. This may be easily accounted for on account of its remote situation and unsettled state. It is nevertheless an important fact, and one which goes far not only to show that the British claim to jurisdiction over this disputed territory is unfounded, but that by the words of the treaty, New Hampshire is entitled to a much larger territory there, than we have ever yet claimed. Many of the first settlements of this territory were by persons who fled there from the neighboring states to avoid the payment of their debts, or the criminal process to which their crimes had rendered them amenable. As the population increased, the character of the inhabitants improved; and although at times some of them claimed to belong to Vermont, and at other times to Maine, and at other times to be within the jurisdiction of the United States, but not of any particular state, and at other times to be independent either of United States government or the government of Great Britain, yet the officers of the state of New Hampshire, from time to time, as occasion required, executed divers processes issuing from the courts of this state, upon the inhabitants there, and although sometimes they met with such resistance as was to be expected from the character of the inhabitants, yet no complaint was ever made on account thereof by the officers of the province of Canada, or of any foreign government whatever. Indeed the oldest inhabitants in the territory or the towns adjacent have no recollection of ever having heard of any act of any other government ever exercised within the territory, save by the state of New Hampshire. The inhabitants have uniformly resorted to New Hampshire for the purpose of being united in marriage whenever there was such a ceremony to be performed among them, and in divers other ways, such as taking advantage of our bounty laws for the destruction of certain wild animals, manifested under whose protection they lived, and to what government they supposed they owed allegiance. Affairs were in this quiet posture at this place at the time of the pretended award of the king of the Netherlands; and at a period subsequent to that, one of those restless individuals, the bane of every well-ordered society, who are never easy unless busied about the affairs of their neighbors, claiming to be a magistrate of Lower Canada, and to be acting by the direction of the governor of that province, began to claim the territory as belonging to the province of Lower Canada. This claim was now asserted in various ways, such as sending pretended warrants in the name of the king of Great Britain, into the territory. He also sent a letter directed to various individuals there, requesting them to assemble at the school house in one place on Saturday, and another on Sunday, and when they were thus assembled he met them and exhorted them to open resistance to the laws of the state, and assured them of the protection of the government of Lower Canada in so doing.

It is the opinion of the better disposed part of the community there, that all the difficulties which have occurred at that settlement within the three or four years last past, are to be attributed to the mischievous interference of the individual alluded to, and from all the investigation which we were able to make, we were unanimously of the same opinion.

If it be the fact that Hall's stream be the north westernmost head of Connecticut river, and if the state of New Hampshire have exercised jurisdiction over this disputed territory from the peace of 1783 to the present time, and these two points are incontrovertibly proved by testimony taken by the commissioners, and accompanying this report, then the 2d and 3d cause of complaint, as set forth by lord Gosford, entirely fail, for the military occupation, spoken of by him, and the attempted jurisdiction of the state of New Hampshire, are justified by every principle of the law of nations, as well as by that protection which every government owes to its citizens.

We now proceed to state all the facts relating to the first charge of his lordship, and we have thus inverted their order because it seemed to us the most natural course, for if we had no title to the soil, then our jurisdiction was usurped and wrongful, our military occupation unjustifiable, and our whole defence untenable. In October, 1835, William M. Smith, a deputy sheriff of Coos county, had a writ put into his hands for service against one John H. Tyler, an inhabitant of the disputed territory. Smith, not knowing Tyler, and also apprehending some resistance, procured one Richard I. Blanchard and John Milton Harvey to assist him, and then proceeded to Tyler's house for the purpose of making service of the writ. Not having found said Tyler at his house, they went in pursuit of him agreeably to the directions which they had received, and soon met said Tyler. Smith then requested said Tyler to show him property, that it might be attached on the writ, which he refused to do, he was arrested by said Smith, who was proceeding with said Tyler in custody, when he was forcibly rescued from said Smith's possession by several of the inhabitants.

Upon this, the individual before referred to as the occasion of all the difficulties at this place, issued a warrant in the name of the king of Great Britain, against said Smith, Blanchard and Harvey, for attempting to execute process there, not issued by authority of the king of Great Britain, and sent it into the settlement for the purpose of having it served upon the individuals against whom it had issued. This was done with a full knowledge of the fact that this state had, by a resolution of the legislature, determined to maintain its jurisdiction over the territory until the boundary line should be definitely and satisfactorily settled.

By virtue of this pretended warrant, on the 22d day of October, A. D. 1835, said Blanchard was taken from his own dwelling house, by an armed body of men, with the express and avowed purpose of carrying him into Canada for trial, on the absurd charge of having assisted in serving a writ duly issued by the competent authority of the county of Coos.

The news of this outrage was immediately spread through the adjacent towns, and excited very great indignation against its perpetrators. The inhabitants very generally, upon being notified of the fact, expressed a determination not to suffer their fellow citizens thus to be taken from his home and carried out of the state, without an attempt at least on their part to rescue him. In pursuance of this determination, several citizens of the neighborhood went over the line dividing this state from the province of Lower Canada, for the purpose of intercepting those who had said Blanchard in custody, and effecting his release. This was effected without any violence, and so far from being done under the direction of any military officer, it was an entirely spontaneous assembly of citizens aroused by what they deemed a gross outrage upon the rights of one of their fellow citizens, subject to the direction of no military or civil officer of the state. How far this proceeding is to be palliated or justified, the wisdom of the legislature may best determine. The facts are here stated. After said Blanchard had been thus rescued, the individuals who had turned out for that purpose, assembled at the store of Parmelee & Joy, in Canaan, Vermont. Among the number was Wm. M. Smith, the deputy sheriff before spoken of, who had previously arrested one John H. Tyler, who had been rescued from him in the manner before stated. He then offered a reward of five dollars to any one who would deliver said Tyler to him. A notion seemed very generally to prevail, amongst those who were then present, that said Tyler having once been legally made a prisoner, by the arrest of said Smith, might be retaken again wherever he could be found. This John H. Tyler was one of those who had said Blanchard in custody at the time he was rescued in the manner before stated. After Smith, the deputy sheriff, had offered this reward for the recapture of said Tyler, several of the individuals who had left their homes for the avowed and express purpose of rescuing Blanchard, unadvisedly and improperly went over the line for the purpose of retaking Tyler, they having at that time the impression that they were justified in so doing. No sooner were these individuals over the line than they were set upon in a furious, boisterous and outrageous manner by the individual before referred to, as the cause of all the difficulty at the Indian Stream settlement, and the very individual who had issued the warrant by which Blanchard had been dragged from his home as before stated.

The individual came upon them while they were peaceably and quietly demeaning themselves, having offered or threatened violence to no one, and ordered them off the highway, and attempted to make prisoners of them, and called upon those who were with him to assist. The New Hampshire citizens, not relishing the idea of thus being made prisoners, resisted, and being assaulted with great violence by the inhabitants of Canada, their horses' bridles seized, and stones thrown violently at them, defended themselves with such arms as they had with them having taken them at the time they turned out for the rescue of Blanchard. We do not undertake to state with accuracy all the particulars of the skirmish which ensued upon this assault, but we are confident in the assertion that the first violence offered or threatened was that done to citizens of New Hampshire by citizens of Canada. The result was that the individual who commenced the brawl was violently seized and brought over the line into Vermont and there detained some hours, and finally set at large.

As to the assertion that the late gov. Badger was connected with a band of speculators claiming the territory of Indian Stream as their private property, we are aware of no rule of courtesy or etiquette which requires us to call it by any milder name than falsehood.

The commissioners, in conclusion, are happy in being able to inform your excellency and the legislature, that the inhabitants of this section of our state are now in as quiet and peaceable condition, as free from internal commotion, or foreign interference, as any portion of the state whatever. The citizens there, who were friendly to the preservation of good order and the wholesome administration of the laws, and who had begun to apprehend that they were neglected, have been assured that the protecting energies of the state are extended to all within her borders, while the lawless and the vicious have been made to feel that their remote situation affords no sanctuary for crime.

We have no hesitation in saying that the people are now contented and happy under the government of the state, and that in future there will be no need of any farther aid from the militia, to assist the civil officers in the due execution of their respective duties.

The commissioners are of opinion that the measures adopted by the late governor of this state, the hon. William Badger, in relation to this subject, were wise and judicious, and that to his prompt and efficient interference to maintain the integrity of the state and dignity of the laws, is to be attributed the present quiet condition of the inhabitants there.

JOSEPH LOW,
RALPH METCALF,
JOHN P. HALE,
Commissioners.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

December 5. The senate assembled at 12 o'clock. The vice president took the chair and the senators appeared in their seats.

Mr. Ruggles, from Maine; Messrs. Hubbard and Page, from New Hampshire; Messrs. Prentiss and Swift, from Vermont; Mr. Davis from Massachusetts; Messrs. Knight and Robbins, from Rhode Island; Messrs. Niles and Tomlinson, from Connecticut; Mr. Wright, from New York; Messrs. Southard and Wall, from New Jersey; Messrs. Buchanan and McKean, from Pennsylvania; Mr. Bayard, from Delaware; Mr. Kent, from Maryland; Mr. Rives, from Virginia; Mr. King, from Georgia; Messrs. Ewing and Morris, from Ohio; Messrs. Clay and Crittenden, from Kentucky; Messrs. Grundy and White, from Tennessee; Messrs. Hendricks and Tipton, from Indiana; Messrs. Robinson and Ewing, from Illinois; Messrs. King and Moore, from Alabama; Mr. Walker, from Mississippi; Messrs. Benton and Linn, from Missouri.

Mr. Benton presented the credentials of Messrs. Fulton and Sevier, senators elect from the new state of Arkansas.

Messrs. Fulton and Sevier were qualified, and took their seats.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. Benton, and adopted:

Resolved, That the senate proceed to ascertain the classes in which the senators of the state of Arkansas shall be inserted, in conformity with the resolution of the 14th May, 1789, and as the constitution requires.

On motion of Mr. Benton, it was then Ordered, That the secretary put into the ballot box three papers of equal size, numbered 1, 2, 3. Each of the senators from the state of Arkansas shall draw out one paper. Number 1, if drawn, shall entitle the member to be placed in the class of senators whose term of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1837; number 2 in the class whose term will expire the 3d day of March, 1839; and number 3 in the class whose term will expire the 3d day of March, 1841.

It was accordingly so determined, by lot, that Mr. Sevier's term should expire in 1837, and Mr. Fulton's in 1841.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the secretary of the senate was directed to inform the house of representatives that a quorum of the senate was present, and ready to proceed to business.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, a committee was ordered to be appointed on the part of the senate, on a joint committee of both houses, to wait on the president of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of both houses of congress are assembled, and ready to receive from him such communication as he may be pleased to make.

Messrs. Grundy and Swift were appointed by the chair members of said committee, on the part of the senate.

The chair presented a communication from the secretary of the senate, with a statement of the contingent expenses of the senate for the year ending on the 3d of December, 1836. Laid on the table.

Mr. Linn offered the usual resolution to supply the members of the senate with newspapers during the session. Adopted.

The chair presented the following letter of resignation from the secretary of the senate:

Washington, December 5, 1836.

Hon. Martin Van Buren vice president of the U. S. and president of the senate:

SIR: I herewith resign the office of secretary of the senate of the United States.

Having so long possessed the confidence of the senate, and enjoyed such continued and friendly intercourse with its members, it is with feelings of deep and painful sensibility I now separate from them; and these feelings are greatly increased, when I reflect on the courtesy and kindness I have received from yourself, as the presiding officer of the senate, and on the uniform and unbroken confidence and friendship which have for so many years subsisted between us. No length of time or change of circumstances will ever efface from my mind the recollections growing out of these associations; and I shall always rejoice to hear of your prosperity and happiness, and of that of every member of the senate.

[WALTER LOWRIE.]

On motion of Mr. Benton, it was Ordered, That the chief clerk of the senate perform the duties of secretary till a secretary be appointed.

Mr. Machen accordingly took the requisite oath. Messrs. McKean, Tomlinson and Hendricks were appointed by the chair, on motion of Mr. Wall, as the committee of accounts of the senate.

A message was received from the house of representatives, by Mr. Franklin, their clerk, informing the senate that a quorum of the house had assembled, and had appointed on their part members of a joint committee to wait on the president of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the senate adjourned till 12 o'clock to-morrow.

December 6. Mr. Grundy, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the president of the United States, informed the senate that they had performed the duty assigned them, and that the president had expressed to them his intention to make a communication to the two houses of congress this day at 12 o'clock.

THE ANNUAL MESSAGE

From the president of the United States was then received and read by the acting secretary, (Lewis H. Machen, esq.) as follows:

Fellow citizens of the senate and of the house of representatives,

Addressing to you the last annual message I shall ever present to the congress of the United States, it is a source of the most heartfelt satisfaction to be able to congratulate you on the high state of prosperity which our beloved country has attained with no causes at home or abroad to lessen the confidence with which we look to the future for continuing proofs of the capacity of our free institutions to produce all the fruits of good government, the general condition of our affairs may well excite our national pride.

I cannot avoid congratulating you and my country, particularly, on the success of the efforts made during my administration by the executive and legislature, in conformity with the sincere, constant and earnest desire of the people, to maintain peace, and establish cordial relations with all foreign powers. Our gratitude is due to the Supreme Ruler of the universe, and I invite you to unite with me in offering to Him fervent supplication, that his providential care may be ever extended to those who follow us, enabling them to avoid the dangers and the horrors of war, consistently with a just and indispensable regard to the rights and honor of our country. But, although the present state of our foreign affairs, standing, without important change, as they did when you separated in July last, is flattering in the extreme, I regret to say, that many questions of an interesting nature at issue with others powers are yet unadjusted. Amongst the most prominent of these is that of the north eastern boundary. With an undiminished confidence, in the sincere desire of his Britannic majesty's government to adjust that question, I am not yet in possession of the precise grounds upon which it proposes a satisfactory adjustment.

With France our diplomatic relations have been resumed, and under circumstances which attest the disposition of both governments to preserve a mutually beneficial intercourse, and foster those amicable feelings which are so strongly required by the true interests of the two countries. With Russia, Austria, Prussia, Naples, Sweden and Denmark, the best understanding exists, and our commercial intercourse is gradually expanding itself with them. It is encouraged in all these countries, except Naples, by their mutually advantageous and liberal treaty stipulations with us.

The claims of our citizens on Portugal are admitted to be just, but provision for the payment of them has been unfortunately delayed by frequent political changes in that kingdom.

The blessings of peace have not been secured by Spain. Our connections with that country are on the best footing, with the exception of the burdens still imposed upon our commerce with her possessions out of Europe.

The claims of American citizens for losses sustained at the bombardment of Antwerp have been presented to the government of Holland and Belgium, and will be pressed, in due season, to settlement.

With Brazil, and all our neighbors of this continent, we continue to maintain relations of amity and concord, extending our commerce with them as far as the resources of the people and the policy of their government will permit. The just and long standing claims of our citizens upon some of them, are yet sources of dissatisfaction and complaint. No danger is apprehended, however that they will not be peaceably, although tardily, acknowledged and paid by all, unless the irritating effect of her struggle with Texas should unfortunately make our immediate neighbor, Mexico, an exception.

It is already known to you, by the correspondence between the two governments, communicated at your last session, that our conduct in relation to that struggle is regulated by the same principles that governed us in the dispute between Spain and Mexico herself, and, I trust, that it will be found, on the most severe scrutiny, that our acts have strictly corresponded with our professions. That the inhabitants of the United States should feel strong prepossessions for the one party is not surprising. But this circumstance should, of itself, teach us great caution, least it lead us into the great error of suffering public policy to be regulated by partiality or prejudice; and there are considerations connected with the possible result of this contest between the two parties, of so much delicacy and importance to the United States, that our character requires that we should neither anticipate events, nor attempt to control them.—The known desire of the Texans to become a part of our system, although its gratification depends upon the reconciliation of various and conflicting interests, necessarily a work of time, and uncertain in itself, is calculated to expose our conduct to misconception in the eyes of the world.—There are already those who, indifferent to principle themselves, and prone to suspect the want of it in others, charge us with ambitious designs and insidious policy. You will perceive, by the accompanying documents, that the extraordinary mission from Mexico has been terminated, on the sole grounds that the obligations of this government to itself and to Mexico, under treaty stipulations, have compelled me to trust a discretionary authority to a high officer of our army, to advance into territory claimed as part of Texas, if necessary to protect our own or the neighboring frontier from Indian depredation. In the opinion of the Mexican functionary who has just left us, the honor of this country will be wounded by American soldiers entering, with the most amicable avowed purposes, upon ground from which the followers of his government have been expelled, and over which there is at present no certainty of a serious effort on its part being made to re-establish its dominion. The departure of this minister was the more singular, as he was apprised that the sufficiency of the causes assigned for the advance of our troops by the commanding general had been seriously doubted by me; and that there was every reason to suppose that the troops of the United States—their commander having had time to ascertain the truth or falsehood of the information upon which they had been marched to Nacogdoches—would be either there in perfect accordance with the principles admitted to be just in his conference with the secretary of state, by the Mexican minister himself, or were already withdrawn in consequence of the impressive warnings their commanding officer had received from the department of war. It is hoped and believed that his government will take a more dispassionate and just view of this subject, and not be disposed to construe a measure of justifiable precaution, made necessary by its known inability, in execution of the stipulations of our treaty, to act upon the frontier, into an encroachment upon its rights, or a stain upon its honor.

In the mean time, the ancient complaints of injustice, made on behalf of our citizens are disregarded, and new causes of dissatisfaction have arisen, some of them of a character requiring prompt remonstrance, and ample and immediate redress. I trust, however, by tempering firmness with courtesy, and acting with great forbearance upon every incident that has occurred, or that may happen, to do and to obtain justice, and thus avoid the necessity of again bringing this subject to the view of congress.

It is my duty to remind you, that no provision has been made to execute our treaty with Mexico for tracing the boundary line between the two countries. Whatever may be the prospect of Mexico being soon able to execute the treaty on its part, it is proper that we should be, in anticipation, prepared at all times to perform our obligations, without regard to the probable condition of those with whom we have contracted them.

The result of the confidential inquiries made into the condition and prospects of the newly declared Texian government, will be communicated to you in the course of the session.

Commercial treaties, promising great advantages to our enterprising merchants and navigators, have been formed with the distant governments of Muscat and Siam. The ratifications have been exchanged, but have not reached the department of state; copies of the treaties will be transmitted to you, if received before, or published, if arriving after the close of the present session of congress.

Nothing has occurred to interrupt the good understanding that has long existed with the Barbary powers, nor to check the good will which is gradually growing up in our intercourse with the dominions of the government of the distinguished chief of the Ottoman empire.

Information has been received at the department of state that a treaty with the emperor of Morocco has just been negotiated, which, I hope, will be received in time to be laid before the senate previous to the close of the session.

You will perceive, from the report of the secretary of the treasury, that the financial means of the country continue to keep pace with its improvement in all other respects. The receipts into the treasury during the present year, will amount to about $47,691,898; those from customs being estimated at $22,528,151; those from lands at about $24,000,000, and the residue from miscellaneous sources. The expenditures for all objects during the year, are estimated not to exceed $23,000,000, which will leave a balance in the treasury for public purposes, on the first day of January next, of about $1,723,959. This sum with, the exception five millions, will be transferred to the several states, in accordance with the provisions of the act regulating the deposits of the public money.

The unexpended balances of appropriation, on the 1st day of January next, are estimated $14,636,062, exceeding by $9,636,062, the amount which will be left in the deposit banks, subject to the draft of the treasurer of the United States, after the contemplated transfers to the several states are made. If, therefore, the future receipts should not be sufficient to meet these outstanding and future appropriations, there may be soon a necessity to use a portion of the funds deposited with the states.

The consequences apprehended, when the deposit act of the last session received a reluctant approval, have been measurably realized. Though an act merely for the deposit of the surplus moneys of the United States in the state treasuries, for safe keeping, until they may be wanted for the service of the general government, it has been extensively spoken of as an act to give the money to the several states, and they have been advised to use it as a gift, without regard to the means of refunding it when called for. Such a suggestion has doubtless been made without a due consideration of the obligation of the deposit act, and without a proper attention to the various principles and interests which are affected by it.

It is manifest that the law itself cannot sanction such a suggestion, and that, as it now stands, the states have no more authority to receive and use these deposits without intending to return them, than any deposit bank, or any individual temporarily charged with the safe keeping or application of the public money, would now have for converting the same to their private use, without the consent and against the will of the government. But independently of the violation of public faith, and moral obligation which are involved in this suggestion, when examined in reference to the terms of the present deposit act, it is believed that the considerations which should govern the future legislation of congress on this subject, will be equally conclusive against the adoption of any measure recognizing the principles on which the suggestion has been made.

Considering the intimate connection of the subject with the financial interests of the country, and its great importance in whatever aspect it can be viewed, I have bestowed upon it the most anxious reflection, and feel it to be my duty to state to congress such thoughts as have occurred to me, to aid their deliberation in treating it in the manner best calculated to conduce to the common good.

The experience of other nations admonished us to hasten the extinguishment of the public debt. But it will be in vain that we have congratulated each other upon the disappearance of this evil, if we do not guard against the equally great one of promoting the unnecessary accumulation of public revenue. No political maxim is better established than that which tells us that an improvident expenditure of money is the parent of profligacy, and that no people can hope to perpetuate their liberties who long acquiesce in a policy which taxes them for object not necessary to the legitimate and real wants of their government.

Flattering as is the condition of our country at the present period, because of its unexampled advance in all the steps of social and political improvement, it cannot be disguised that there is a lurking danger already apparent in the neglect of this warning truth, and that the time has arrived when the representatives of the people should be employed in devising some more appropriate remedy than now exists, to avert it.

Under our present revenue system, there is every probability that there will continue to be a surplus beyond the wants of the government; and it has become our duty to decide whether such a result be consistent with the true objects of our government.

Should a surplus be permitted to accumulate, beyond the appropriations, it must be retained in the treasury as it now is, or distributed among the people or the states.

To retain it in the treasury, unemployed in any way, is impracticable. It is, besides, against the genius of our free institutions to lock up in vaults the treasure of the nation. To take from the people the right of bearing arms, and put their weapons of defence in the hands of a standing army, would be scarcely more dangerous to their liberties than to permit the government to accumulate immense amounts of treasure beyond the supplies necessary to its legitimate wants. Such a treasure would doubtless be employed, at some time, as it has been in other countries, when opportunity tempted ambition.

To collect it merely for distribution to the states, would seem to be highly impolitic, if not as dangerous as the proposition to retain it in the treasury. The shortest reflection must satisfy every one that to require the people to pay taxes to the government merely that they may be paid back again, is sporting with the substantial interests of the country, and no system which produces such a result can be expected to receive the public countenance. Nothing could be gained by it, even if each individual who contributed a portion of the tax could receive back promptly the same portion. But it is apparent that no system of the kind can ever be enforced, which will not absorb a considerable portion of the money, to be distributed in salaries and commissions to the agents employed in the process, and in the various losses and depreciations which arise from other causes; and the practical effect of such an attempt must ever be to burden the people with taxes, not for purposes beneficial to them, but to swell the profits of deposit banks, and support a band of useless public officers.

A distribution to the people is impracticable and unjust in other respects. It would be taking one man's property and giving it to another. Such would be the unavoidable result of a rule of equality (and none other is spoken of, or would be likely to be adopted) inasmuch as there is no mode by which the amount of the individual contributions of our citizens to the public revenue can be ascertained. We know that they contribute unequally, and a rule therefore that would distribute to them equally, would be liable to all the objections which apply to the principle of an equal division of property. To make the general government the instrument of carrying this odious principle into effect, would be at once to destroy the means of its usefulness, and change the character designed for it by the framers of the constitution.

But the more extended and injurious consequences likely to result from a policy which would collect a surplus revenue for the purpose of distributing it, may be forcibly illustrated by an examination of the effects already produced by the present deposit act. This act, although certainly designed to secure the safe keeping of the public revenue, is not entirely free in its tendencies from many of the objections which apply to this principle of distribution. The government had, without necessity, received from the people a large surplus, which, instead of being employed as heretofore, and returned to them by means of the public expenditure, was deposited with sundry banks. The banks proceeded to make loans upon this surplus, and thus converted it into banking capital, and in this manner it has tended to multiply bank charters, and has had a great agency in producing a spirit of wild speculation. The possession and use of the property out of which this surplus was created belong to the people; but the government has transferred its possession to incorporated banks, whose interest and effort it is to make large profits out of its use. This process need only be stated to show its injustice and bad policy.

And the same observations apply to the influence which is produced by the steps necessary to collect, as well as to distribute such a revenue. About three-fifths of all the duties on imports are paid in the city of New York, but it is obvious that the means to pay those duties are drawn from every quarter of the union. Every citizen in every state, who purchases and consumes an article which has paid a duty at that port, contributes to the accumulating mass. The surplus collected there, must, therefore, be made up of moneys of property withdrawn from other points and other states. Thus the wealth and business of every region from which these surplus funds proceed, must be, to some extent, injured; while that of the place where the funds are concentrated, and are employed in banking, are proportionably extended. But both in making the transfer of the funds which are first necessary to pay the duties and collect the surplus—and in making the retransfer, which becomes necessary when the time arrives for the distribution of that surplus—there is a considerable period when the funds cannot be brought into use; and it is manifest that, besides the loss inevitable from such an operation, its tendency is to produce fluctuations in the business of the country, which are always productive of speculation, and detrimental to the interests of regular trade. Argument can scarcely be necessary to show that a measure of this character ought not to receive further legislative encouragement.

By examining the practical operation of the ratio for distribution, adopted in the deposit bill of the last session, we shall discover other features, that appear equally objectionable. Let it be assumed, for the sake of argument, that the surplus moneys to be deposited with the states have been collected, and belong to them, in the ratio of their federal representative population—an assumption founded upon the fact that any deficiencies in our future revenue from imports and public lands, must be made up by direct taxes, collected from the states in that ratio. It is proposed to distribute the surplus, say $30,000,000, not according to the ratio in which it has been collected and belongs to the people of the states, but in that of their votes in the colleges of electors of president and vice president. The effect of a distribution upon that ratio is shown by the annexed table, marked A. [See page 235.]

By an examination of that table, it will be perceived, that in the distribution of a surplus of $30,000,000, upon that basis, there is a great departure from the principle which regards representation as the true measure of taxation: and it will be found that the tendency of that departure will be to increase whatever inequalities have been supposed to attend the operation of our federal system in respect to its bearings upon the different interests of the union. In making the basis of representation the basis of taxation, the framers of the constitution intended to equalize the burdens which are necessary to support the government; and the adoption of that ratio, while it accomplished this object, was also the means of adjusting other great topics arising out of the conflicting views respecting the political equality of the various members of the confederacy. Whatever, therefore, disturbs the liberal spirit of the compromises which established a rule of taxation so just and equitable, and which experience has proved to be so well adapted to the genius and habits of our people, should be received with the greatest caution and distrust.

A bare inspection, in the annexed table, of the differences produced by the ratio used in the deposit act, compared with the results of a distribution according to the ratio of direct taxation, must satisfy every unprejudiced mind, that the former ratio contravenes the spirit of the constitution, and produces a degree of injustice in the operation of the federal government which would be fatal to the hope of perpetuating it. To the ratio of direct taxation, for example, the state of Delaware, in the collection of $30,000,000 of revenue, would pay into the treasury $188,716: and in a distribution of $30,000,000 she would receive back from the government, according to the ratio of the deposit bill, the sum of $306,122: and similar results would follow the comparison between the small and large states throughout the union; thus realizing to the small states an advantage which would be doubtless as unacceptable to them as a motive for incorporating the principle in any system which would produce it, as it would be inconsistent with the rights and expectations of the large states.—It was certainly the intention of that provision of the constitution which declares that "all duties, imposts and excises" shall "be uniform throughout the United States," to make the burdens of taxation fall equally upon the people in whatever state of the union they may reside. But what would be the value of such a uniform rule if the moneys raised by it could be immediately returned by a different one which will give to the people of some states much more, and to those of others much less, than their fair proportions? Were the federal government to exempt, in express terms, the imports, products and manufactures of some portions of the country from all duties, while it imposed heavy ones on others, the injustice could not be greater. It would be easy to show how, by the operation of such a principle, the large states of the union would not only have to contribute their just share towards the support of the federal government, but also have to bear in some degree the taxes necessary to support the governments of their smaller sisters; but it is deemed unnecessary to state the details where the general principle is so obvious.

A system liable to such objections can never be supposed to have been sanctioned by the framers of the constitution, when they conferred on congress the taxing power: and I feel persuaded that a mature examination of the subject will satisfy every one that there are insurmountable difficulties in the operation of any plan which can be devised of collecting revenue for the purpose of distributing it. Congress is only authorised to levy taxes "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." There is no such provision as would authorise congress to collect together the property of the country, under the name of revenue, for the purpose of dividing it equally or unequally among the states or the people. Indeed, it is not probable that such an idea ever occurred to the states when they adopted the constitution. But, however this may be, the only safe rule for us in interpreting the powers granted to the federal government, is to regard the absence of express authority to touch a subject so important and delicate as this is, as equivalent to a prohibition.

Even if our powers were less doubtful in this respect, as the constitution now stands, there are considerations afforded by recent experience, which would seem to make it our duty to avoid a resort to such a system.

All will admit that the simplicity and economy of the state governments, mainly depend on the fact that money has to be supplied to support them by the same men, or their agents, who vote it away in appropriations. Hence, when there are extravagant and wasteful appropriations, there must be a corresponding increase of taxes: and the people, becoming awakened, will necessarily scrutinize the character of measures which thus increase their burdens. By the watchful eye of self-interest, the agents of the people in the state governments are repressed, and kept within the limits of a just economy. But if the necessity of levying the taxes be taken from those who make the appropriations, and thrown upon a more distant and less responsible set of public agents, who have power to approach the people by an indirect and stealthy taxation, there is reason to fear that prodigality will soon supersede those characteristics which have thus far made us look with so much pride and confidence to the state governments, as the main stay of our union and liberties. The state legislatures, instead of studying to restrict their state expenditures to the smallest possible sum, will claim credit for their profusion, and harass the general government for increased supplies. Practically, there would soon be but one taxing power, and that vested in a body of men far removed from the people, in which the farming and mechanic interests would scarcely be represented. The states would gradually lose their purity as well as their independence; they would not dare to murmur at the proceedings of the general government, lest they should lose their supplies; all would be merged in a practical consolidation, cemented by wide-spread corruption, which could only be eradicated by one of those bloody revolutions which occasionally overthrow the despotic systems of the old world.

In all the other aspects in which I have been able to look at the effect of such a principle of distribution upon the best interests of the country, I can see nothing to compensate for the disadvantages to which I have adverted. If we consider the protective duties, which are, in a great degree, the source of the surplus revenue, beneficial to one section of the union, and prejudicial to another, there is no corrective for the evil in such a plan of distribution. On the contrary, there is reason to fear that all the complaints which have sprung from this cause would be aggravated. Every one must be sensible that a distribution of the surplus must beget a disposition to cherish the means which create it; and any system, therefore, into which it enters, must have a powerful tendency to increase, rather than diminish the tariff. If it were even admitted that the advantages of such a system could be made equal to all the sections of the union, the reasons already so urgently calling for a reduction of the revenue, would, nevertheless, lose none of their force; for it will always be improbable that an intelligent and virtuous community can consent to raise a surplus for the mere purpose of dividing it, diminished as it must inevitably be by the expenses of the various machinery necessary to the process.

The safest and simplest mode of obviating all the difficulties which have been mentioned, is to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of the government, and let the people keep the balance of the property in their own hands, to be used for their own profit. Each state will then support its own government, and contribute its due share towards the support of the general government. There would be no surplus to cramp and lessen the resources of individual wealth and enterprise, and the banks would be left to their ordinary means.—Whatever agitations and fluctuations might arise from our unfortunate paper system, they could never be attributed, justly or unjustly, to the action of the federal government. There would be some guaranty that the spirit of wild speculation, which seeks to convert the surplus revenue into banking capital, would be effectually checked, and that the scenes of demoralization, which are now so prevalent through the land, would disappear.

Without desiring to conceal that the experience and observation of the last two years, have operated a partial change in my views upon this interesting subject, it is nevertheless regretted that the suggestions made by me in my annual messages of 1829 and 1830, have been greatly misunderstood. At that time, the great struggle was begun against that latitudinarian construction of the constitution, which authorises the unlimited appropriation of the revenues of the union to internal improvements within the states, tending to invest in the hands, and place under the control, of the general government, all the principal roads and canals of the country, in violation of state rights, and in derogation of state authority. At the same time, the condition of the manufacturing interest was such as to create an apprehension that the duties on imports could not, without extensive mischief, be reduced in season to prevent the accumulation of a considerable surplus after the payment of the national debt. In view of the dangers of such a surplus, and in preference to its application to internal improvements, in derogation of the rights and powers of the states, the suggestion of an amendment of the constitution to authorise its distribution was made. It was an alternative for what were deemed greater evils—a temporary resort to relieve an overburdened treasury until the government could, without a sudden and destructive revulsion in the business of the country, gradually return to the just principle of raising no more revenue from the people, in taxes, than is necessary for its economical support. Even that alternative was not spoken of but in connection with an amendment of the constitution. No temporary inconvenience can justify the exercise of a prohibited power, or a power not granted by that instrument; and it was from a conviction that the power to distribute even a temporary surplus of revenue is of that character, that it was suggested only in connection with an appeal to the source of all legal power in the general government, the states which have established it. No such appeal has been taken, and in my opinion a distribution of the surplus revenue by congress, either to the states or the people, is to be considered as among the prohibitions of the constitution. As already intimated, my views have undergone a change, so far as to be convinced that no alteration of the constitution in this respect is wise or expedient. The influence of an accumulating surplus upon the legislation of the general government and the states, its effects upon the credit system of the country, producing dangerous extensions and ruinous contractions, fluctuations in the price of property, rash speculation, idleness, extravagance, and a deterioration of morals, have taught us the important lesson, that any transient mischief which may attend the reduction of our revenue to the wants of our government, is to be borne in preference to an overflowing treasury.

I beg leave to call your attention to another subject intimately associated with the preceding one—the currency of the country.

It is apparent, from the whole context of the constitution, as well as the history of the times which gave birth to it, that it was the purpose of the convention to establish a currency consisting of the precious metals. These, from their peculiar properties, which rendered them the standard of value in all other countries, were adopted in this, as well to establish its commercial standard in reference to foreign countries by a permanent rule, as to exclude the use of a mutable medium of exchange, such as of certain agricultural commodities, recognized by the statutes of some states as a tender for debts, or the still more pernicious expedient of a paper currency. The last, from the experience of the evils of the issues of paper during the revolution, had become so justly obnoxious, as not only to suggest the clause in the constitution forbidding the emission of bills of credit by the states, but also to produce that vote in the convention which negatived the proposition to grant power to congress to charter corporations—a proposition well understood at the time, as intended to authorise the establishment of a national bank, which was to issue a currency of bank notes, on a capital to be created to some extent out of government stocks. Although this proposition was refused by a direct vote of the convention, the object was afterwards in effect obtained, by its ingenious advocates, through a strained construction of the constitution. The debts of the revolution were funded, at prices which formed no equivalent compared with the nominal amount of the stock, and under circumstances which exposed the motives of some of those who participated in the passage of the act to distrust.

The facts that the value of the stock was greatly enhanced by the creation of the bank, that it was well understood that such would be the case, and that some of the advocates of the measure were largely benefitted by it, belong to the history of the times, and are well calculated to diminish the respect which might otherwise have been due to the action of the congress which created the institution.

On the establishment of a national bank, it became the interest of its creditors, that gold should be superseded by the paper of the bank, as a general currency. A value was soon attached to the gold coins, which made their exportation to foreign countries, as a mercantile commodity, more profitable than their retention and use at home as money. It followed, as a matter of course, if not designed by those who established the bank, that the bank became, in effect, a substitute for the mint of the United States.

Such was the origin of a national bank currency, and such the beginning of those difficulties which now appear in the excessive issues of the banks incorporated by the various states.

Although it may not be possible, by any legislative means within our power, to change at once the system which has thus been introduced, and has received the acquiescence of all portions of the country, it is certainly our duty to do all that is consistent with our constitutional obligations in preventing the mischiefs which are threatened by its undue extension. That the efforts of the fathers of our government to guard against it by a constitutional provision were founded on an intimate knowledge of the subject, has been frequently attested by the bitter experience of the country. The same causes which led them to refuse their sanction to a power authorising the establishment of incorporations for banking purposes, now exist in a much stronger degree to urge us to exert the utmost vigilance in calling into action the means necessary to correct the evils resulting from the unfortunate exercise of the power, and it is to be hoped that the opportunity for effecting this great good, will be improved before the country witnesses new scenes of embarrassment and distress.

Variableness must ever be the characteristic of a currency, of which the precious metals are not the chief ingredient, or which can be expanded or contracted without regard to the principles that regulate the value of those metals as a standard in the general trade of the world. With us bank issues constitute a currency, and must ever do so until they are made dependent on those just proportions of gold and silver, as a circulating medium, which experience has proved to be necessary, not only in this, but in all other commercial countries. Where those proportions are not infused into the circulation, and do not control it, it is manifest that prices must vary according to the tide of bank issues, and the value and stability of property must stand exposed to all the uncertainty which attends the administration of institutions that are constantly liable to the temptation of an interest distinct from that of the community in which they are established.

The progress of an expansion, or rather a depreciation of the currency, by excessive bank issues, is always attended by a loss to the laboring classes. This portion of the community have neither time nor opportunity to watch the ebbs and flows of the money market. Engaged from day to day in their useful toils, they do not perceive that although their wages are nominally the same, or even somewhat higher, they are greatly reduced in fact by the rapid increase of a spurious currency, which, as it appears to make money abound, they are at first inclined to consider a blessing. It is not so with the speculator, by whom this operation is better understood, and is made to contribute to his advantage. It is not until the prices of the necessities of life become so dear that the laboring classes cannot supply their wants out of their wages, that the wages rise, and gradually reach a justly proportioned rate to that of the products of their labor. When thus by the depreciation in consequence of the quantity of paper in circulation, wages as well as prices become exorbitant, it is soon found that the whole effect of the adulteration is a tariff on our home industry for the benefit of the countries where gold and silver circulate, and maintain uniformity and moderation in prices. It is then perceived that the enhancement of the price of land and labor produces a corresponding increase in the price of products, until these products do not sustain a competition with similar ones in other countries; and thus both manufactured and agricultural productions cease to bear exportation from the country of the spurious currency, because they cannot be sold for cost. This is the process by which specie is banished by the paper of the banks. Their vaults are soon exhausted to pay for foreign commodities, the next step is a stoppage of specie payment; a total degradation of paper as a currency; unusual depression of prices; the ruin of debtors, and the accumulation of property in the hands of creditors and cautious capitalists.

It was in view of these evils, together with the dangerous power wielded by the bank of the United States, and its repugnance to our constitution, that I was induced to exert the power conferred upon me by the American people, to prevent the continuance of that institution. But, although various dangers to our republican institutions have been obviated by the failure of that bank to extort from the government a renewal of its charter, it is obvious that little has been accomplished, except a salutary change of public opinion, towards restoring to the country the sound currency provided for in the constitution. In the acts of several of the states prohibiting the circulation of small notes, and the auxiliary enactments of congress at the last session forbidding their reception or payment on public account, the true policy of the country has been advanced, and a larger portion of the precious metals infused into our circulating medium. These measures will probably be followed up, in due time, by the enactment of state laws banishing from circulation bank notes of still high denominations; and the object may be materially promoted by further acts of congress, forbidding the employment, as fiscal agents, of such banks as continue to issue notes of low denominations, and throw impediments in the way of the circulation of gold and silver.

The effects of an extension of bank credits and over issues of bank paper, have been strikingly illustrated in the sales of the public lands. From the returns made by the various registers and receivers in the early part of last summer, it was perceived that the receipts arising from the sales of the public lands were increasing to an unprecedented amount. In effect, however, these receipts amounted to nothing more than credits in bank. The banks lent out their notes to speculators; they were paid to the receivers, and immediately returned to the banks, to be lent out again and again, being mere instruments to transfer to speculators the most valuable public land, and pay the government by a credit on the books of the banks. Those credits on the books of some of the western banks, usually called deposits, were already greatly beyond their immediate means of payment, and were rapidly increasing. Indeed each speculation furnished means for another; for no sooner had one individual or company paid in the notes, than they were immediately lent to another for a like purpose, and the banks were extending their business and their issues so largely, as to alarm considerate men, and render it doubtful whether these bank credits, if permitted to accumulate, would ultimately be of the least value to the government. The spirit of expansion and speculation was not confined to the deposit banks, but pervaded the whole multitude of banks throughout the union, and was giving rise to new institutions to aggravate the evil.

The safety of the public funds, and the interest of the people generally, required that these operations should be checked; and it became the duty of every branch of the general and state governments to adopt all legitimate and proper means to produce the salutary effect. Under this view of my duty, I directed the issuing of the order which will be laid before you by the secretary of the treasury, requiring payment for the public lands to be sold to be made in specie, with an exception until the 15th of the present month, in favor of actual settlers. This measure has produced many salutary consequences. It checked the career of the western banks, and gave them additional strength in anticipation of the pressure which has since pervaded our eastern as well as the European commercial cities. By preventing the extension of the credit system, it measurably cut off the means of speculation, and retarded its progress in monopolizing the most valuable of the public lands. It has tended to save the new states from a non-resident proprietorship, one of the greatest obstacles to the advancement of a new country and the prosperity of an old one. It has tended to keep open the public lands for entry by emigrants at government prices, instead of their being compelled to purchase of speculators at double or treble prices. And it is conveying into the interior large sums in silver and gold, there to enter permanently into the currency of the country, and place it on a firmer foundation. It is confidently believed that the country will find in the motives which induced that order, and the happy consequences which will have ensued, much to commend and nothing to condemn.

It remains for congress, if they approve the policy which dictated this order, to follow it up in its various bearings. Much good, in my judgment, would be produced by prohibiting sales of the public lands, except to actual settlers, at a reasonable reduction of price, and to limit the quantity which shall be sold to them. Although it is believed the general government never ought to receive any thing but the constitutional currency in exchange for the public lands, that point would be of less importance if the lands were sold for immediate settlement and cultivation. Indeed, there is scarcely a mischief arising out of our present land system, including the accumulating surplus of revenue, which would not be remedied at once by a restriction on land sales to actual settlers; and it promises other advantages to the country in general, and to the new states in particular, which cannot fail to receive the most profound consideration of congress.

Experience continues to realize the expectations entertained as to the capacity of the state banks to perform the duties of fiscal agents for the government, at the time of the removal of the deposits. It was alleged by the advocates of the bank of the United States that the state banks, whatever might be the regulations of the treasury department, could not make the transfers required by the government, or negotiate the domestic exchanges of the country. It is now well ascertained that the real domestic exchanges performed, through discounts, by the U. States bank and its twenty-five branches, were at least one-third less than those of the deposit banks for an equal period of time; and if a comparison be instituted between the amounts of service rendered by these institutions, on the broader basis which has been used by the advocates of the United States bank in estimating what they consider the domestic exchanges transacted by it, the result will be still more favorable to the deposit banks.

The whole amount of public money transferred by the bank of the United States in 1832, was $16,000,000. The amount transferred and actually paid by the deposit banks in the year ending the first of October last, was $39,319,899; the amount transferred and paid between that period and the sixth of November, was $5,389,000; and the amount of transfer warrants outstanding on that day was $14,450,000; making an aggregate of $59,168,894. These enormous sums of money first mentioned have been transferred with the greatest promptitude and regularity, and the rates at which the exchanges have been negotiated previously to the passage of the deposit act, were generally below those charged by the bank of the United States. Independently of these services, which are far greater than those rendered by the United States bank, and its twenty-five branches, a number of the deposit banks have, with a commendable zeal to aid in the improvement of the currency, imported from abroad, at their own expense, large sums of the precious metals, for coinage and circulation.

In the same manner have nearly all the predictions turned out in respect to the effect of the removal of the deposits—a step unquestionably necessary, to prevent the evils which it was foreseen the bank itself would endeavor to create, in a final struggle to procure a renewal of its charter. It may be thus, too, in some degree, with the further steps which may be taken to prevent the excessive issue of other bank paper; but it is to be hoped that nothing will now deter the federal and state authorities from the firm and vigorous performance of their duties to themselves and to the people in this respect.

In reducing the revenue to the wants of the government, your particular attention is invited to those articles which constitute the necessities of life. The duty on salt was laid as a war tax, and was no doubt continued to assist in providing for the payment of the war debt. There is no article the release of which from taxation would be felt so generally and so beneficially. To this may be added all kinds of fuel and provisions. Justice and benevolence unite in favor of releasing the poor of our cities from burdens which are not necessary to the support of our government, and tend only to increase the wants of the destitute.

It will be seen by the report of the secretary of the treasury, and the accompanying documents, that the bank of the United States has made no payment on account of the stock held by the government in that institution, although urged to pay any portion which might suit its convenience, and that it has given no information when payment may be expected. Nor, although repeatedly requested, has it furnished the information in relation to its condition, which congress authorised the secretary to collect at their last session; such measures as are within the power of the executive, have been taken to ascertain the value of the stock, and procure the payment as early as possible.

The conduct and present condition of that bank, and the great amount of capital vested in it by the United States, require your careful attention. Its charter expired on the 3d day of March last, and it has now no power but that given in the 21st section "to use the corporate name, style and capacity for the purpose of suits for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estates, real, personal and mixed, but not for any other purpose, or in any other manner whatsoever, nor for a period exceeding two years after the expiration of the said term of incorporation." Before the expiration of the charter, the stockholders of the bank obtained an act of incorporation from the legislature of Pennsylvania, excluding only the United States. Instead of proceeding to wind up their concerns, and pay over to the United States the amount due on account of the stock held by them, the president and directors of the old bank appear to have transferred the books, papers, notes, obligations, and most or all of its property to this new corporation, which entered upon business as a continuation of the old concern. Amongst other acts of questionable validity, the notes of the expired corporation are known to have been used as its own, and again put in circulation. That the old bank had no right to issue or reissue its notes after the expiration of its charter, cannot be denied, and that it could not confer any such right on its substitute, any more than exercise it itself, is equally plain. In law and honesty, the notes of the bank in circulation, at the expiration of its charter, should have been called in by public advertisement, paid up as presented, and, together with those on hand, cancelled and destroyed. Their reissue is sanctioned by no law, and warranted by no necessity. If the United States be responsible in their stock for the payment of these notes, their reissue, by the new corporation, for their own profit, is a fraud on the government. If the United States is not responsible, then there is no legal responsibility in any quarter, and it is a fraud on the country.—They are the redeemed notes of a dissolved partnership, but, contrary to the wishes of the retiring partner, and without his consent, are again re-issued and circulated.

It is the high and peculiar duty of congress to decide whether any further legislation be necessary for the security of the large amount of public property now held and in use by the new bank, and for vindicating the rights of the government, and compelling a speedy and honest settlement with all the creditors of the old bank, public and private, or whether the subject shall be left to the power now possessed by the executive and judiciary. It remains to be seen whether the persons, who, as managers of the old bank, undertook to control the government, retained the public dividends, shut their doors upon a committee of the house of representatives, and filled the country with panic to accomplish their own sinister objects, may now, as managers of a new bank, continue with impunity to flood the country with a spurious currency, use the seven millions of government stock for their own profit, and refuse to the United States all information as to the present condition of their own property, and the prospect of recovering it into their own possession.

The lessons taught by the bank of the United States cannot well be lost upon the American people. They will take care never again to place so tremendous a power in irresponsible hands, and it will be fortunate if they seriously consider the consequences which are likely to result on a smaller scale from the facility with which corporate powers are granted by their state government.

It is believed that the law of the last session regulating the deposit banks, operates onerously and unjustly upon them in many respects: and it is hoped that congress, on proper representation, will adopt the modifications which are necessary to prevent this consequence.

The report of the secretary of war, ad interim, and the accompanying documents, all which are herewith laid before you, will give you a full view of the diversified and important operations of that department during the past year.

The military movements rendered necessary by the aggressions of the hostile portions of the Seminole and Creek tribes of Indians, and by other circumstances, have required the active employment of nearly our whole regular force, including the marine corps, and of large bodies of militia and volunteers. With all these events, so far as they were known at the seat of government before the termination of your last session, you are already acquainted; and it is therefore only needful in this place to lay before you a brief summary of what has since occurred.

The war with the Seminoles, during the summer, was on our part, chiefly confined to the protection of our frontier settlements, from the incursions of the enemy; and as a necessary and important means for the accomplishment of that end, to the maintenance of the posts previously established. In the course of this duty several actions took place, in which the bravery and discipline of both officers and men were conspicuously displayed, and which I have deemed it proper to notice, in respect to the former, by the granting of brevet rank for gallant services in the field. But as the force of the Indians was not so far weakened by these partial successes, as to lead them to submit, and as their savage incursions were frequently repeated, early measures were taken for placing at the disposal of governor Call, who, as commander-in-chief of the territorial militia, had been temporarily invested with the command, an ample force, for the purpose of resuming offensive operations, in the most efficient manner, so soon as the season should permit. Major general Jesup was also directed on the conclusion of his duties in the Creek country, to repair to Florida, and assume the command.

The result of the first movement made by the forces under the direction of governor Call, in October last, as detailed in the accompanying papers, excited much surprise and disappointment. A full explanation has been required of the causes which led to the failure of that movement, but has not yet been received. In the mean time, as it was feared that the health of governor Call, who was understood to have suffered much from sickness, might not be adequate to the crisis, and as major general Jesup was known to have reached Florida, that officer was directed to assume the command, and to prosecute all needful operations with the utmost promptitude and vigor. From the force at his disposal, and the dispositions he has made and is instructed to make, and from the very efficient measures which it is since ascertained have been taken by governor Call, there is reason to hope that they will soon be enabled to reduce the enemy to subjection. In the mean time, as you will perceive from the report of the secretary, there is urgent necessity for further appropriations to suppress these hostilities.

Happily for the interests of humanity, the hostilities with the Creeks have been brought to a close soon after your adjournment, without that effusion of blood which at one time was apprehended as inevitable. The unconditional submission of the hostile party was followed by their speedy removal to the country assigned them west of the Mississippi. The inquiry as to alleged frauds in the purchase of the reservations of these Indians, and the causes of these hostilities, requested by the resolution of the house of representatives of the 1st of July last, to be made by the president, is now going on, through the agency of commissioners appointed for that purpose. Their report may be expected during your present session.

The difficulties apprehended in the Cherokee country have been prevented, and the peace and safety of that region and its vicinity effectually secured, by the timely measures taken by the war department, and still continued.

The discretionary authority given to gen. Gaines to cross the Sabine, and to occupy a position as far west as Nacogdoches, in case he should deem such a step necessary to the protection of the frontier, and to the fulfilment of the stipulations contained in our treaty with Mexico, and the movements subsequently made by that officer, have been alluded to in a former part of this message. At the date of the latest intelligence from Nacogdoches, our troops were yet at that station; but the officer who has succeeded gen. Gaines has recently been advised that, from the facts known at the seat of government, there would seem to be no adequate cause for any longer maintaining that position; and he was accordingly instructed, in case the troops were not already withdrawn under the discretionary powers before possessed by him, to give the requisite orders for that purpose on the receipt of the instructions, unless he shall then have in his possession such information as shall satisfy him that the maintenance of the post is essential to the protection of our frontiers, and to the due execution of our treaty stipulations, as previously explained to him.

Whilst the necessities existing during the present year, for the service of militia and volunteers, have furnished new proofs of the patriotism of our fellow citizens, they have also strongly illustrated the importance of an increase in the rank and file the regular army. The views of this subject submitted by the secretary of war, in his report, meet my entire concurrence; and are earnestly commended to the deliberate attention of congress. In his connection it is also proper to remind you, that the defects in our present militia system are every day rendered more apparent. The duty of making further provision by law for organizing, arming and disciplining this arm of defence has been so repeatedly presented to congress by myself and my predecessors, that I deem it sufficient on this occasion to refer to the last annual message, and to former executive communications, in which the subject has been discussed.

It appears from the reports of the officers charged with mustering into service the volunteers called for under the act of congress of the last session, that more presented themselves at the place of rendezvous in Tennessee than were sufficient to meet the requisition which had been made by the secretary of war upon the governor of that state. This was occasioned by the omission of the governor to apportion the requisition to the different regiments of militia, so as to obtain the proper number of troops, and no more. It seems but just to the patriotic citizens who repaired to the general rendezvous, under circumstances authorising them to believe that their services were needed, and would be accepted, that the expenses incurred by them while absent from their homes, should be paid by the government. I accordingly recommend that a law to this effect be passed by congress, giving them a compensation which will cover their expenses on the march to and from the place of rendezvous, and while there; in connection with which, it will also be proper to make provision for such other equitable claims, growing out of the service of the militia, as may not be embraced in the existing laws.

On the unexpected breaking out of hostilities in Florida, Alabama and Georgia, it became necessary, in some cases, to take the property of individuals for public use. Provision should be made by law for indemnifying the owners; and I would also respectfully suggest whether some provision may not be made, consistently with the principles of our government, for the relief of the sufferers by Indian depredations, or by the operations of our own troops.

No time was lost after the making of the requisite appropriations, in resuming the great national work of completing the unfinished fortifications on our seaboard, and of placing them in a proper state of defence. In consequence, however, of the very late day at which those bills were passed, but little progress could be made during the season which has just closed. A very large amount of the moneys granted at your last session, accordingly, remains unexpended; but as the work will be again resumed at the earliest moment in the coming spring, the balance of the existing appropriations, and in several cases, which will be laid before you with the proper estimates, further sums for the like objects, may be usefully expended during the next year.

The recommendations of an increase in the engineer corps, and for a reorganization of the topographical corps, submitted to you in my last annual message, derive additional strength from the great embarrassments experienced during the present year, in those branches of the service, and under which they are now suffering. Several of the most important surveys and constructions directed by recent laws, have been suspended in consequence of the want of adequate force in these corps. The like observations may be applied to the ordnance corps, and the general staff, the operations of which, as they are now organized, must either be frequently interrupted, or performed by officers taken from the line of the army, to the great prejudice of the service.

For a general view of the condition of the military academy, and of other branches of the military service not already noticed, as well as for fuller illustrations of those which have been mentioned, I refer you to the accompanying documents, and among the various proposals contained therein for legislative action, I would particularly notice the suggestion of the secretary of war for the revision of the pay of the army, as entitled to your favorable regard.

The national policy, founded alike in interest and in humanity, so long and so steadily pursued by this government, for the removal of the Indian tribes originally settled on this side of the Mississippi, to the west of that river, may be said to have been consummated by the conclusion of the late treaty with the Cherokees. The measures taken in the execution of that treaty, and in relation to our Indian affairs generally, will fully appear by referring to the accompanying papers. Without dwelling on the numerous and important topics embraced in them, I again invite your attention to the importance of providing a well-digested and comprehensive system for the protection, supervision and improvement of the various tribes now planted in the Indian country. The suggestions submitted by the commissioner of Indian affairs, and enforced by the secretary, on this subject, and also in regard to the establishment of additional military posts in the Indian country, are entitled to your profound consideration. Both measures are necessary for the double purpose of protecting the Indians from intestine war, and in other respects complying with our engagements to them, and of securing our western frontier against incursions, which otherwise will assuredly be made on it.—The best hopes of humanity, in regard to the aboriginal race, the welfare of our rapidly extending settlements, and the honor of the United States, are all deeply involved in the relations existing between this government and the emigrating tribes. I trust, therefore, that the various matters submitted in the accompanying documents, in respect to those relations, will receive your early and mature deliberations; and that it may issue in the adoption of legislative measures adapted to the circumstances and duties of the present crisis.

You are referred to the report of the secretary of the navy for a satisfactory view of the operations of the department under his charge, during the present year. In the construction of vessels at the different navy yards, and in the employment of our ships and squadrons at sea, that branch of the service has been actively and usefully employed.—While the situation of our commercial interests in the West Indies required a greater number than usual of armed vessels to be kept on that station, it is gratifying to perceive that the protection due to our commerce in other quarters of the world has not proved insufficient. Every effort has been made to facilitate the equipment of the exploring expedition authorised by the act of the last session, but all the preparations necessary to enable it to sail has not yet been completed. No means will be spared by the government to fit out the expedition on a scale corresponding with the liberal appropriation for the purpose, and with the elevated character of the objects which are to be effected by it.

I beg leave to renew the recommendation made in my last annual message, respecting the enlistment of boys in our naval service, and to urge upon your attention the necessity of further appropriations to increase the number of ships afloat, and to enlarge generally the capacity and force of the navy. The increase of our commerce, and our position in regard to the other powers of the world, will always make it our policy and interest to cherish the great naval resources of our country.

The report of the postmaster general presents a gratifying picture of the condition of the post office department. Its revenues for the year ending the 30th of June last, were $3,398,455 19, showing an increase of revenue over that of the preceding year of $404,878 53, or more than 13 per cent. The expenditures for the same year were $2,755,623 76, exhibiting a surplus of $642,831 43. The department has been redeemed from embarrassment and debt, has accumulated a surplus exceeding half a million of dollars, has largely extended, and is preparing still farther to extend, the mail service, and recommends a reduction of postages equal to about 20 per cent. It is practising upon the great principle, which should control every branch of our government, of rendering to the public the greatest good possible, with the least possible taxation to the people.

The scale of postages suggested by the postmaster general recommends itself, not only by the reduction it proposes, but by the simplicity of its arrangement, its conformity with the federal currency, and the improvement it will introduce into the accounts of the department and its agents.

Your particular attention is invited to the subject of mail contracts with rail road companies. The present laws, providing for the making of contracts, are based upon the presumption that competition among bidders will secure the service at a fair price. But on most of the rail road lines, there is no competition in that kind of transportation, and advertising is therefore useless. No contract can now be made with them except such as shall be negotiated before the time of offering, or afterwards, and the power of the postmaster general to pay them high prices, is practically without limitation. It would be a relief to him, and no doubt would conduce to the public interest, to prescribe, by law, some equitable basis upon which such contracts shall rest, and restrict him by a fixed rule of allowance. Under a liberal act of that sort he would undoubtedly be able to secure the services of most of the rail road companies, and the interest of the department would be thus advanced.

The correspondence between the people of the United States and the European nations, and particularly with the British islands, has become very extensive, and requires the interposition of congress to give it security. No obstacle is perceived to an interchange of mails between New York and Liverpool, or other foreign ports, as proposed by the postmaster general; on the contrary, it promises, by the security it will afford, to facilitate commercial transactions, and give rise to an enlarged intercourse among the people of different nations, which cannot but have a happy effect. Through the city of New York most of the correspondence between the Canadas and Europe is now carried on, and urgent representations have been received from the head of the provincial post office, asking the interposition of the United States to guard it from the accidents and losses to which it is now subjected. Some legislation appears to be called for, as well by our own interest, as by comity to the adjoining British provinces.

The expediency of providing a fire-proof building for the important books and papers of the post office department, is worthy of consideration. In the present condition of our treasury, it is neither necessary nor wise to leave essential public interests exposed to so much danger, when they can so readily be made secure. There are weighty considerations in the location of a new building for the department, in favor of placing it near the other executive buildings.

The important subjects of a survey of the coast, and the manufacture of a standard of weights and measures for the different custom houses, have been in progress for some years, under the general direction of the executive, and the immediate superintendence of a gentleman possessing high scientific attainments. At the last session of congress, the making of a set of weights and measures for each state in the union was added to the others by a joint resolution.

The care and correspondence as to all these subjects have been devolved on the treasury department during the last year. A special report from the secretary of the treasury will soon be communicated to congress, which will show what has been accomplished as to the whole, the number and compensation of the persons now employed in these duties, and the progress expected to be made during the ensuing year, with a copy of the various correspondence deemed necessary to throw light on the subjects which seem to require additional legislation. Claims have been made for retrospective allowances in behalf of the superintendent, and some of his assistants, which I did not feel justified in granting; other claims have been made for large increases in compensation, which, under all the circumstances of the several cases, I declined making without the express sanction of congress. In order to obtain that sanction, the subject was at the last session, on my suggestion, and by request of the immediate superintendent, submitted by the treasury department to the committee of commerce of the house of representatives. But no legislative action having taken place, the early attention of congress is now invited to the enactment of some express and detailed provisions in relation to the various claims made for the past, and to the compensation and allowances deemed proper for the future.

It is further respectfully recommended that such being the inconvenience of attention to these duties by the chief magistrate, and such the great pressure of business on the treasury department, the general supervision of the coast survey, and the completion of the weights and measures, if the works are kept united, should be devolved on a board of officers, organized specially for that purpose, or on the navy board attached to the navy department.

All my experience and reflection confirm the conviction I have so often expressed to congress, in favor of an amendment of the constitution, which will prevent, in any event, the election of the president and vice president of the United States devolving on the house of representatives and the senate; and I therefore beg leave again to solicit your attention to the subject. There were various other suggestions in my last annual message, not acted upon, particularly that relating to the want of uniformity in the laws of the District of Columbia, that are deemed worthy of your favorable consideration.

Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business, and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation.

Having now finished the observations deemed proper on this, the last occasion I shall have of communicating with the two houses of congress at their meeting, I cannot omit an expression of the gratitude which is due to the great body of my fellow citizens, in whose partiality and indulgence I have found encouragement and support in the many difficult and trying scenes through which it has been my lot to pass during my public career.—Though deeply sensible that my exertions have not been crowned with a success corresponding to the degree of favor bestowed upon me, I am sure that they will be considered as having been directed by an earnest desire to promote the good of my country; and I am consoled by the persuasion that whatever errors have been committed will find a corrective in the intelligence and patriotism of those who will succeed us. All that has occurred during my administration is calculated to inspire me with increased confidence in the stability of our institutions, and should I be spared to enter upon that retirement which is so suitable to my age and infirm health, and so much desired by me in other respects, I shall not cease to invoke that beneficent Being to whose providence we are already so signally indebted for the continuance of his blessings on our beloved country.

ANDREW JACKSON.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, five thousand copies of the message and the accompanying documents were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Kent, then arose and addressed the chair as follows:

Mr. President: Yonder vacant seat, heretofore so ably and so faithfully filled, but too significantly indicates the object of my addressing you at this time.

I rise, sir, for the purpose of announcing to you and to the senate the melancholy intelligence of the death of my very worthy and excellent colleague, the late ROBERT H. GOLDSBOROUGH. He departed this life during the late recess, after a short illness, in the midst of his usefulness, and at a period when we should have been justifiable in allotting to him many years of vigorous health.

But few individuals have occupied a greater space in public estimation in his native state than Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. He filled, from an early period of his life, with no inconsiderable degree of reputation, various public stations, and was twice elected to a seat in this body. Possessing the advantages of a liberal education, which had been well improved, with the most polished address, he was ever found a ready and efficient debater, remarkable for his courtesy and politeness. He was truly said to have been "a man of manners and of letters too."

Mr. Goldsborough's exertions for the benefit of his fellow men were not confined to public life. He was prominent as an agriculturist, making frequent and judicious experiments, enforcing his views by very able essays, thereby directing the attention of the agriculturist to such objects as were calculated to ameliorate and improve the condition of his exhausted lands. Truly exemplary in all the relations of private life, as a friend, neighbor, and in the domestic circle, he was unrivalled.

To me personally, his loss is truly afflictive. A severe hoarseness, under which I have labored for some time, obliges me to be thus brief. I beg leave to offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the members of the senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the hon. Robert H. Goldsborough, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape round the left arm."

The resolution was unanimously adopted. On motion of Mr. Kent, the senate then adjourned.

December 7. Mr. Brown, senator from North Carolina, and Mr. Nicholas, senator from Louisiana, were present to-day in the senate chamber.

The chair presented the following documents from the treasury department; which were severally read, and ordered to be printed, viz:

A statement of the disbursements for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government, so far as connected with the functions of the first and fifth auditors;

A report on the execution of the treaty with the Chickasaws;

A report on the importation of paupers, in obedience to a resolution of the senate of the last session;

A report on marine hospitals;

Copies of the accounts of the disbursing officers of the treasury;

A message was received from the president of the United States by the hand of Andrew Jackson, jr. esq. his secretary, with copies of the correspondence between the president and Mrs. Madison, on the death of her illustrious consort, entered into in compliance with resolutions of both houses of congress, at the last session of congress. All of which was ordered to be printed.

The chair presented the report of the commissioner of the public buildings for the year 1836. Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Knight gave notice that he should to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill to allow a drawback of duties on imported hemp.

Mr. Benton gave notice that he should again offer his expunging resolution at an early day. He then offered the following resolution, which, of course, lies one day on the table:

Resolved, That the annual statement of the commerce and navigation of the United States be hereafter printed under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, and be communicated in a printed form as soon as possible after the commencement of each stated session of congress.

The senate then adjourned.

The following members, elected to fill vacancies during the recess, appeared, were qualified and took their seats:

Orris Holt, from Connecticut, in place of Andrew T. Judson, resigned.

Rutger B. Miller, from New York, in place of Mr. Beardsley, resigned.

John J. Pearson and James Black, from Pennsylvania, in place of John Banks and Jesse Miller, resigned.

Wm. Chetwood, from New Jersey, in place of Philemon Dickerson, resigned.

James Graham, whose seat was vacated by a vote of the house at the last session.

Archibald Yell, of Arkansas, being the first representative from this new state, also appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

A message was received from the senate, by Mr. Lowrie, their secretary, acquainting the house that the senate was ready to proceed to business, and had passed a joint resolution to appoint a committee from both houses to wait upon the president of the United States and inform him that a quorum of both houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communication he may have to make them.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. Pearce, of Rhode Island, a committee of three, on the part of the house, was ordered to be appointed to wait upon the president of the United States, in conjunction with the senate's committee, for the purpose above stated.

Mr. Elisha Whittlesey moved the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the several standing committees be now appointed according to the standing rules and orders of the house. [That is, that the speaker be authorised now to appoint them; in the event of which order, they would be agreed upon by the speaker, and announced to the house by the reading of the journal on the opening of to-morrow's sitting.]

Mr. Boon said that it had been usual not to make the appointment until the first Thursday in the first week of the session, and that it was then customary for the house to adjourn until the following Monday.

Mr. Whittlesey said he hoped no gentleman would oppose the adoption of the order. He hoped, at least that no motion would be made for a further postponement than to-morrow. It certainly had been the usage, of late years, not to appoint the committees until the close of the first week. Formerly, however, the committees had been appointed on the first day of the session, and he could see no reason why the appointment should be postponed. Why should a week be idly spent before the house proceeded to business? It seemed to him that the business should be commenced immediately. He called the attention of the members to the position in which the house found itself at the close of the last session; and he warned them that such would again be their position, unless the business was vigorously commenced in the early part of the session. At the commencement of a new congress (Mr. W. said) there was undoubtedly some reason why the appointment of the committees should not take place immediately; the members had to become personally acquainted with the speaker. But no such reason existed now. He implored the members he called upon every gentleman to aid him in transacting the business of the house; and, with that view, to second him in his endeavors for its immediate commencement. There were only a few members absent, and he hoped that, at the furthest, the house would not consent to a further adjournment than to-morrow.

Mr. Boon assured the gentleman from Ohio that he had no desire to embarrass the proceedings of the house. He was fully as anxious as any other member that the business should be commenced forthwith. But only one hundred and seventy-six members had answered to their names; and it was probable that a number of the members who had been appointed on certain committees at the last session of congress would be deprived of having their names again placed on the same committee, or any other. The speaker, moreover, required time to make the appointments; and for this, as well as for other reasons which were perfectly satisfactory to his own mind, he would move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Thursday next.

Mr. Mercer said that he concurred with the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. E. Whittlesey,) in the views he had expressed, and that he (Mr. M.) would not repeat the arguments he had used in support of them. But he would suggest that the absence of a member should not be considered as a reason why that member should not be placed on a committee. The members not present were most probably on their journey to the city, and he saw no inconvenience resulting from an appointment made in their absence.

The speaker said that, unless the house altered the rule, he could not appoint an absent member to a committee.

Mr. Mercer moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow; and suggested that the house should provide that the appointment on a committee of an absent member should not operate as a disqualification to serve.

Mr. E. Whittlesey called for the yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. Boon to postpone the consideration of the subject until Thursday next. The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, were yeas 33, nays 148. So the motion to postpone was lost.

Mr. Mercer then withdrew his motion to postpone until to-morrow, and moved to amend the motion of Mr. Whittlesey by adding the following words: "And that the absence of a member shall not be regarded as a disqualification for an appointment upon a committee." Mr. A. Mann moved that the house do now adjourn. The speaker suggested that no day had been fixed for the consideration of the order. Mr. Wardwell then moved that the further consideration of the order be postponed until to-morrow; which motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. A. Mann, it was ordered that the daily hour to which the house should stand ad-journal should be 12 o'clock, until otherwise ordered.

On motion of Mr. Wardwell, the usual regulation for supplying the members with newspapers was adopted.

And, at one o'clock, on motion of Mr. A. Mann, The house adjourned.

Tuesday, Dec. 6. Several other members appeared and took their seats, viz:

From Maine—Moses Mason, jr. Massachusetts—Geo. Grennell, jr. Pennsylvania—Andrew Beaumont, William Heister and John Laporte. Maryland—James Turner. Virginia—George C. Dromgoole. North Carolina—William Montgomery. South Carolina—Francis W. Pickens and James Rogers. Georgia—Jesse F. Cleveland and Thomas Glascock. Indiana—Jonathan McCarty. Illinois—William L. May.

Mr. D. J. Pearce rose and informed the house that the joint committee appointed on yesterday to wait on the president of the United States, and inform him that the two houses had convened, and were ready to receive such communication as he might think proper to make, had performed their duty; and that they had been directed by the president to say that, at 12 o'clock this day, he would make a communication in writing to both houses.

Mr. E. Whittlesey gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, submit a motion to alter the 15th rule of the house, which is now in the following terms:

"15. After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of any congress, all bills, resolutions and reports, which originated in the house, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place."

Mr. W's motion provides that the rule be so changed as that the house proceed to the transaction of the said business immediately.

Mr. Gillett gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, submit a motion that so much of the 106th rule as provides—"Nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present: nor shall the order of business, as established by the rules of the house, be postponed or changed, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present," be repealed.

The annual message was received from the president of the United States, through Andrew Jackson, jr. esq. his private secretary; and was read at the clerk's table.

[For the message, see this day's proceedings of the senate.]

The reading of the message having been completed, Mr. Loyall moved that it be referred to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union, and that 15,000 copies, with the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the members, and also 5,000 copies of the message without the documents. Mr. Briggs wished to modify this resolution by ordering that the 5,000 copies be furnished to the house within two days. He understood that this had been done on former occasions. Mr. Loyall assented to the modification, and the resolution thus modified, was carried.

The speaker laid before the house communications received from several departments, as follows:

A communication from the secretary of the treasury, containing a statement of the annual receipts and expenditures.

The annual report of the secretary of the treasury relative to the state of the finances.

A communication containing the annual report of the commissioner of the land office.

A communication containing an estimate of appropriations which will be required for the service of the year 1837.

And, also, a statement presented by the clerk of the house, of the contingent expenses of the house for the past year.

These several communications, on motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey and Mr. Cambreleng, were ordered to lie upon the table, and to be printed. The committees not yet being appointed, that course was adopted instead of a reference of them.

Mr. E. Whittlesey then moved to proceed to the consideration of the order for the appointment of committees; but, before taking the question,

On motion of Mr. Parks, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Dec. 7. After the reading of the journal, with which every day's sitting opens—

Mr. Claiborne, of Mississippi, addressed the house as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: It is only a few years since I witnessed from that gallery the affecting honors paid to the remains of a distinguished representative from the state of Mississippi.* Since that period, she has lost two sons,* eminent for talents, in the public service, and you are now called on to render the last homage to the memory of another. The time that has intervened since the death of my lamented colleague saves me the painful duty of being the first to communicate it to his friends, now present. He died, sir, as he had lived, through a life of extraordinary vicissitudes, with characteristic fortitude, with but one wish ungratified—a wish so natural to the human heart—that, in his dark hour of dissolution, he might be supported by his nearest and best beloved, and the cherished beings that grew up and clustered around his fireside.

Sir, let death come when it will, in what shape it may, in the battle or the shipwreck, or in the solitude of the cloister, it is appalling to human contemplation. But when it overtakes us in a distant land, and we know that our last moments of agony and infirmity are to be witnessed by stranger eyes, and are conscious that we must be carried down to an unwept grave, where no kindred dust shall mingle with ours forever, and the last hope of home and of family fades from our filmed view, oh! sir, this is death! this it is to die! Such was the destiny of my colleague, "by strangers honored and by strangers mourned;" his dying message was for those broken hearted ones, now in widowhood and orphanage—his expiring sigh a prayer for them!

Mr. Speaker, I shall pronounce no eulogy on the dead. Let his history speak it. For twenty years he preserved a high position in the public service, and died poorer than when he entered it, leaving to his children the riches of an honorable name. If it be praise to have lived beloved and die unapproached, then it is due to him.

It now only remains for us to pay the final honors to his memory—sad, because it seems like breaking the last link that binds the living to the dead; solemn, when we reflect how soon, how very soon, some friend now present may invoke the same tribute for ourselves!

I offer you, sir, the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in testimony of their respect for the memory of David Dickson, late a representative from the state of Mississippi, the members of this house will wear crape for one month.

This resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. Haynes, of Georgia, then rose, and addressed the chair as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: On me has devolved the mournful duty of announcing to this house the death of one of its members, my friend and colleague, the hon. John Coffee, of Georgia. For a considerable portion of the last session of congress, he labored under severe indisposition, which at different periods detained him from the service of the house.—Although his symptoms were so mitigated before the adjournment as to enable him to resume the regular discharge of his official duties, no radical amendment had taken place, and with gradually increasing force his disease closed his existence in the bosom of his family, in the month of September last.

In speaking of a departed friend and colleague, the language of eulogy might be excused; but to those who have been associated with general Coffee in the labors of this house for the last three years, such language would be unnecessary.

Suffice it to say that, in his domestic and social relations, he was eminently characterized by affectionate kindness and courtesy, and that public duties were discharged with honor to himself and fidelity to his country. As the usual mark of respect, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That this house has received with the liveliest sensibility the announcement of the death of the hon. John Coffee, a representative from the state of Georgia.

Resolved, unanimously, That this house tenders to the relatives of the deceased the expression of its sympathy on this mournful event; and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

These resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and then, on motion of Mr. Cushman, the house adjourned.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the senate. The vice president laid before the senate a communication from the secretary of war, making the annual report required by law touching the expenditure of the contingent fund in the several offices of that department.

Also, a communication from the secretary of state containing a similar report of expenditures in that department.

* Thomas B. Read and Robert H. Adams, of the U. S. senate.

*Hon. Christopher Rankin.

Also, a communication from the secretary of the navy of a similar tenor; which several documents were, on motion of Mr. King, of Alabama, ordered to be printed.

Mr. Ewing gave notice that he should on Monday next, introduce a joint resolution to rescind the treasury order of the 11th day of July, 1836, to make uniform the currency receivable for the public revenue, [requiring the payment of specie for the public lands.]

Messrs. Moore and Tipton gave similar notices respecting several private bills.

On motion of Mr. King, of Alabama, it was Resolved, That the senate will, on Monday next, at 1 o'clock, proceed to the election of a secretary of the senate, in the room of Waller Lowrie, esq. resigned.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, it was ordered that, on Monday next, the senate would appoint its standing committees.

Mr. King, of Alabama, on leave, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled an act for the better organization of the district courts of the United States within the state of Alabama; which was read once, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Knight of Rhode Island, on leave, introduced a bill to allow a drawback on imported hemp, when manufactured into cordage and exported.

Mr. Benton, on leave, introduced a bill making appropriation for the collection of materials and the purchase of sites, and to commence the construction of certain fortifications, and for other purposes; also, a bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States; also, a bill for the relief of the heirs of gen. William Eaton.

All these bills were passed to a second reading.

Mr. Walker, of Mississippi, on leave, introduced a bill to advance to each of the states of Alabama and Mississippi, one million of dollars, chargeable upon the 2 per cent. fund of said states, respectively, to be appropriated by said states toward the construction of a railway from Brandon, Mississippi, to Cahawba, Alabama; which bill was read once and ordered to a second reading.

The following resolution, moved by Mr. Benton, of Missouri, being under consideration—

Resolved, That the annual statement of the commerce and navigation of the United States be hereafter printed under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, and be communicated in a printed form as soon as possible after the commencement of each stated session of congress.

Mr. Benton advocated this resolution on the ground that great delay was unavoidably incurred in printing this document, and that the senate was usually a year in arrears in its reception. After some remarks from Mr. Knight, who inquired whether any extra copies were to be printed under the resolution, and said that as the document was a profitable one to the printer, the number of copies and the price of printing ought to be stated, &c. Mr. Benton called for the reading of the original order under which the document was prepared—but some delay occurring in turning to it, the subject was, for the present, laid on the table, and the senate adjourned.

In the house of representatives. [The hon. John Young, elected a member from the state of New York, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Philo C. Fuller, appeared on Tuesday, was qualified and took his seat.]

On motion of Mr. Whitlesey, the order of the house for proceeding to the appointment of committees with the amendment of Mr. Mercer, of Va. "that the absence of a member be not considered as disqualifying him for appointment on any of the committees," was taken up. The amendment was then disagreed to and the appointment of the committees ordered.

Mr. Evans moved that when the house adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday, which was agreed to.

A message was received from the president of the United States, by the hands of Andrew Jackson, jr. esq. his private secretary, concerning the late ex-president MADISON, &c. [The correspondence shall have a place in the next "Register."]

Mr. Patton moved that this subject be referred to the joint committee on the library.

The speaker observed that the committee on the part of the house was not yet appointed.

Mr. Patton then moved that the said committee be now appointed, which was agreed to; and the message and accompanying documents were referred accordingly.

The speaker communicated to the house various communications received from the president and departments, viz:

A letter from the president of the United States, communicating a report of the commissioner of public buildings, showing the progress made in the various buildings authorised by congress.

A communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a statement of the expenditures of the contingent fund.

A communication from the same, containing a statement of the expenditures incurred for the bridge across the Potomac.

A communication from the same, containing the report of the land office, in pursuance of the provisions of an act of congress to carry into effect the treaty with the Chickasaws.

A communication from the same, containing a report of the survey of the coast of the United States.

These communications were severally, on motion, ordered to be laid on the table and to be printed.

Mr. Davis, of Indiana, then rose, and addressed the chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Painful as the duty may be, it is mine of this morning to announce to the house the decease of another of its members.

My friend and colleague, the hon. George L. Kinnard, died at Cincinnati on the 25th ult. after a few days of suffering much more severe than ordinarily falls to the lot of mankind in passing that dread ordeal. The immediate cause of his death is perhaps well known to this house and to the country. It was his misfortune to suffer from one of those appalling accidents which are of but too frequent recurrence upon our steamboats, by the bursting of their machinery. He, too, like one of our associates whose death was announced on yesterday, died among strangers, yet among friends. At the hospitable mansion of the hon. Robert Lytle, (where he paid the great debt of nature), he received the most unremitting attention and kindness, as also the most unwearied services of those who rank among the first in the profession of medicine; but all would not do—the Omnipotent fiat had gone forth by which he was called from the service of his country to the service of his God. Had I studied by set phrase to pass an eulogy upon his character, I should find words too cold, language too inexpressive, to do justice to his virtues. It was my good fortune to be favored for many years with his acquaintance, and to share largely in his friendship. With a clear and discriminating mind, an honest heart, and an untiring industry, he had elevated himself to the highest seat in the affections of those who knew him best. In all the varied relations of life, (to which he was about to add another of a sacred and responsible character), he sustained the most unsullied reputation, leaving to the world indubitable evidence, not only that he was a man of high attainments, but that he was emphatically one of God's noblest works—an honest man.

Mr. D. then submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That as a testimonial of respect for the memory of the hon. George L. Kinnard, late a member of this house from the state of Indiana, the members of this body will wear crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the connexions and constituents of Mr. Kinnard are joined in the sincerest condolence for the loss of that inestimable man to them, to us and to the country.

On motion of Mr. Lay, the house adjourned.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

Speculation. A New York paper has been desired to address a query to the Albany Argus, in reference to certain alleged plans for a large speculation in flour. It asks the Argus whether it is not true that a company has been formed along the line of the canal with a capital of 200 or 250 thousand dollars, for the purpose of speculating on a rise of flour, and also, whether some gentlemen high in the state government have not embarked in the speculation?

Construction of the heart. The following return appears on the back of an execution issued by a justice not far from this place; the execution, it will be recollected, commands the constable to levy the debt and costs on the goods and chattels of defendant, but for want of sufficient distress to take the body to the jail of the county. [Tyoga Gaz.]

"Went to house of defendant and found no property, but there being sufficient distress in the family I did not take the body to the jail.

So answers ———, Constable.

New Coin. The new fifty cent pieces about to be issued from the mint at Philadelphia, are spoken of as being of superior workmanship, and in the highest degree creditable to the artist, Mr. Gobrecht. The beauty and finish are equal to any thing of the kind in this country or Europe.

Heavy losses. The several marine insurance companies in the city of New York, have ascertained that their losses during the past week amount to upwards of one hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

General Jacob Morton, who was for more than twenty years clerk of the common council of New York, and filled many important public stations, died suddenly in that city on Saturday last.

Rathbun's estate. The remainder of his personal estate, and all the real estate and land contracts, will be sold at Buffalo, Jan. 16th. The lands lie in the city and at the Falls, and are very choice selections; but the pressure on the money market will cause them to go at a great sacrifice. The personal estate already sold is $115,000, though estimated by Rathbun at $455,000. [N. Y. Star.]

A naval court martial has been ordered to convene at Washington, on Tuesday, the 6th day of December, for the trial of lieutenant S. D. Downing, and such others as may be brought before it. The court to consist of commodore James Biddle, president, com. C. G. Ridgely, capt. J. B. Nicholas, capt. F. A. Parke, capt. David Connor, master commandant E. A. F. Vallette, master com. J. H. Aulick, lieutenant French Forrest, lieutenant Ralph Voorhees, members, James Dunlap, esq. of Georgetown, to be judge advocate.

The prevailing system in operation at New Orleans for obtaining seamen is attended with opportunities of extortion that are occasionally practised with a widely grasping hand. Recently the ship Grace Brown, cleared at that port for Liverpool, was compelled to pay $60 per month in order to obtain a crew. The former rates were but $18.

The Natchez Courier states that the citizens of that place have subscribed seventy thousand dollars towards the capital stock for the erection of a steam ship to run between New York and Natchez.

A hurricane chasing a gold mine. A furious hurricane took place on the 18th of November in Rutherford county, North Carolina. It unroofed the houses, blew down the fences, and carried off the fodder stacks of several planters near Rutherfordson, besides leveling forests to the ground and blocking up the roads with their huge trunks. Its length was ten miles and its breadth a quarter of a mile. Among other freaks it took up a chicken house, and filled the air with a flock of fowls, turkeys and ducks. About five miles north of Rutherfordson, a vein of gold has been traced at least three miles, and a large company has commenced operating upon a portion of it, with every prospect of realizing a large profit on their investment. The gale encountered this vein at one end, pursued it for the whole three miles, with as much exactness as the most skillful mineralogist would trace it, through its various windings, literally sweeping every thing before it.

Loss of packet ships. The ship Ajax, captain Hiern, from New York, for Mobile, was driven ashore on the 14th of November, near Tiger Creek. Carysfort reef. The ship is a total loss—part of her cargo had been saved, in a damaged state. The A. had on board one hundred and twenty passengers. We are happy to state, that not a single life was lost. The ship Champion, from New Orleans, for Havre, was lost on Key Sal, about the 12th of November. The passengers had arrived at Matanzas.

Singular preservation. A letter to a gentleman of Philadelphia, dated Bellefonte, Penn. November 23, says that a stage containing three passengers was, on the preceding evening, within a mile of that place, overtaken by a wagon and precipitated into a Spring creek, down a rocky precipice between thirty and forty feet deep, and at an angle of fifty degrees, and, wonderful to state, no person were killed or seriously injured. Two of the horses, however, which had plunged into deep water, were drowned.

Alford Hocker, who withheld the poll book of Lincoln county, Ky. of which he was sheriff, has been appointed postmaster at Stanford in that state. This appointment has caused much severe comment, and the Danville Olive Branch says, when Hocker presented his credentials as postmaster, and demanded possession of the papers, furniture, &c. of the office, the assistant of the late postmaster declined complying with the demand. "Sir," said Hocker, "by what authority do you refuse to surrender me the office?" The young man replied, "By the same authority, sir, that you refused to surrender the Lincoln poll book."

By the Providence Directory it appears that there are in that town, 77 blacksmiths—23 barbers—147 clerks—155 jewellers—301 house carpenters—38 ship carpenters—106 masons—43 cabinet makers—68 tailors—47 draymen—37 lawyers and 33 physicians.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

93.—In this "documentary season" we are deprived of all control over the selections for our sheet—for the papers which emanate from the government are generally of current interest and must be promptly inserted without regard to miscellaneous articles claiming our attention—of which a large number are on file. Of this current character are the reports of the secretary of the treasury and navy, both of which are published in this number—the former of which will be read with increased interest in connection with the letter of Mr. Bidle upon the manner in which the secretary has executed the law for the distribution of the surplus revenue, &c. inserted in page 243.

DESTRUCTION OF THE GENERAL POST OFFICE, PATENT OFFICE AND THE CITY POST OFFICE!!! It is our painful duty to state that the general post office, the patent office and the city post office were entirely consumed by fire on Thursday morning last. The particulars of this distressing calamity are detailed in the account from the "Intelligencer" of yesterday morning inserted in a subsequent page, and must excite the most painful emotions in the public mind—for the loss sustained cannot be repaired and will be severely felt by individuals—especially from the destruction of the patent office, by which the fruits of the genius of our countrymen, that have been accumulating for nearly half a century, have been reduced to ashes. In the present confused state of the affairs of the general post office department, the real extent of the loss it has sustained cannot be ascertained—but it is said that all the books, contracts, &c. have been saved. All the letters, mails and money of the city post office were, however, destroyed—Fortunately the large mails had been sent off before the fire broke out and escaped the general destruction, but all the letters received on the evening previous for delivery in the city, were destroyed.

The origin of this disaster is still shrouded in mystery, but, as will be seen by an abstract of the proceedings, is to undergo an investigation by congress. There are some things, however, in connection with it, apparent from the accounts before us, that call for the indignant censure of the country—we mean the criminal tardiness in spreading the alarm and the slothful efforts to repress the flames and rescue the public property—For it appears that nearly half an hour!!! elapsed before the alarm bells were rung, and more than that time before an engine or a bucket of water could be commanded. With the same difficulties in procuring water that the Washington firemen had to contend with, the Baltimore firemen could have drawn their engines three miles through the mud, not on McAdams roads as smooth as a bowling green, and placed them in active operation.

One benefit will result from this conflagration.—It will ensure the erection of permanent fire proof buildings for all the public offices, and no longer place the public records and archives in jeopardy from a similar disaster. The new building for the treasury department, in lieu of the old one destroyed in 1833, is, as far as it has progressed, built in the most substantial manner, and will be completely fire proof. According to the Alexandria Gazette the foundation for the entire extent of the building, which is 460 feet in length, including the western projection, is laid. The front range of the rooms is brought up to the springing line of the groin arches, several of which are turned, and laid in hydraulic cement; and the cut granite, facing on the west front, made up as high as the window seats. A large quantity of materials, granite, freestone, cut and in the rough, brick, lime and mortar, is collected on the spot, and roomy shops are provided for the workmen to cut and dress the stone during the winter, so that no time may be lost in progressing with the building in due season.

The foundation for the new patent office, intended for the reception of the models, &c. which are now a heap of ruins, is also laid, and the granite facings on both fronts, built up to the basement story. The building will be 270 feet in length and 69 feet deep, and like the building intended for the treasury department, will be fire proof. Both fronts are faced with split granite laid in regular courses with dressed joints. The material of which the body of the building will be composed has not been decided on—but the portico, the proportions of which are exactly those of the Parthenon, at Athens, will involve a large portion of the whole expense.

FROM FLORIDA. We have before us a highly interesting detail of the movements of that portion of the army under the command of gen. Call and the recent victories achieved over the Indians, which we are compelled, in consequence of the large space occupied by congressional documents, to defer until next week. According to the account, our army was in high spirits, and, the enemy, weakened and dispirited, flying in a direction that would bring them in contact with gen. Jesup in a section of country in which their destruction will be inevitable. In the battle near the Wahoo swamp, we regret to state that maj. Moniac, a gallant officer of the Tennessee volunteers, was killed while crossing a creek when in pursuit of the enemy. Gen. Call's army, at the last accounts, was at Volusia and amply supplied with provisions.

PRESIDENTIAL. We continue our record of the official statements of the popular vote in each state and the votes of the colleges. It will be some time before complete returns can be received from all the states, but the vote for president will stand as follows:

SENATOR FROM MAINE. The hon. Judah Dana, of Fryeburg, has been appointed by the governor and council, senator in congress from Maine, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Shepley.

PENNSYLVANIA SENATOR. James Buchanan, esq. was on Tuesday last, re-elected a senator from Pennsylvania for six years from the 3d of March next. For Buchanan 85, C. B. Penrose 21. T. W. T. McKennon 24.

It appears that according to a law of the state passed in 1802, each house should have given the other at least two days notice on or before Saturday last, of the persons nominated as senators and appointed tellers. On Saturday morning the senate met at the usual hour, and made the nominations; before the clerk could reach the chamber of the house of representatives, that house had adjourned, on the motion of Mr. S. F. Reed, so that the notice required by law was not received. On Monday committees of conference were appointed by both bodies, and on Tuesday a bill was passed and signed by the governor which removed the difficulty, and Mr. Buchanan was elected, as above stated.

VIRGINIA SENATOR. Richard E. Parker, of the county of Clarke, and judge of the general court of Virginia, was, on Monday last, elected by the legislature a senator of the United States, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Leigh. [The vote was, for judge Parker 73, for John Tyler 23, for John M. Patton 15 votes.]

Mr. Leigh's letter to the acting governor, on resigning his seat, and the proceedings upon it in the legislature, are inserted in page 243.

SOUTH CAROLINA SENATE. William C. Preston, esq. has been re-elected a senator from South Carolina for 4 years from the 3d of March next—for Mr. Preston 125 votes—scattering 8.

SECRETARY OF THE SENATE. It will be seen by the proceedings of the senate, that Asbury Dickens, esq. has been elected secretary of the senate of the United States in place of Mr. Lowrie resigned. Mr. Dickens is well qualified for the office, being a gentleman of fine talents who has had considerable experience in public duties. He was for many years chief clerk of the treasury department, and during that period frequently acted as secretary—and for the last three years has discharged the duties of chief clerk of the department of state, and occasionally acted as head of that bureau.

THE NEW DOLLAR. It gives us pleasure to announce—says the Washington Globe of yesterday morning—that the one dollar of our own mint is soon to make its appearance. The face of the coin represents a full length figure of Liberty, seated on a rock, with the classic emblem of the pallens or liberty-cap surmounting a spear held in the left hand. The right hand rests on the American shield. With its thirteen stripes, crossed by a scroll, on which is the word liberty. The reverse represents the American eagle, on the wing, drawn accurately from nature; all the heraldic appendages of the old coin being discarded. Over the field are placed irregularly twenty-six stars; the entrance of Michigan into the union, having been, it seems, anticipated.

The design of the face of the coin was drawn by Mr. Sully, and that of the reverse by Mr. Titian Peale; both under instructions from the director of the mint. The dies were executed by Mr. Goebrecht, one of the engravers of the mint.

This emission of dollars is the first coined at the mint since the year 1805. It is intended to adopt the same design in the other coins, as soon as it is practicable to do so.

AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY. We learn from the "Intelligencer" that the twentieth annual meeting of this society was held at Washington city in the hall of the house of representatives at the capitol on Tuesday evening last, at 5 o'clock, Henry Clay, of Ky. senior vice president of the society, in the chair. Though the weather was extremely inclement, a large and respectable audience attended. The meeting was opened by prayer from the rev. Dr. Proudfit, of New York; after which, the annual report of the board of managers was read by the rev. Mr. Gurley, secretary of the society. It is a document of considerable length, and presents a most encouraging view of the progress and prospects of the society. The increased favor which it showed the cause to have received during the past year in several southern and south western states cannot fail to animate the hopes and operations of its friends. Interesting addresses were delivered by several gentlemen, when the society adjourned to meet on the following evening at the first Presbyterian church.

NAVAL. A letter dated on board the United States frigate United States, Athens, August 24, communicates the following intelligence—The Constitution, Potomac, United States and John Adams are now here. The Shark has been ordered up the Adriatic. The squadron all sail to-day—the Potomac home, by the coast of Africa and Brazil—the Constitution, United States and John Adams for the coast of Syria. Our first lieutenant, J. H. Smith, returns home in the Potomac, in consequence of ill health. Lieutenant H. H. Rhodes has been transferred to the Constitution; lieutenant W. D. Porter to the John Adams; lieutenant J. A. Davis is attached to this ship. The fleet surgeon, Dr. Boyd, has been relieved by Dr. B. Washington. The squadron will return by the way of Tunis to Mahon, in November, to winter quarters.

BANKS IN MASSACHUSETTS. The secretary of state has prepared an abstract of the returns of the banks of this commonwealth, showing their condition on the first Saturday of September last. The following is the aggregate of some of the principal items in the statement:

Capital stock paid in,	$34,478,110
Paid in since September 8,	2,811,475

Present capital of 130 banks,	37,289,585
Bills in circulation,	10,892,249
Cash deposited not on interest,	8,784,516
Cash deposited on interest,	6,477,928
Balances due to other banks,	5,063,886
Due from the banks,	67,713,979
Gold, silver and other coins,	1,455,230
Bills of banks in the states,	3,088,964
Bills of banks elsewhere,	389,888
Balances due from other banks,	5,126,900
Due to the banks, except balances,	56,643,171
Total resources,	67,810,675
Amount of preceding semi-annual dividend,	1,044,550
Amount of reserved profits,	1,175,631
Debts secured by pledge of stock,	1,298,744
Debts due, considered doubtful,	335,974
Average rate of semi-annual dividend, 3 3-7 per ct.

There are thirteen other banks incorporated which have not commenced operations, the capital of which, with the unpaid balance of the capital of other banks, amounts to $3,540,415, making the authorized amount of bank capital $40,830,000.

SLAVERY AND THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. The synod of the Presbyterian church for South Carolina and Georgia, has passed resolutions enjoining the southern delegates to the general assembly of the Presbyterian church, to disavow all right of legislation or discussion on this subject whatever; to refuse to mingle in any act, by vote or speech, which involves even the discussion of this subject, and requiring them to withdraw from the general assembly and come home, upon any attempt by that body to legislate or discuss this subject at all; with the single exception of the simple disclaimer of that body to interfere in any way with it.

SOUTH CAROLINA. From the following report of the committee on federal relations in the South Carolina legislature, it will be seen that the governor's opinions in relation to the Mexican and Texan question, have been promptly seconded by that committee—and will no doubt, be sanctioned by a vote of the legislature.

The committee on federal relations beg leave to report on so much of the governor's message referred to them as relates to Texas.

The committee fully agree with his excellency on the propriety and sound policy of the government of the United States maintaining a strict neutrality with all foreign nations, and especially with Mexico in her contest with Texas; and that we are the last people who should set an example of impertinent interference with the internal concerns of other states. No people can long be safe from foreign combinations if they themselves are the first to violate the laws of nations, to gratify, on the part of their citizens, a rapacity for gain, in a case where they suppose their superior strength enables them to take advantage of the feebleness of others. If that justice which should always be maintained between civilized states is once abandoned, and the rule of expediency established in its place, the weaker states of the world cannot hope long to sustain their liberties, but must, sooner or later, fall a prey to the predatory spirit of a foreign people, or to the ambition of neighboring tyrants.

Your committee cannot but look upon a war, at this time, between the United States and Mexico as a calamity greatly to be deprecated, for more reasons than it is now necessary to announce; and solemnly protest against any violation of that neutrality which our government professes towards that state. South Carolina cannot consent, under a supposed idea of self-interest, to violate the sanctity of the law of nations, or that neutrality which should always be guarded by the United States towards a foreign nation engaged in an internal struggle. Under the present circumstances, to acknowledge the independence of Texas and receive her into this union, could be no less than a declaration of war against Mexico, and of doubtful policy to the older slaveholding states. It is not for this legislature to determine at what crisis it may become proper on the part of the United States to acknowledge the independence of Texas; and, should it ever arrive, your committee trust the councils of the nation will be governed by strict justice and the soundest policy, and that she will pursue that course which she has hitherto observed towards other nations, and no other, and that she will not be seduced from the exercise of her sound judgment, through sympathy for others, though justly deserved.

D. J. McCORD, chairman.

DISASTROUS CONFLAGRATION. From the National Intelligencer of yesterday. THE GENERAL POST OFFICE AND PATENT OFFICE IN ASHES.

It is with no ordinary regret that we perform the duty of announcing the destruction, by fire, of the building in the central part of this city, which has for many years been occupied by the general post office, the patent office, and the city post office, with an important part of the contents of those buildings, including the entire contents of the two latter.

This calamity, great as it is, has long been feared by those old residents of Washington who knew the combustible nature of the building, (the floors being all of wood, and some of them not even counter-sealed), and the custom of stowing fuel, not only coal but wood, in the vaults underneath the first floor. The calamity has come at last, and affords the second demonstration, within four years, of the utter absurdity and improvidence of the structures to which the public archives, records and government accounts have been hitherto for the most part confided.

The first alarm of fire was given by Mr. Crown, a messenger, who usually sleeps in the room connected with the city post office (the postmaster's own room). The clerks had been at work, assorting the mails, until half past two o'clock, when one of the persons belonging to the office (Mr. Lansdale) passed out of the east door, and along the whole front of the building, without discovering anything to give rise to a suspicion of danger. Not long after three o'clock, Mr. Crown was roused from a light slumber by the smell of smoke. Opening the door of the city post office, he perceived a dense smoke, without any visible appearance of fire. He gave the alarm instantly, first rousing Mr. Cox, one of the clerks, who slept in a back room adjoining the post office, and who, coming out of the door of his room, passed along the whole of the long room with difficulty, through the smoke, hearing the fire crackling, but being able to see nothing. The watchmen in the body of the building, some distance from the city post office, had perceived nothing of the smoke, until they, also, were alarmed by Mr. Crown.

The hour of the night when all this took place being one at which the whole world is buried in the deepest sleep, it was found almost impossible to spread the alarm of fire. One of the church bells began to ring, but the ringer, not seeing any flame, ceased ringing almost as soon as he began, and it was a full half hour before the alarm bells were rung, and more than that time before an engine or a bucket of water could be commanded.—As it was, the fire had its own way, and was at last seen in the vault or cellar immediately under the delivery window of the city post office; followed shortly afterwards by flames from the windows of the latter, and, within five minutes afterwards, by flames from the roof, the fire having crept up along the stair cases or partitions to the top of the building before it broke out below.

From the moment of the flames bursting out from the lower windows, it was obvious that all hope of saving the building was vain. In little more than an hour the whole interior of the building and its contents were destroyed.

The books of the general post office were all, or nearly all, saved, exertions having been made for their safety from nearly the first moment of the alarm; but a mass of papers, &c. belonging to the office were destroyed. Not any thing was saved from the patent office or the city post office, the volume of the smoke preventing any body from penetrating the latter, so as to save any thing.

As to the origin of the fire, it is impossible to say any thing, for nothing seems to be known of it, except that it was in a cellar or vault, in which pine wood and coal were stowed, all which were probably in a state of ignition before the fire disclosed itself to the eye. We the more willingly forbear any conjecture as to the cause of the fire, since both houses of congress have taken steps, through committees, to investigate it, and in one house with power to send for persons and papers.

Most fortunately, the night was calm and comparative serene, or the destruction of private property would have been inevitable and great. Had it occurred on the night previous, when the wind blew almost a hurricane, several squares of valuable buildings must have been destroyed. The means of the city for extinguishing fires are wholly inadequate to the value of the property at stake, and the sources for the supply of water for the engines are limited in their extent, as well as precarious. We trust that the lesson we have just received will not be lost on those who have it in their power to apply the remedy.

Of all the amount of loss of papers and property sustained by this disaster, that which is most to be regretted (because irreparable) is that of the whole of the great repository of models of machines in the patent office. The mouldering ashes now only remain of that collected evidence of the penetration, ingenuity and enterprise which peculiarly distinguish the descendants of Europe in the western world.

THE CITY POST OFFICE. We have mentioned in the preceding article the destruction of all the contents of the city post office. All the mails of the night and morning (including letters received by other mails for distribution by those mails), except the Warrenton (Va.) and Port Tobacco (Md.) mails, had been sent off before the fire occurred. All the mails received the preceding evening and in the night for delivery at this place were destroyed, including, of course, all the letters for members of congress, different officers of the government (and editors). The transmission of mails from this place, will not, we understand, be for a moment interrupted by this catastrophe.

The city post office is reopened for the present in the lower story of Mr. Seaser's brick house, on 7th street, a few doors above the office of the National Intelligencer.

OFFICIAL.

Treasury department, Dec. 15, 1836.

Notice is hereby given, that all the letters and papers, of every kind, directed to this department, or any of its bureaus, and which arrived in this city on the evening of yesterday, through the mails, were destroyed this morning by the burning of the post office; and it is requested that duplicates of such as the parties suppose material and likely to have reached here last evening may be immediately forwarded.

LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.

ENGINEER ORDER, NO. 5.

Engineer department, Washington, Dec. 15, 1836.

In consequence of the destruction of the post office last night by fire, it is probable many communications addressed to this department may have shared the same fate. In order, therefore, to remedy the latter evil, the officers and agents of the department are hereby required to transmit, without delay, duplicates of such letters and other papers the receipt of which remain unacknowledged.

C. GRATIOT, chief engineer.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The seven electoral votes of this state have been given for Martin Van Buren for president and Richard M. Johnson for vice president.

MASSACHUSETTS.

The fourteen votes of this state were cast for Daniel Webster for president, and Francis Granger for vice president.

The following letter from Mr. Webster to the honorable Nathaniel Silsbee, was laid before the electors before the vote was given.

Boston, Nov. 15, 1836.

MY DEAR SIR: It appears highly probable that the election of yesterday has terminated in the choice of yourself, and the other gentlemen on the same list, as electors of president and vice president of the United States, in behalf of the state of Massachusetts. This result, the relation in which I have stood to the people of the commonwealth during the contest, and events which have transpired, or are anticipated, in other states, have rendered it proper, in my judgment, that I should address you this letter, to be laid before the electors when they shall assemble.

My purpose is to say, that, in the discharge of their high and most interesting trust, it is my earnest wish that they should act with entire freedom from all considerations merely personal to myself; and that they should give the vote of the state in the manner they think most likely to be useful, in supporting the constitution and laws of the country, the union of the states, the perpetuity of our republican institutions, and the important interests of the whole country; and in maintaining the character of Massachusetts for integrity, honor, national patriotism, and fidelity to the constitution.

I am, dear sir, with sentiments of the truest esteem, your friend and obedient servant,

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Hon. N. Silsbee.

[The New York Commercial Advertiser says—It is understood that Mr. Webster wrote the letter above inserted, in the expectation, under the then circumstances of the case, that the vote of Massachusetts might be of importance in deciding the election against the Baltimore nominee, and in favor of general Harrison. Had the returns continued so favorable as to have warranted such an expectation to the end, it was clearly Mr. Webster's desire that the vote should be cast for general Harrison.]

NEW YORK.

The electoral vote of this state was cast for Martin Van Buren as president, and Richard M. Johnson as vice president.

NEW JERSEY.

The electors of this state, eight in number, voted unanimously for William H. Harrison as president, and Francis Granger as vice president.

VIRGINIA.

The twenty-three votes of this state were given for Martin Van Buren, of New York, for president and William Smith, of Alabama, for vice president. Six members of the college did not appear, whose places were supplied by the general assembly.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

On the 6th inst. the house of representatives passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the electors of president and vice president be instructed not to vote for MARTIN VAN BUREN, HUGH L. WHITE, or W. H. HARRISON, and to vote for JOHN TYLER, of Virginia, for vice president."

Afterwards, the following resolution was adopted by both branches of the legislature:

"Resolved, That the electors on the part of this state for president and vice president, be instructed to vote for Willie P. Mangum, of North Carolina, for president, and John Tyler of Virginia, for vice president."

The electors are D. J. D. McCord, Thomas F. Jones, B. K. Hennegan, John Maxwell, T. L. Gourdin, Thomas Dugan, John Littlejohn, John Framp-ton, Patrick Noble, R. H. Goodwyn, B. T. Elmore.

OHIO.

We have the State Journal of the 6th inst. In a postscript we learn that the Ohio electors were all present but col. R. Safford, of the 6th congressional district; his place was supplied by the college electing col. Andrew Donally of the state senate. The 21 votes were then given to general Harrison and Francis Granger.

MISSISSIPPI.

Returns from all the counties in this state butten, give a majority of 340 votes for electoral ticket favorable to Van Buren and Johnson.—The remaining counties will, it is said, increase that majority a few hundreds.

RESIGNATION OF MR. LEIGH.

In the house of delegates of Virginia, on Tuesday the 6th inst. the speaker presented a communication from the acting governor enclosing the following letter from Benjamin Watkins Leigh, esq. resigning his office as a senator of the United States.

Richmond, December 5th, 1836.

SIR: In the letter I addressed to the speakers of the two houses of the general assembly, under date of the 2d March last, I announced my purpose to resign my office of senator of the U. States at the commencement of the present session; and I now hereby resign the office.

I should have confined this letter to the single purpose of making this resignation, if the obligations of truth and candor, the care I owe to my own reputation, and, in my sense of things, my duty to my country and its institutions, did not impose upon me the necessity of correcting some misapprehensions, which I have discovered to exist, as to my motives for resigning.

I shall, therefore, avail myself of this opportunity to declare, in the most implicit and solemn manner, what I thought I had intimated very distinctly in my letter of the 2d March, above referred to, that my sole reason and motive for resigning my seat in the senate, consist in the imperious necessity I am under of giving my whole attention to my private affairs, or rather in my sense of the duty which I owe to my family, and to all my personal relations in society. I could not retain my seat in the senate if I would; and I must ask leave to say further, that so far from being in the slightest degree influenced to resign by the instructions which the general assembly gave me at its last session, and the resolution it thought proper to adopt, that I was bound to obey these instructions or resign—so far, too, from being moved by any apprehension of the censure of the general assembly, or even of any public odium I might incur by retaining my office, I placed my whole hope of the lasting approbation of my country upon my resistance to the principles and doctrines as novel in my opinion, as they are erroneous and dangerous, tending to an entire subversion of the constitution of the senate, to an alteration of the whole frame of the federal government, and to the destruction of all the balances wisely provided by the constitution, as well in respect to the relations of the several departments of the government towards each other, as the relations of the whole towards the state government.

I request you to communicate this letter to the general assembly.

I have the honor to be, sir, with all respect,

B. W. LEIGH.

To the hon. Wyndham Robertson, lieu. governor of Virginia.

Mr. Watkins moved to lay the communication on the table, with a view to its reference to a select committee.

Mr. W. remarked, that he might not have correctly understood Mr. Leigh, but if he did, he thought the letter ought to undergo the scrutiny of the house, making, as he thought it did, an attack upon the vital principles of this government, if so it might be necessary to review those principles, and again assert them. No public servant should be permitted to disregard them, without a rebuke from the general assembly. Mr. W.'s apprehensions as to the assumptions of the letter, might not be just, but, if they were, it was due to the right of instruction to shew that no public servant could defy it, without being taught that he would be withered and must cower before the voice of the people.

Mr. Moore had hoped that one session at least, would have been devoted to the business of the people, without the introduction of exciting debates on federal relations. He hoped the motion of the gentleman would not be adopted, as it would lead to unnecessary and tedious discussion, in which, perhaps, many members might feel themselves impelled to engage. He, for one, should do so, and sustain the grounds assumed by Mr. Leigh.

The motion being modified, so as to take the question upon a reference of the letter to a select committee, it prevailed by a vote of 68 to 48, and the following committee was announced by the chair:

Messrs. Watkins, Moore, Garland, Hooe, Miller, Hill, Robinson, Chapman, Newman, Woolfolk, Bayly of A. and Crutchfield.

THE STATE OF THE CURRENCY—LETTER FROM MR. BIDDLE.

From the National Gazette of the 10th inst.

Philadelphia, Nov. 11, 1836.

MY DEAR SIR: I proceed to the second subject of our conversation—the present state of the currency—which I shall treat dispassionately, as an abstract question of mere finance.

Our pecuniary condition seems to be a strange anomaly. When congress adjourned, it left the country with abundant crops and high prices for them—with every branch of industry flourishing—with more specie than we ever possessed before—with all the elements of universal prosperity. Not one of these has undergone the slightest change, yet after a few months congress will reassemble and find the whole country suffering intense pecuniary distress. The occasion of this, and the remedy for it, may well occupy our thoughts.

In my judgment, the main cause of it is the mismanagement of the revenue—mismanagement in two respects: the mode of executing the distribution law, and the order requiring specie for the public lands.

1st. The distribution law.

In July 1836, congress declared that the surplus in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1837, should be divided among the states. That it might be done as gently as possible, the payments were to be made, not at once on the 1st of January, but quarterly throughout the whole year 1837; and as the aggregate sum to be distributed is from thirty-six to forty millions, we may assume the first payment in January to be about nine millions. To prepare for this, the treasury has had in hand forty or fifty millions—it would receive in the course of the operation thirty or forty millions of revenue more—and as there was probably money in every state, and payments to make in every state, the operation was so simple and easy that it ought not to have occasioned the slightest pressure either on public or private interests; and the whole might have been accomplished without any derangement of trade and without the movement of a single dollar in specie. That this not only could be done but has actually been done, you will find in the public documents of 1829.

In that year the new administration of Mr. Jackson, anxious to appropriate every disposable dollar of the revenue to the reduction of the public debt, sought and obtained the aid of the bank of the U. S. Notice was accordingly given on the 31st of March, 1829, that on the 1st of July, the debt and interest, amounting to $8,715,462 87 would be paid. At the period of the notice, the whole available means of the treasury were only six millions, scattered throughout the United States, and these, with the accruing revenue in the interval, were, at a notice of ninety days, to be collected, to pay nearly nine millions. So closely was the government pressed, that after paying these sums, the actual balance in the treasury throughout the whole United States, was reduced to $164,865 04. The bank however undertook the arrangement, with what success may be seen in the following part of the message of Mr. Jackson to congress in December 1829. "The payment on account of the public debt, made on the 1st of July last was $8,715,462 87. It was apprehended that the sudden withdrawal of so large a sum from the banks in which it was deposited, at a time of unusual pressure in the money market, might cause much injury to the interests dependent on bank accommodations. But this evil was wholly averted by an early anticipation of it at the treasury, aided by the judicious arrangement of the officers of the bank of the United States." The respective shares of the bank and the treasury may be conjectured from the secretary's letter of the 11th July 1829, in which he takes occasion to express "the great satisfaction of the treasury department in the preparation for the heavy payment of the public debt on the 1st instant—which has been effected by means of the prudent arrangement of your board, at a time of severe depression on all the productive employments of the country, without causing any sensible addition to the pressure, or even visible effect upon the ordinary operations of the state banks."

If then nine millions, being almost the last dollar in the treasury, could be thus distributed—two millions of it to foreigners—at a time of unusual pressure; how happens it that with funds equal to fifty millions, and with six months notice, nine millions cannot now be distributed—exclusively among our own people—at a time of great abundance, without hazarding a great convulsion? The answer is to be found in the different mode of conducting the operation. This may be seen by contrasting what the secretary might have done, with what he has done.

The distribution law assigned to him two duties, both simple and both easy—the division of the funds among the banks and the division among the states. As to the first, he was to "select as soon as may be practicable and employ as the depositories of the money of the United States, such of the banks as may be located at, adjacent, or convenient to the points or places at which the revenues may be collected or disbursed"—"provided that at least one such bank shall be located in each state or territory"—"and that no bank shall have on deposit more than three-fourths of its capital."

Here is no authority whatever to distribute the money from the banks of one state to the banks of another state. On the contrary, by the twelfth section, all transfers for "any other purpose whatever except to facilitate the public disbursements and to comply with the provisions of this act, are hereby prohibited and declared to be illegal," and "in cases where transfers shall be required for purposes of equalization under the provisions of this act in consequence of too great an accumulation of deposits in any bank—such transfers shall be made to the nearest deposit banks which are considered safe and secure;" and although the supplement says that nothing shall prevent him from making transfers from state to state, "when required to prevent large and inconvenient accumulations in particular places, or in order to produce a due equality and just proportion according to the provisions of that act," the general policy of the law to keep the deposits together, unless under peculiar emergencies, remains unchanged.

Under this law his duty was as clear as possible. He was to see that no bank should have a deposit of more than three-fourths of its capital. The revenue in the great cities, then, should be divided among the banks in those cities—there being in each of them solvent banks enough to receive it.—There was no necessity for sending a dollar of it out of those cities. In New York alone, says he, "the operation will require the transfer of something like eight millions of dollars from the old deposit banks to new ones, either in the state or out of it." But why out of it at all? Why could not the revenue already received in New York and falling due in New York, be divided among the New York banks, to support the trade of New York?—Why not let it remain active there up to the last hour when it was payable to the states? But the law required that there should be at least one deposit bank in each state.—Be it so. Then make a deposit bank in each state, if there be not one already, and give it a deposit, which, while it satisfies the law, will not carry away into inactivity funds that might be useful in places of business.—There was then no necessity to send a dollar from New York, or the other commercial cities, merely for the purpose of preventing any one bank from having more than three-fourths of its capital. That is clear.

Nor was it more necessary for the purpose of distribution among the states. The law says: "That the money which shall be in the treasury of the U. States, on the 1st of January, 1837, shall be deposited with such of the several states as shall by law authorise their treasurer or other competent authorities to receive the same—and the secretary of the treasury shall deliver the same to such treasurer or other competent authorities on receiving certificates of deposit therefor." This is the whole law. Now what does it contemplate?

The money must be in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1837, because up to that time it is not known whether the states will take it. Technically and legally, the treasury is at Washington—practically the treasury is wherever the deposits of the public moneys are. But the secretary of the treasury is an official person whose only official residence is Washington. Accordingly a treasurer of a state goes to the secretary at Washington—and presents to him the certificates of deposit. The secretary thereupon "delivers" to the treasurer his state's quota. But how does he deliver it? By an actual manual counting out of these dollars?—No. By a check on the deposit bank at Washington?—

No. But he delivers to the state treasurer as he does to any other person receiving money, a draft for the amount on some one or more of the depositories which compose the treasury. Is not such a draft, the usual and proper mode of making public payments?—Undoubtedly. And then we come to the real question. Was it necessary to make in advance any transfer of funds whatsoever into the several states merely because they had the option, on certain conditions, of receiving them? If there was no such necessity, then the 12th section of the law makes these transfers illegal. Now there is clearly no such necessity. The money was to be deposited with the states not in them. It was necessarily paid in Washington by drafts on other places. If you say that the secretary must pay it into the state treasury, it is not enough to bring it into the state—he must take it to the seats of government. Pennsylvania must have her share—not in Philadelphia, but in Harrisburgh. New York must be paid, not in the city of New York but in Albany. If the place be not fixed by law, the mutual convenience of the parties will designate it. Now there is no individual and no state in the union that would not prefer payments in New York or the north Atlantic cities, to payments any where else; and for this obvious reason—that money is worth more there than any where else. If the state of Ohio, for instance, had a draft on New York, it could sell it to its citizens, usefully to them and profitably to the treasury. It does not want the money brought into Ohio. Every mile it comes on the road lessens its value. We may safely conclude then that there was no necessity for sending a dollar of public money from New York or the commercial cities for the purpose either of equalizing funds among the banks—or distributing them through the states:

The true theory of the case, therefore, was simply to let the excesses of revenue in the several states be transferred, in the course of trade, to the great commercial points, and then to pay the states by drafts on those points. The deposit banks at those points, knowing what they had to pay, would have been ready to pay—and up to the hour of payment would have employed the funds usefully, so that in every stage of that progress, business would be assisted—commercial activity stimulated—and all parties be gainers.

Even supposing these transfers at all necessary—the funds should have been remitted by bills to the points of accumulation—blending these operations so insensibly with the business of the country as to be unfelt except in their benefits.

But what has the secretary done? Instead of gradual preparations to provide funds at the distant points, the whole science of the treasury seems to have consisted in drawing warrants—in taking up the columns of the returns and directing drafts from the banks, throughout the United States without necessity—without reference to the wants or the business of the different sections of the union, the season of the year or the course of trade—and thus making the whole revenue of the country work against the whole industry of the country.

His secret is thus revealed in the letter to Messrs. Griswold & Swan:

"I have therefore, in cases where the public money had accumulated in any banks in any one state, and new banks could be seasonably obtained in other states where only a little public money already existed, made but one transfer to accomplish both objects, and by a single operation have reduced the excess in certain banks in certain states, and placed it in the states where it would be needed next year, and where they before had not an equal portion of the public money."

We thus perceive—what on less authority would be incredible—the extraordinary manner in which the public revenue has been scattered. The secretary sees an accumulation of public revenue in any one state. He sees another place in another state "where only a little public money already existed"—whereupon he resolves, without the least authority from congress, to bestow upon that place "an equal portion of the public money;" and as he will have, twelve month hence, to pay some money in that state, he makes "a single operation" of it—and accordingly he confesses that he has actually transferred public moneys into states which cannot receive them for a year afterwards—depriving the very community which raised the money of the use of it during the whole period.

Such a measure was of itself sufficient to disorganize the currency. But it was accompanied by another which armed it with a tenfold power of mischief. This was the treasury order prohibiting the receipt at the land offices of any thing but specie—an act which seems to me a most wanton abuse of power, if not a flagrant usurpation.

The whole pecuniary system of this country, that to which, next to its freedom, it owes its prosperity, is the system of credit. Our ancestors came here with no money—but with far better things—with courage and industry—and the want of capital was supplied by their mutual confidence. This is the basis of our whole commercial and internal industry. The government received its duties on credit and sold its lands on credit. When the sales of land on credit became inconvenient from the complication of accounts, the lands were sold for what is termed cash. But this was only another form of credit, for the banks, by lending to those who purchased lands, took the place of the government as creditors—and the government received their notes as equivalent to specie, because always convertible into specie. This was the usage—this may be regarded as the law of the country. By the resolution of congress passed on the 30th of April, 1816, it was declared that "no duties, taxes, debts or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or treasury notes, or notes of the bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States."

This resolution presents various alternatives—the legal currency—or treasury notes—or notes of the bank of the United States—or notes of specie paying banks. A citizen had a right to choose any one of these modes of payment. He had as much right to pay for land with the note of a specie paying bank as to pay it for duties at the custom house. If this be denied, certainly any one of them might be accepted by the treasury—but to proscribe all but one—to refuse every thing but the most difficult thing—to do this without notice of the approaching change in the fundamental system of our dealings—is an act of gratuitous oppression.

Under the operation of this resolution, the banks had gone on, fearing nothing, as they had only to provide for the usual specie calls upon them—and saw the country full of specie, with no foreign demand to drain it from them—when, on a sudden, without any intimation of the coming shock, an order was issued by the secretary, declaring that their notes were no longer receivable, and of course inviting all who held the notes or had deposits in these banks, to convert them into specie. It in fact made at once the whole amount of their circulation and private deposits a specie demand upon them. The first consequence was, that the banks nearest the land offices ceased making loans. The next was, that they strove to fortify themselves by accumulating specie. It was just at this moment that the warrants for transfers were put into their hands. The combination of the two measures produced a double result—first, to require the banks generally to increase their specie, and next, to give them the means of doing it, by drafts on the deposit banks. The commercial community were thus taken by surprise. The interior banks making no loans and converting their Atlantic funds into specie, the debtors in the interior could make no remittances to the merchants in the Atlantic cities, who are thus thrown for support on the banks of those cities at a moment when they are unable to afford relief on account of the very abstraction of their specie to the west. The creditor states, not only receive no money, but their money is carried away to the debtor states, who, in turn, cannot use it, either to pay old engagements or to contract new. By this unnatural process the specie of New York and the other commercial cities is piled up in the western states—not circulated, not used, but held as a defence against the treasury—and while the west cannot use it—the east is suffering for the want of it. The result is, that the commercial intercourse between the west and the Atlantic, is almost wholly suspended, and the few operations which are made, are burdened with the most extravagant expense. In November, 1836, the interest of money has risen to twenty-four per cent.—merchants are struggling to preserve their credit by ruinous sacrifices—and it costs five or six times as much to transmit funds from the west and south west, as it did in November, 1835, or '34, or '32.—Thus while the exchanges with all the world are in our favor—while Europe is alarmed, and the bank of England itself uneasy at the quantity of specie we possess—we are suffering because, from mere mismanagement, the whole ballast of the currency is shifted from one side of the vessel to the other.

In the absence of good reasons for these measures, and as a pretext for them, it is said that the country has overtraded—that the banks have over-issued, and that the purchasers of public lands have been very extravagant. I am not struck by the truth or propriety of these complaints. The phrase of overtrading is very convenient but not very intelligible. If it means any thing, it means that our dealings with other countries have brought us in debt to those countries. In that case the exchange turns against our country, and is rectified by an exportation of specie or stocks in the first instance—and then by reducing the imports to the exports. Now the fact is, that at this moment, the exchanges are all in favor of this country—that is, you can buy a bill of exchange on a foreign country cheaper than you can send specie to that country. Accordingly much specie has come in—none goes out. This too at a moment when the exchange for the last crop is exhausted, and that of the new crop has not yet come into the market—and when we are on the point of sending to Europe the produce of the country, to the amount of eighty or one hundred millions of dollars. How then has the country over-traded? Exchange with all the world is in favor of New York. How then can New York be an over-trader? Her merchants have sold goods to the merchants of the interior, who are willing to pay, and under ordinary circumstances able to pay—but by the mere fault of the government, as obvious as if an earthquake had swallowed them up, their debtor are disabled from making immediate payment. It is not that the Atlantic merchants have sold too many goods, but that the government prevents their receiving payment for any. Moreover in the commercial cities money can be had, though at extravagant rates, for capitalists add to the ordinary charges for the use of it a high insurance against the loss of it. It is not then so much that money is not to be procured, as that doubt and alarm increase the hazard of lending it.

Then as to the banks. It is quite probable that many of the banks have extended their issues—but whose fault is it? Who called these banks into existence? The executive. Who tempted and goaded them to these issues? Undoubtedly the executive. The country five years ago, was in possession of the most beautiful machinery of currency and exchanges the world ever saw. It consisted of a number of state banks protected, and, at the same time, restrained by the bank of the United States.

The people of the United States through their representatives rechartered that institution. But the executive, discontented with its independence, rejected the act of congress—and the favorite topic of declamation was, that the states would make banks, and that these banks could create a better system of currency and exchanges. The states accordingly made banks—and then followed idle parades about the loans of these banks, and their enlarged dealings in exchange. And what is the consequence? The bank of the United States has not ceased to exist more than seven months, and already the whole currency and exchanges are running into inextricable confusion, and the industry of the country is burdened with extravagant charges on all the commercial intercourse of the union. And now, when these banks have been created by the executive, and urged into these excesses, instead of gentle and gradual remedies, a fierce crusade is raised against them—the funds are harshly and suddenly taken from them, and they are forced to extraordinary means of defence against the very power which brought them into being. They received, and were expected to receive, in payment for the government, the notes of each other, and the notes of other banks, and the facility with which they did so, was a ground of special commendation by the government. And now that government has let loose upon them a demand for specie, to the whole amount of these notes. I go further. There is an outcry abroad, raised by faction and echoed by folly, against the banks in the United States. Until it was disturbed by the government, the banking system of the United States was at least as good as that of any other commercial country. What was desired for its perfection, was precisely what I have so long striven to accomplish—to widen the metallic bases of the currency, by a greater infusion of coin into the smaller channels of circulation. This was in a gradual and judicious train of accomplishment. But this miserable foolery about an exclusively metallic currency is quite as absurd as to discard the steamboats, and go back to poling up the Mississippi. Banks may often err from want of skill, and occasionally be injurious as steam is—but it is not the less true, that banks of this country have been the great instruments of its improvement, and that during all the convulsions of the last fifteen years, for every American bank which has failed at least ten English banks have failed.

So with regard to the lands. For the last few years, the amount of the sales of the public lands has been a constant theme of congratulation with the executive. In the very last message, on the 12th of December, 1835, he repeats the same strain. "Among the evidences of the increasing prosperity of the country, not the least gratifying is that afforded by the receipts of the public lands, which amount in the present year to eleven millions of dollars. This circumstance attests the rapidity with which agriculture, the first and most important occupation of man, advances and contributes to the wealth and power of our extended territory." In the same message he declared that "the circulating medium has been greatly improved. By the use of the state banks it is ascertained that all the wants of the community in relation to exchange and currency are supplied as well as they have ever been before." Scarcely seven months elapse when these pastoral and financial visions dissolve in air. Agriculture ceases to be "the first and most important occupation of man"—the state banks cease to be the models of exchange and currency—but forth issues the secretary with a declaration, that to protect the treasury "from frauds, speculation and monopolies in the purchase of public lands"—from "excessive bank credits"—from "ruinous extension of bank issues"—nothing shall be received for land but gold and silver.

Now what an exhibition is this?

The public lands are exposed to public auction, the prices reduced in order to encourage sales, and the president stands by, exulting at the amount, when suddenly he declares that he will permit no speculations, and that he will raise the price of the lands by raising the price of what alone he will receive for them. Now, supposing it true that men have bought much land. What right has the president to dictate to the citizens of this country, whether they buy too much land or too much broadcloth? They might be permitted to know and to manage their own concerns quite as well as he does, leaving the evil, if it be one, to correct itself, by its own excess. If he prohibits the receipt of any thing but specie to correct land speculations, he may make the same prohibition as to the duties on hardware or broadcloth or wines, whenever his paternal wisdom shall see us buying too many shovels, or too many coats, or too much Champagne—and thus bring the entire industry of the country under his control.

These troubles may not, however, be wholly useless, if we extract from them two great lessons.—The first is, that we can have no permanent financial prosperity while the public revenue is separated from the business of the country and committed to rash and ignorant politicians with no guides but their own passions and interests. I have little doubt that the specie order is the revenge of the president upon congress for passing the distribution law. I have less doubt that this dispersion of the revenue among a multitude of banks was to advance the obscure aspirations of some treasury Cæsar.

The other lesson is—one a thousand times repeated and a thousand times forgotten—to distrust all demagogues of all parties who profess exclusive love for what they call the people. For the last six years the country has been nearly convulsed by efforts to break the mutual dependence of all classes of citizens—to make the laborer regard his employer as his enemy, and to array the poor against the rich. These trashy declaimers have ended by bringing the country into a condition where its whole industry is subject far more than it ever was before, to the control of the large capitalists—and where every step tends inevitably to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer.

It remains to speak of the remedy of these evils. They follow obviously the causes of them. The causes are the injudicious transfers of the public moneys, and the treasury order about specie.

The first measure of relief therefore should be, the instant repeal of the treasury order requiring specie for lands—the second, the adoption of a proper system to execute the distribution law.

These measures would restore confidence in twenty-four hours, and repose at least in as many days. If the treasury will not adopt them voluntarily, congress should immediately command it.

In the mean time, all forbearance and calmness should be maintained. There is great reason for anxiety—none whatever for alarm—and with mutual confidence and courage, the country may yet be able to defend itself against the government. In that struggle, my own poor efforts shall not be wanting. I go for the country, whoever rules it—I go for the country, best loved when worst governed—and it will afford me far more gratification to assist in repairing its wrongs, than to triumph over those who inflict them. With great respect and regard, yours,

N. BIDDLE.

Hon. John Q. Adams, Washington, D. C.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT, Communicating the correspondence on the subject of the publication of the works of the late JAMES MADISON.

To the senate and house of representatives:

I transmit herewith to congress copies of my correspondence with Mrs. Madison, produced by the resolution adopted at the last session of the senate and house of representatives, on the decease of her venerated husband. The occasion seems to be appropriate to present a letter from her on the subject of the publication of a work of great political interest and ability, carefully prepared by Mr. Madison's own hand, under circumstances that give it claims to be considered as little less than official.

Congress has already, at considerable expense, published, in a variety of forms, the naked journals of the revolutionary congress, and of the convention that formed the constitution of the United States. I am persuaded that the work of Mr. Madison, considering the author, the subject matter of it, and the circumstances under which it was prepared, long withheld from the public as it has been by those motives of personal kindness and delicacy that gave tone to his intercourse with his fellow men, until he and all who had been participants with him in the scenes he describes have passed away, well deserves to become the property of the nation, and cannot fail, if published and disseminated at the public charge, to confer the most important of all benefits on the present and every succeeding generation—accurate knowledge of the principles of their government, and the circumstances under which they were recommended, and embodied in the constitution for adoption.

ANDREW JACKSON.

December 6, 1836.

Department of state, July 9, 1836.

The secretary of state has the honor to report to the president that there is no resolution of congress on the death of Mr. Madison, on file in the department of state. By application at the offices of the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house of representatives, the enclosed certified copy of a set of resolutions has been procured. These resolutions being joint, should have been enrolled, signed by the presiding officers of the two houses, and submitted for the executive approbation. By referring to the proceedings on the death of general Washington, such a course appears to have been thought requisite; but in this case it has been deemed unnecessary, or has been omitted accidentally. The value of the public expression of sympathy would be so much diminished by postponement to the next session, that the secretary has thought it best to present the papers, incomplete as they are, as the basis of such a letter as the president may think proper to direct to Mrs. Madison.

JOHN FORSYTH, sec. of state.

Washington, July 9, 1836.

MADAM: It appearing to have been the intention of congress to make me the organ of assuring you of the profound respect entertained by both its branches for your person and character, and of their sincere condolence in the late afflicting dispensation of Providence, which has at once deprived you of a beloved companion, and your country of one of its most valued citizens, I perform that duty by transmitting the documents herewith enclosed.

No expression of my own sensibility at the loss sustained by yourself and the nation could add to the consolation to be derived from these high evidences of the public sympathy. Be assured, madam, that there is not one of your countrymen who feels more poignantly the stroke which has fallen upon you, or who will cherish with a more endearing constancy the memory of the virtues, the services, and the purity of the illustrious man whose glorious and patriotic life has been just terminated by a tranquil death.

I have the honor to be, madam, your most obedient servant,
ANDREW JACKSON.
Mrs. Dolly P. Madison, Montpelier, Virginia.

Montpelier, August 20, 1836.

To the president of the United States:

I received, sir, in due time, your letter conveying to me the resolutions congress were pleased to adopt on the occasion of the death of my beloved husband—a communication made the more grateful by the kind expression of your sympathy which it contained.

The high and just estimation of my husband by my countrymen and friends, and their generous participation in the sorrow occasioned by our irretrievable loss, (expressed through their supreme authorities and otherwise), are the only solace of which my heart is susceptible on the departure of him who had never lost sight of that consistency, symmetry and beauty of character in all its parts, which secured to him the love and admiration of his country, and which must ever be the subject of peculiar and tender reverence to one whose happiness was derived from their daily and constant exercise.

The best return I can make for the sympathy of my country is to fulfil the sacred trust his confidence reposed in me—that of placing before it and the world what his pen prepared for their use—a legacy, the importance of which is deeply impressed on my mind. With great respect,

D. P. MADISON.

Montpelier, November 15, 1836.

To the president of the United States:

SIR: The will of my late husband, James Madison, contains the following provision:

"Considering the peculiarity and magnitude of the occasion which produced the convention at Philadelphia, in 1787, the characters who composed it, the constitution which resulted from their deliberations, its effects during a trial of so many years on the prosperity of the people living under it, and the interest it has inspired among the friends of free government, it is not an unreasonable inference that a careful and extended report of the proceedings and discussions of that body, which were with closed doors, by a member who was constant in his attendance, will be particularly gratifying to the people of the United States, and to all who take an interest in the progress of political science and the cause of true liberty."

This provision bears evidence of the value he set on his report of the debates in the convention; and he has charged legacies on them alone, to the amount of $12,000, for the benefit of literary institutions and for benevolent purposes, leaving the residuary net proceeds for the use of his widow.

In a paper written by him, and which it is proposed to annex as a preface to the debates, he traces the formation of confederacies and of the articles of confederation, its defects which caused and the steps which led to the convention, his reasons for taking the debates, and the manner in which he executed the task, and his opinion of the framers of the constitution. From this I extract his description of the manner in which they were taken, as it guarantees their fullness and accuracy:

"In pursuance of the task I had assumed, I chose a seat in front of the presiding member, with the other members on my right and left hands. In this favorable position for hearing all that passed, I noted down in terms legible, and in abbreviations and marks intelligible to myself, what was read from the chair or spoken by the members; and losing not a moment unnecessarily between the adjournment and reassembling of the convention, I was enabled to write out my daily notes during the session, or within a few finishing days after its close, in the extent and form preserved in my own hand, on my files.

"In the labor and correctness of this I was not a little aided by practice, and by familiarity with the style and the train of observation and reasoning which characterized the principal speakers. It happened, also, that I was not absent a single day, nor more than the casual fraction of an hour in any day, so that I could not have lost a single speech, unless a very short one."

However prevailing the restraint which veiled, during the life of Mr. Madison, this record of the creation of our constitution, the grave which has closed over all those who participated in its formation has separated their acts from all that is personal to him or to them. His anxiety for their early publicity after this was removed, may be inferred from his having them transcribed and revised by himself; and, it may be added, the known wishes of his illustrious friend, Thomas Jefferson, and other distinguished patriots, the important light they would have shed for present as well as future usefulness, besides my desire to fulfil the pecuniary obligations imposed by his will, urged their appearance, without awaiting the preparation of his other works; and early measures were accordingly adopted by me to ascertain from publishers in various parts of the union the terms on which their publication could be effected.

It was also intended to publish with these debates those taken by him in the congress of the confederation in 1782, '8 and '7, of which he was then a member, and selections made by himself, and prepared under his eye, from his letters narrating the proceedings of that body during the periods of his service in it, prefixing the debates in 1776 on the Declaration of Independence, by Thomas Jefferson, so as to embody all the memorials in that shape known to exist. This expose of the situation of the country under the confederation, and the defects of the old system of government evidenced in the proceedings under it, seem to convey such preceding information as should accompany the debates on the formation of the constitution by which it was superseded.

The proposals which have been received, so far from corresponding with the expectations of Mr. Madison when he charged the first of these works with those legacies, have evidenced that their publication could not be engaged in by me without advances of funds, and involving of risks which I am not in a situation to make or incur.

Under these circumstances, I have been induced to submit for your consideration whether the publication of these debates be a matter of sufficient interest to the people of the United States to deserve to be brought to the notice of congress. And should such be the estimation of the utility of these works by the representatives of the nation, as to induce them to relieve me individually from the obstacles which impede it, their general circulation will be insured, and the people be remunerated by its more economical distribution among them.

With high respect and consideration,

D. P. MADISON.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,

ON THE STATE OF THE FINANCES.

Treasury department, Dec. 6th, 1836.

In obedience to the directions of the "act supplementary to the act to establish the treasury department," the secretary of the treasury respectfully submits to congress the following report:

1. Of the public revenue and expenditures.

It is believed that the whole amount of money in the treasury on the 1st of January next, applicable to public purposes, will be about $41,723,959.

This conclusion rests in part on what has been actually ascertained, and in part on estimates.

Thus the balance in the treasury, on the 1st of January, 1835, was $3,892,856 42

The receipts from all sources, during that year, were $35,430,087 10

Viz:

From customs	$19,391,310 59
" lands	14,757,600 76
Dividends and sales of bank stock	569,280 82
Incidental items	195,561 98
Neapolitan indemnity	516,332 96

Those, with the above balance, make an aggregate of $44,322,945 52

The expenditures on all objects during the year 1835, were 17,573,141 56

On civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous objects 3,721,261 60

Neapolitan awards 508,436 93

Military service, including fortifications, &c. 9,420,812 69

Naval service, including gradual improvement 3,864,939 06

Public debt 58,191 28

For the details of the receipts and expenditures in the year 1836, reference is made to the annual account thereof, which is this day submitted to congress in a separate communication.

The balance left in the treasury on the first of January, 1836, was, therefore, $26,749,803 96.

The receipts into the treasury during 1836, as ascertained and estimated, will be about $47,691,898.

Of these, the receipts during the first three quarters, are ascertained to have been $38,141,898 04

Viz:

From customs	$17,523,151 79
" lands	20,048,929 88
Dividends and sales of United States bank stock	292,676 67

Incidental items, including excess of repayments on account of public debt, as hereafter stated 247,139 70

This does not embrace the receipts in trust on account of the Chickasaw Indians.

Of those receipts, and their investment, beside the expenditures from them, a report will forthwith be laid before congress, in conformity to treaties, and the acts of congress carrying those treaties into effect.

Neither does it embrace the receipts on account of the post office and patent office, of which, as well as the expenditures on the same accounts, separate statements are kept, in conformity to the late laws, and will be rendered by the proper officers.

Nor does it include what has been received in trust the present year for the claimants under the French, Neapolitan and Spanish treaties.

A separate account will be exhibited in this report of the receipts and expenditures from those sources, in order to avoid complexity and ambiguity in the statement of the general receipts and expenditures in behalf of the government alone.

The receipts during the fourth quarter of the present year, it is computed will be about $9,550,000.

These, with the balance on the 1st of January, 1836, from an aggregate of $74,441,702.

The expenditures during the year 1836, are ascertained and estimated to be $31,435,032.

Of these, the amount during the first three quarters is ascertained to have been $20,791,872 16.

Viz: on civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous, $3,850,101 55.

Military service, including fortifications, &c. $18,010,061 59.

Naval service, &c. $3,931,209 02.

Public debt, less than the repayments by the commissioners of the sinking fund, as hereafter explained.

For the details of all these, and the incidental receipts, during those three quarters, reference is made to the exhibit annexed (A 1 and 2).

The expenditures for the fourth quarter, as computed by the proper departments, will be 10,643,660 dollars; but which, it is thought by me, will probably fall short of that amount.

This will leave on hand, on the first of January, 1837, an estimated balance of $43,005,669. From this, if the diminished sum of $1,080,000 for unavailable funds be deducted, the available balance of money, on the first of January, 1837, would be the sum of $41,925,669.

But beside the charges already imposed on this balance by appropriations for public purposes still unpaid, and which will soon be adverted to, there is in fact included in it about $201,710, which was paid into the treasury, chiefly in former years, from private sources alone, and for private or specific purposes, and which neither accrued from the usual sources of public revenue, nor ever belonged to the general government, except to fulfil the particular trusts under which it was received in behalf of others.

A schedule of those items and sums on the first of December, 1836, is annexed (B). Deduct their amount from the available balance of $41,925,669, and only about $41,723,959 would remain on the first of January next, applicable to the general purposes of the government.

To this deduction would be subjoined another, had not the receipts and expenditures connected with certain subjects during the present year, or portions of it, been kept distinct for reasons before indicated.

Thus the receipts on account of the post office, which, under the new organization, are paid into the treasury and kept distinct, have, since it took effect, being the last half of the year, been ascertained and computed to be about $1,076,872 including near $410,472, that had been collected previously; and the expenditures have been about $562,952, leaving a balance on hand at the end of the year of about $513,920, as will be more particularly exhibited by the head of that department.

The receipts on account of the patent office, since its new organization, for the present year, have also been ascertained and computed to be about $16,828; the expenditures chargeable to them about $7,241, and the balance about $9,587, as will be more particularly shown by the report of the proper officer.

Besides these, the receipts into the treasury in trust from the treaties of indemnity with France, Naples and Spain, have been about $3,765,994, and the payments to the claimants about $3,668,988, leaving a balance of about $102,026, still uncalled for or unadjusted.

The particulars of these will more fully appear in the general annual exhibit of all the receipts and expenditures.

Lastly, the receipts into the treasury on account of the Chickasaw Indians, have been about $639,252, the expenditures, by investment and otherwise about $577,675; and the balance on hand is about $91,574. The detailed account of these, and the other transactions in their behalf, will be, as remarked in a former portion of this report, immediately presented in a separate communication to congress.

The charges already imposed on the general balance of $41,723,959, by means of current and permanent appropriations—which it is expected will not be expended till after the first of January next, amount to $14,636,062.

Of this sum it is computed that $3,013,389 can be applied in aid of the appropriations, for the ensuing year without reappropriation; and that $195,183 will be carried to the surplus fund, leaving $11,427,490, which will probably be required to accomplish the objects contemplated in the acts of congress.

Deduct this remaining charge of $14,440,879 from the balance estimated to be on hand on the first of January, 1837, and the sum of $27,283,080 would be left to be appropriated by congress towards new or former objects.

2. Of the expenditures for the public debt and its present condition.

Before the passage of the act of congress at the last session on the subject of the public debt, the money, which had previously been deposited by the commissioners of the sinking fund, in the U. States bank, for the payment of the residue of it, was, under their direction, repaid into the treasury, amounting to the sum of $136,773 01.

Since that event, and the suspension of the duties of the commissioners, this department, by virtue of the above act, has caused all those portions of the public debt outstanding and presented for payment, to be promptly discharged.

The payments made since the first of January last, have been as follows, viz:

On the funded debt, towards principal $46,405 72
Towards interest 3,139 09

Making in all the sum of $49,544 81

There still remains of the funded debt, unclaimed and undischarged principal about $90,367

And interest with dividends, about $250,416

A small unfunded debt of $37,440 55, also, remains, which may hereafter be claimed, and on which has been paid during the past year, including $16 07 for interest on treasury notes, the sum of $83 57

It consists of claims registered prior to 1798, for services and supplies during the revolutionary war, equal to $27,385 46

Treasury notes issued during the war of 1812 5,735

And Mississippi stock 4,320 09

3. Of the estimates of the public revenue and expenditures of the year 1837.

The receipts into the treasury, from all sources, during 1837, are estimated at $24,000,000

Viz:

From customs $16,500,000

From lands 5,000,000

From bank stock 2,000,000

Miscellaneous, including interest from deposit banks 500,000

To these add the balance of available funds in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1837, estimated, as computed for public purposes, at 41,723,959

And they make an aggregate of 65,723,959

The expenditures for all objects, ordinary and extraordinary, in 1837, including the contingent of only $1,000,000 for usual excesses in appropriations beyond the estimates, are computed at $26,755,831, provided the unexpended appropriations at the end of this and the next year remain about equal.

Thus the new and permanent appropriations chargeable to 1837 for specified purposes, whether ordinary or extraordinary, and including what can be used without reappropriation, are computed at $23,755,831

Of these, the permanent appropriations already made, are estimated at $2,347,000

The existing appropriations which will not be required for the service of 1836, and which it is proposed to apply in aid of 1837, amount to 3,013,339

The new appropriations that will be needed for 1837, are estimated to amount, in all, to 20,354,442

The latter are divided among the different branches of the public service, as follows, viz:

Civil, foreign intercourse and miscellaneous $2,924,671

Military service, &c. 10,758,431

Naval service, &c. 6,670,341

The details of the above estimates are exhibited in a document from the register's office, which this department has the honor to lay before the house of representatives, to-day, in a separate communication.

To these have been added, for the ensuing year, on account of the usual contingent excesses of appropriations beyond the estimates, one million of dollars, making in all, as before mentioned, the aggregate of $26,755,831.

From these calculations, it will be seen that if the outstanding appropriations unexpended at the close of 1837, be as large as at the close of 1836, and the other expenditures should agree with the above estimates, they would exceed the computed revenue accruing from all sources nearly three millions, or sufficient to absorb more than half of the present surplus, which is not to be deposited with the several states. But if these outstanding appropriations, at the close of 1837, should be much less than those in 1836, as is probable; or should the accruing receipts be much less, or the appropriations made for 1837, be much larger than the estimates, a call will become necessary for a portion of the surplus deposited with the states, though it will not probably become necessary, excepting in one of those events.

4. Some explanation of the estimates for 1837.

The unusual receipts during the last two years, have chiefly accrued from the unprecedented sales of public lands.

It is remarkable, that those sales assumed their extraordinary character chiefly between July, 1835, and October, 1836—a period of little more than fourteen months.

Arising, as they have, principally from private entries, and not from any unusual quantities of land offered for public sale, and marked as they have been, by sudden and great vibrations, it has not been deemed judicious to consider them as a proper basis for permanent estimates of a public character.

Accordingly, the sum adopted for the estimates of the sales the past year, as well as that for the ensuing year, though larger than usual, has been grounded on general considerations of a less fluctuating character, leaving accidental and occasional excesses or deficiencies to happen, as they often will, without either the attempt or ability in this department to predict the extent of them with much certainty. The receipts from customs the present year will be somewhat augmented by the great speculations which have characterized the business of the country generally, and the destruction by fire of an extraordinary amount of foreign goods near the close of the last year. This calamity, followed by credits more liberal, and competition increased to supply the sudden and large deficiencies in the market, led to an excess in the importations of merchandise during the present year, even greater than the amount destroyed, and thus essentially contributed to swell the revenue from customs beyond the estimates. But overtrading, from whatever inducements it may arise, usually produces a reaction; and it is hoped that no accident of a similar and depreciated character will occur, which may enlarge our importations the ensuing year. The receipts from customs for 1837, have, therefore, from these and other circumstances which it might be tedious to detail, been estimated at not more than $16,500,000.

Only about $50,000 of the amount secured by special bonds from the sufferers by fire last December, under the authority of an act of congress on that subject, has been postponed, so as to fall due within the ensuing year, while a reduction on account of the diminished rate of duty imposed on wines since July last, has been made in the estimates for 1837, equalling quite three times that sum. Besides unusual speculations and overtrading, which are temporary in their operation, the last two years have exhibited an extraordinary degree of prosperity throughout the whole country, and which it is presumed, will continue to exercise a considerable direct influence on the whole amount of our exports and imports, and consequently an indirect influence on our receipts from customs. Much of this flattering condition of things may have arisen from the great reductions already made in the tariff and duties on tonnage; from having cast off the burthens of a national debt; from our increasing expenditures on works favorable to commerce and public security; from permanent additions to the moneyed capital of the nation by the many millions obtained abroad for foreign indemnities; from the immense fertile tracts of land redeemed from Indian claims, and opened to the profitable enterprise and industry of our citizens at very low prices, by the humane policy of removing the aborigines west of the Mississippi; from the unprecedented improvements in the facilities, the rapidity and cheapness of communication and of transportation by steam-boats and rail roads; from the greater safety of our foreign commerce, and its extension to new and distant regions; from abundant crops and high prices; from the increasing numbers, intelligence and enterprise of our people generally, or from these and various other causes combined. But though some of these causes may have spent most of their influence, others are acting in full vigor, and our national prosperity does not appear likely to be soon essentially checked, except so far as the excesses before mentioned, or war, or unavoidable physical calamities, like those of pestilence and bad crops, may from time to time produce temporary reactions.

The receipts from customs, therefore, though not estimated so high, as they proved to be during the past or preceding year, have still been computed at a larger sum than it was formerly anticipated they would on an average, equal under the existing tariff. The imports during the year, ending September 30th, 1836, are ascertained and estimated at $173,540,000

They show, compared with the preceding year, an increase of $23,644,258

The imports during the three past years have on an average, been about $149,985,691

The exports, during the past year, are ascertained and estimated at $121,789,000

Of these, $101,105,000 were in domestic, and $20,684,000 in foreign products.

Compared with the preceding year, they exhibit an increase of $35,423, and are $5,829,150 more than the average for the last three years.

The crop of cotton grown the present year which will constitute the chief exports of that article for 1837, is believed to be large, but from present appearances will probably be less valuable than during the two past years.

At the same time the exports of flour and grain are likely to be smaller, in both quantity and value, and those of tobacco and rice, which with the articles before named, form our principal subjects of domestic produce for exportation, are not believed to be materially greater, and have seldom, during the last quarter of a century in any series of years, much exceeded their previous amount. However enlarged by our rapid increase of population has been the demand at home for those and other articles of our own growth and manufacture, the most tempting and augmenting product for exportation seems to be cotton.

During near forty years it has attracted and engrossed a large portion of the spare capital and labor of nearly half the territory of the union, and by the great demand for it abroad, independent of its increased consumption at home, it will probably long continue to constitute, not only our chief and most profitable product for exportation, but be the regulator, in some degree, of our ability to import, and of the balance of trade, between this country and Europe.

The receipts from incidental and miscellaneous sources, have been estimated on the following data. Nothing very definite could be presented, as arising from an arrangement which, under the recent act of congress, is contemplated with the United States bank, in respect to the stock, owned by the government in that institution, until further progress shall be made, and the bank may indicate when it is willing to pay some specified amount.

It will be seen by the documents annexed, (C 1, 2, 3), that this department took early steps to procure suitable information for a settlement with the bank and payment, in the course of the present year, of the due share of the United States in the net collections from the assets existing on the 3d of March last as well as to obtain specific proposals for an early adjustment of the whole concern. It has been a cause of some surprise that the information desired has not yet been communicated, nor any payment been yet made. On the contrary, the president of the state corporation, to which the assets of the United States bank have been assigned, forwarded in September last a report of a committee appointed under authority of only those two bodies, estimating the value of the stock on the 3d of March. But it was accompanied by no offer to pay that value or any other particular amount, then, or at any future specified period, though professing a willingness that the United States should receive a just proportion out of the assets of the bank.

Commissioners were, therefore appointed, and an invitation given to have them joined by others on the part of the United States bank to revise the estimate of the value put on the stock by the above committee, and after urging early payments as practicable towards what might in the end, be found due to the U. States, if failing to obtain any, to recommend such arrangements as might seem just for securing and paying hereafter what they considered to be the true worth of the share of the government in the capital stock. Copies of the letters, report, and instructions before named, are annexed. (D 1, 2, 3, 4, 5).

It is clearly to be inferred from the correspondence had by the commissioners above mentioned with a committee of the bank, that no payment whatever is intended to be made during the present year, and that long credits are expected and considered by the bank proper for portions of what may be due. That correspondence, and all the steps which have been taken under the particular instructions given to those commissioners, will more fully appear in the further documents which will be submitted to congress after the commissioners make their final report.

No reasonable efforts will be spared by me to conclude some appropriate arrangement of this embarrassing and troublesome subject before the adjournment of the present congress.

Trusting, that a proper sense of its obligations to the government, as a large stockholder, will induce the bank to refund, at least one-fourth of our original capital, with the profits thereon, in the course of the ensuing year, two millions of dollars have on that account been inserted in the estimates. To this are to be added the dividends, anticipated on the stock owned in the Louisville and Portland canal; interest from the deposit banks; and some small receipts from other miscellaneous sources.

5. Of the surplus in the treasury, and the disposition of it.

Various objects of a national and constitutional character, were recommended in the last annual report from this department, as suitable for the application, by way of extraordinary appropriation, of any surplus funds for which the general government should happen to have no other immediate use.

Liberal and useful appropriations were fortunately made to many of them, which will save expense in the end, and prove to be the soundest economy. The reasons for a continuance of the same wise policy, while our resources remain so ample, have lost none of their original force.

As the present surplus had chiefly arisen from an earlier sale of large portions of the public lands than had been expected, it seemed to this department judicious to suggest completing with it sooner than had been contemplated the projected fortifications, and naval establishments of the country; improving more rapidly the navigation and security of its commercial bays and rivers, and, while its imports and exports were prosperous beyond example, erecting where needed, appropriate custom warehouses, as well as suitable marine hospitals, court houses and post offices. In fine, the whole state of our finances appeared to justify and require, that all those great works heretofore deemed useful and constitutional, and which are intimately connected with the duties and powers of the general government, should be more hastened, with our means so much increased and so prematurely available, than would have been proper or practicable, had the revenue continued at only the reduced amount which was generally anticipated. By pursuing such a provident course, it was supposed, that much less would remain to be accomplished, and hence that our expenditures would be much diminished, when our revenue shall become less by the reductions, which, under the existing laws, are to take effect in the customs before, and in 1842, and which will probably happen in the receipts from public lands during that period.

The necessary expenditures of the government would thus, by that time, become naturally, as well as safely lessened, so as to bear a near proportion to our diminished receipts; while otherwise, if the expenditures for these works are not previously increased or expedited, the probabilities would seem to be that the ordinary charges for them, and other usual claims on the general government, with the extraordinary charges incident to war and similar calamities, from which no people can be wholly exempt, might then so far exceed the receipts, as to require new taxation, or an increased tariff.

In respect to another branch of the subject, which relates to a gradual reduction of the present large surplus in the treasury, either by an immediate diminution of the existing tariff, or some new regulation calculated to limit and lessen the amount of the sales of the public lands, by confining them to actual settlers or otherwise, this department felt bound, in the discharge of its public duties, to submit to congress last year, a few considerations which are still equally applicable. It is believed that when the balance on hand, with the accruing receipts, are likely for some time to come to exceed the real wants and just objects of the government for expenditure, a reduction of those receipts, and especially such as are derived from taxation, is the true remedy.

Besides the considerations relating to this reduction which were formerly submitted by this department, it would now respectfully suggest that all the duties under 20 per cent. and which amount to near three millions annually, could, with about half a million more on the articles paying a higher duty, and specified in a report to the senate at the last session, be at once repealed by congress without any encroachment on the principle of the act of the 3d of March, 1833. Nor has this department any doubt that if all the present and anticipated receipts from customs are considered by congress not to be wanted for any public appropriations, or other legitimate objects, reduction could be made in many other duties more rapidly than is now provided for, without any essential injury to any great interest intended to be fostered by the provisions of that act. At the same time such a step as the last, unless found indispensable from high public considerations, and hence generally concurred in, does not appear to this department consistent with the expectations of most of those who united in the passage of that law, and has not therefore been urged.

But, if found indispensable, the next articles which, in the opinion of this department, could most appropriately be selected for greater and quicker reduction, are the raw materials of foreign origin used in some of our important manufactures; and though certain rival articles produced here might suffer by such a change, yet in this way the whole manufacturing industry of the country would probably be benefitted. If sufficient reduction cannot be obtained on that class, the next kind of articles selected should be such as are largely consumed in promoting the comforts, and satisfying the necessities, of the people generally, and at the same time, do not materially compete with important manufactures, nor conflict with great agricultural interests. And the next, if more be deemed necessary, might be such as have now a much higher duty or protection on them than others of greater national consequence.

Certain it is, that a much more just and useful discrimination could be introduced into the whole present system, by reducing more quickly the duties which are found to be least beneficial, by way of protection, and by reducing more slowly those deemed most indispensable. Equally feasible would it be, in the exercise of a proper spirit of comity and justice, to make some legal enactments which should prevent the further sale of the public domain to any persons who do not want it for immediate cultivation. This seems peculiarly proper at a time when the government neither needs the proceeds of such sales for any public use, nor considers the money received adequate to the real value of the land sold, and when the settlement of the new states is retarded, by permitting the public domain to pass, in large quantities into the hands of others than actual settlers. By a wise revision of our present laws, the enterprising, industrious and needy, might, for a fair compensation, be liberally secured in the purchase and enjoyment of a due portion of land for immediate cultivation; and, at the same time, all be effectually prevented from seizing and securing, as a matter of speculation, in any case, on the best tracts, without previous purchase or any pretence of title; and from procuring, through floats or otherwise, for wealthy persons, whether residents or non-residents, the most valuable situations, at the minimum prices.

It must be obvious that nothing beyond a very general, and, in some degree, uncertain exhibit, could at this time, be presented of the probable amount of the surplus in the treasury, deposited with the banks, and the states during a few subsequent years; and more especially of the various sums connected with the different hypotheses, for the future disposition of it, by appropriations for public objects, or by a diminution of it through a large reduction in our future revenue from either customs or lands. The uncertainty as to these sums, is greatly increased, not only by the fluctuating character of our receipts, from both of these sources during the last four years; and as it is anticipated for the future, but from the doubtful amount of our annual expenditure, hereafter, and the absence of any determination, yet expressed by congress, whether to retain, unexpended, all or any portion of the present surplus, till after 1841, with a particular view to supply the place of the great reduction which is then to be made, in our receipts from customs, under the existing laws.

Minute details, therefore, on these points would be only hypothetical, and might, without further data on which to found them, mislead instead of proving useful.

But it is probable that congress may deem it expedient to pursue one of the following general courses in relation to the present large surplus, and any which might hereafter accrue under our existing laws. Either to appropriate more liberally to great objects of national consequence while the treasury is so full, and in that way gradually call for and employ the surplus till those objects are accomplished, and then to reserve only the residue if any in deposit with the states, to meet future contingencies and the anticipated deficiencies in the revenue after 1842. Or to reduce it still more rapidly by largely diminishing our revenue, whether from customs or lands, and thus requiring more of the current expenditures to be paid from the present surplus until the whole shall be exhausted; or to permit the most of it to remain longer in deposit within the states and so shape future appropriations as never to render it necessary to call for the surplus, except to meet unexpected and extraordinary wants.

In respect to this last measure, so far as already adopted by congress as a temporary one, and the operation of it upon our fiscal concerns to this time and hereafter, a few further observations may be expected.

Before the two sessions of congress just passed, it was considered doubtful whether that body would deem it expedient to adopt the recommendations of this department to expend early on proper objects all the net balance in the treasury after defraying existing charges; or, if unwilling to do that, to reduce at once the revenue from customs and lands, and leave with the people the excess which would otherwise be collected, so as gradually to absorb the present surplus, and ere long to collect none of any considerable magnitude, whether for extraordinary expenditure, distribution or other purposes. Consequently, a suggestion was made in the annual reports of 1834 and 1835, for the temporary investment of the surplus, while either of those operations might be going on, and if neither of them was adopted, then to remain safe and productive, until it should hereafter be needed for public purposes. The proposed disposal of it for these periods, which it was expected would not be very protracted, was in a form which was considered secure and profitable by the purchase of safe stocks.

Thus easily and gradually, as well as most prudently, it was supposed the inconveniences of so unexpected and embarrassing an event as a large surplus would be obviated, and at the same time a provident fund created, which would be yielding interest, and which could afterwards be resorted to, when the current expenditure might from any cause, either before or after 1841, exceed the current revenue. In relation to that subject though a topic still intimately and deeply connected with our finances, few additional remarks at this time, seemed called for, since congress at the last session, by a clause in the deposit law, provided for what this department considers, and has taken all proper preliminary steps to make, a temporary disposition of the whole money in the treasury on the first of January next, except five millions of dollars. Looking at that as a financial measure, which is the only view now under consideration, the granting the use of the money without any interest, constitutes a difference from the mode proposed by this department, which was doubtless designed as a benefit to the several states, and in that view was also very properly proffered to all if to any of the states, whether now in debt or not, and whether needing the money for any great public purpose or not.

While treated in the nature of a mere temporary deposit or investment on the credit of each state respectively, without interest, the profits or income of it alone to be expended, and the principal to be ever held sacred and ready for repayment whenever needed, like a fund that is providently designed to meet any future public contingencies, this kind of deposit may not embarrass our finances, and is likely to prove useful and convenient to the treasury. But should considerable portions of it be soon wanted by the general government, the deposit will probably occasion, to many of the states, inconvenience and difficulties, if not losses, in the management and repayment of it, more than equivalent to the interest received. On the contrary, if much of it be not wanted for some years, or till after 1841, the result may be otherwise to such states as either need the money, or are able to employ it beneficially. The experience of this department has been too brief, under the constant and laborious preparation, to carry into effect, in due time, all the provisions in the late deposit act, to warrant, on the present occasion, any recommendations of modifications in this particular portion of it.

But it is respectfully suggested, that, though a gradual investment of the surplus in existing state stocks would, it is believed, have produced no pressure in the money market, yet the embarrassment incident to the transfers of such large sums of money as became necessary, in order to divide it seasonably among a greater number of banks, as well as among the different states, and the consequent temporary withdrawal of considerable portions of it from immediate use, are embarrassments inseparable from the provisions and faithful execution of the law in its present form. Though they constitute only a portion of those evils which now afflict the commercial community, and have been mitigated in their operation by this department, wherever practicable, they could not be wholly obviated, without departing entirely from the duties imposed by the law.

Immediately after its passage, steps were taken, as required by congress, to commence a reduction of the deposits, which had then accumulated in certain banks beyond three-fourths the amount of their capitals, and at the same time to have some portion of the anticipated surplus taken from states where its accumulation had been large or inconvenient, and placed, before the first of January next, in states where enough had not before been deposited, and where suitable banks existed willing to receive it. These steps will be more fully detailed in a subsequent part of this report. All the payments to the several states for the whole year are expected to be made punctually at the times required. But it will be necessary, from the mode of keeping public accounts, to take the current statement of the treasurer on the 1st January next, as the guide for the supposed amount in the treasury which is required to be apportioned among the states, and one quarter of it be deposited on that day. By pursuing any other course, an unavoidable delay of weeks, if not months, would be necessary in making the preliminary arrangements for the first payment. But that statement seldom differs more than a few hundred dollars from the result as ascertained on subsequent settlement; and hence, its amount, independent of unavailable funds, and what is held for the post office and patent office, and in various official trusts, will be deemed the true sum intended by congress as subject to apportionment, after deducting five millions, unless in the mean time the department shall be otherwise directed by that body.

The whole sum to be deposited with the states, will, on these principles, and according to present appearances, range between thirty-five and thirty-eight millions of dollars, and exceed somewhat $120,000 to each electoral vote in each of the twenty-five states now in the union; Michigan, from the language of the act, not being considered as yet entitled to an apportionment under it. Three states have already signified their willingness to receive the money on the terms proposed, and it is expected that several more will do the same before the first of January, and probably most of them in the course of the present winter.

Leaving further suggestions on these and various other considerations which bear on this interesting subject, but which need not be here repeated, the department will next proceed to an exhibit of the manner in which this surplus, as well as the rest of the public money, has been kept during the past year, and of the detailed preparations which have been made for the future custody and preservation of it, in conformity to the act of congress to regulate the deposits of the public money passed June 23, 1836, and the supplementary act on the same subject passed the 4th of July, 1836.

6. Of the keeping of the public money, and state of the deposite banks.

The money in the treasury has been safely kept during the year 1836. Until July last, as during the two previous years, it was placed in the state banks, selected according to the discretion of this department, on account of their high standing and favorable position for fiscal purposes, and regulated in a manner considered most secure to the treasury, and convenient to the community, as well as useful to all concerned. It is a source of much gratification to be able to add, that, while so selected and employed, not a single dollar was lost to the government by any of them, or a single failure occurred to transfer promptly, and pay out satisfactorily, the public money entrusted to their custody.

Nor is it believed that the domestic exchanges of the country were ever lower or more regular than during that period; and the large amount of them performed by those deposite banks in ordinary purchases or discounts, equalling from one hundred and fifty to two hundred millions of dollars yearly, or near a third more than those of the same kind by the United States bank, while the fiscal agent of the government, evinced the great ability and usefulness of those banks on this important subject.

But since the passage of the act of congress, June 23d, 1836, "to regulate the deposits of the public money," most of the discretionary power before exercised by this department on this subject, under previous laws and long usages, has been considered as no longer possessed, and various solicitations to use it, though some of them were in cases of extreme hardship, could not, therefore, be complied with. Relieved from great responsibility, and in many cases from much delicacy, in the exercise of it, by the passage of that act, a new system, in conformity with its provisions, and in place of the former one, was at once commenced by this department, and has since been pursued with all the strictness and regularity which the nature of business so extensive and complicated would permit, and at the same time with every indulgence and forbearance, in cases of embarrassment or suffering, which were permissible without a violation of law. It was necessary by the act to appoint anew all the former deposite banks, if they were to be retained in the service of the government. Accordingly, the preliminary inquiries, rendered proper by the new law before any selection was authorised to be made, were immediately instituted in every case of the former deposite banks; and having been satisfactorily answered, all of them have been reappointed, except three, where some formalities in their papers are not yet completed.

The provision in the act which prohibits more public money to be left in any one bank than three-fourths the amount of its capital, rendered the selection of numerous new banks to receive the sums which the old ones were not allowed to retain, indispensable in the present overflowing condition of the treasury, and especially at places in which the capitals of the old banks were small.

The transfer of all the money in the treasury, except five millions, on the first of January next, to be deposited in the treasuries of the several states quarterly during 1837, in ratable proportions, made it proper to select also a few other new banks in some of the states to receive those proportions, or sufficient parts of them, when they happened to be either collected there, or to be incidentally and easily transferable there.

Thus the trouble and embarrassment of a second and sudden transfer in January next, and quarterly thereafter during the year, were often saved by combining in several appropriate cases the transfers ordered by congress to be soon made from banks having an excess, with the transfers of that excess to other banks in the states where it was to be paid during the present year on appropriations, or the ensuing year on the apportionments and in which last described banks and states a deficiency existed. In this way, on several occasions, the opportunity has been improved, of beginning to perfect, gradually, and, in some degree, contemporaneously, between places near, suitable and of easy intercommunication, the great and difficult apportionment of the deposits of public money among several different states, as well as among different banks. The whole amount of transfers ordered since the first of July last, have, of necessity, been at times very large; but many of them have not yet taken effect; many more are still to be ordered, and the whole amount necessary to accomplish both objects will be less, and their operation easier, than if a different course had been pursued, and the two apportionments between the banks and the states, had not been united in cases where practicable and convenient, and where large accumulations existed on the one hand to be reduced, and deficiencies on the other to be supplied. Their union in such cases is supposed to have been specially contemplated by congress, as explained in the second and supplementary deposite act passed in July, and, as seemed just to the several states which had not before enjoyed much, if any benefit from the deposite and use of the public money within their limits.

Hence, while many transfers have been forborne, when feasible under the law, and desired from public considerations, connected with the great pressure in the money market, and which pressure they would though authorised by the acts, have severely aggravated, yet great care has been employed not to make a single transfer, except, in the language of the first deposite act, "to facilitate the public disbursements, and to comply with the provisions of the act" or, as described more fully in the second act, either "to prevent large and inconvenient accumulation in particular places, or in order to produce a due equality and just proportion, according to the provisions of said act." All the transfers ordered, have likewise been so modified in respect to time, place and business, as to produce the least inconvenience and expense possible to the banks or the community, consistent with faithful endeavors to execute the law on both subjects reasonably and efficiently. They have been so conducted, as also to relieve the treasury from any expense whatever in a financial operation so large and so unusual. But in carrying out so large a moneyed operation as the new law demanded, and one neither comporting with our usual fiscal proceedings, nor following the ordinary channels of trade, it has required great caution not to create more embarrassment than has really occurred from this source, and a greater derangement in exchanges than actually exists. In complying with the deposite act, it has already been found necessary to appoint forty-eight more banks, making on the first instant, with the former ones, without their branches the whole number of eighty-one.

The department has endeavored in these selections to conform to the spirit of the act of congress, as regards their convenient location for accommodating either the collections or the disbursements of the public money. It has in all cases required the preliminary information made necessary by the act. It has, as enjoined, chosen at least one bank in every state, which had banking institutions, and which included all except Missouri and Arkansas. It has obtained from each bank a written agreement to comply with the duties prescribed by law, and in every case, except four or five not deemed suitable, from peculiar circumstances, has received collateral security for the faithful fulfilment of these agreements, and has endeavored, from time to time, to make such requests on the subject of specie and other topics connected with their condition, and their mode of transacting business, as seemed conducive to safety and public convenience. The names of each deposite bank, with the amount of public money in each, and its detailed condition, in all respects near the first of November, 1836, are exhibited in the documents annexed (E 1, 2). In another document (F) is presented, more fully and recently, the condition of those banks with this department, as it shows by their last returns to the treasurer, on the first instant, the amount of public money then on hand, the outstanding drafts then against them, and the existing transfers to and from each.

A number of the states now have deposits sufficient with the accruing revenue, to meet all the probable demands within their limits the next year. But it is otherwise with several of them, and, where money has not yet been placed in each state sufficient to meet the probable amount of deposits required there during the first quarter of the next year, for expenditure, as well as apportionment, it has been, or will be, put under orders of transfer, so as to reach there seasonably.

Numerous difficult and embarrassing questions have arisen in the execution of the new deposite act, in consequence of the novelty of many of its provisions, and the unequal operation of others on some of the depositories. But where great doubts existed, as to the true intention of the law, the opinion of the attorney general has been taken.—When that opinion has been unfavorable to the views entertained, under the law as it now stands, the parties have been left, as they must always be in such cases, of supposed inequality and hardship, for resort to congress for appropriate relief.

It is therefore respectfully suggested, that relief for the past, may be proper, in several cases which it is anticipated the parties interested will present to the consideration of congress. For the convenience of this department, it is desirable that a provision be made for the future, that any agency furnishing ample security, be regarded under the law, as having the same separate capital where established, as the bank to which it belongs.

It is further recommended, that authority be given to discontinue such of the newly selected banks as may from time to time be no longer needed for fiscal or other purposes. A large portion of them, after the contemplated deposits are made with the several states, will probably, become entirely useless to the treasury, while their returns and correspondents will continue to be burdensome to all concerned.

Immediately after the passage of the law, it became the duty of this department, among other things, to select a sufficient number of banks to hold the public money without exceeding three-fourths of the amount of their capitals, and one at least in each state having banks. As it seemed impossible to carry these provisions into execution in several of the states, unless banks should be selected which might possibly have issued or paid out some small bills after the 4th of July, and before they had completed the agreement, and assumed the duties imposed by the act, it was thought that a natural construction given to this limitation in that respect would make it applicable only to such banks as were selected and subject to the law previous to that date, and that the others must not on a like principle make any such issues after their selection. This would impart a reasonable and practical effect to the clause, and at the same time not tend entirely to defeat the operation of other provisions in the act. Accordingly, minute inquiries were not instituted whether the banks applying to be selected had previous to their application issued such bills or not; but all were required at the time of their selection, to enter into an express written agreement to conform to the provisions of the act, and consequently not to issue any while they were public depositories. On more mature reflection, doubts having arisen whether this was going far enough, and whether any banks which may have issued small bills between the 4th of July and their selection could, in strict law, be retained, or could have been legally appointed, it was deemed proper to take the opinion of the attorney general on this point. He confirmed these doubts, but recommended the submission of the subject to congress, before discontinuing any of the banks, which upon investigation might appear to have made such issues before entering into the agreement.

The department would, therefore, respectfully recommend that an act be passed, sanctioning the selection and continuance of deposit banks which may be so situated, provided such banks have not issued or paid out small bills after their appointment as public depositories.

7. Of the mint and the currency.

On the subject of the mint and the new coinage, the department is gratified to state that, by means of additional appropriations, of improvements in machinery, and of an ample supply of metal for coining, through the fortunate remittances to this country of the French, Spanish and Neapolitan indemnities, in gold, more money has been, and will be, coined during the present than in any previous year since the foundation of the government. The whole amount from the 1st of January, 1836, to the 1st of November, 1836, has been in gold, $3,619,440; in silver, $2,877,000; and in copper, $22,634. The sums transferred to the mint in aid of the coinage, under a clause in the late deposit act, have amounted to $700,000. When the annual report of the director is made on the 1st of January next, a more minute account of all his operations, with his views on these transfers, will be presented, accompanied by such suggestions for further legislation on the subject as his experience may lead him to consider useful.

The mint and its branches would, in my opinion, be more efficiently assisted by means of appropriations, rather than mere transfers, to supply fully and promptly the additional coinage, which the additional wants of the community may from time to time require. The department is still convinced, for reasons formerly urged on the consideration of congress, that a gold coin of one dollar in value might be very convenient and useful to the public in many of the ordinary transactions of society.—The branch mints are all in progress, and will probably be completed by June next, and their machinery at a still earlier day. The coinage in them can commence immediately after their completion, if the proper appropriations are in the mean time made, and the proper officers appointed. The greatly increased quantity of gold now existing in the country amounts, probably, to upwards of $15,000,000. For this, we are chiefly indebted to the new valuation of our coin, though some influence must be ascribed to the efforts made by the general government, and most of the states, to suppress the circulation of small bills, as well as to the favorable condition of our foreign exchanges since 1834, and the policy of ordering home the foreign indemnities in gold, and encouraging public payments to be, in part, made with this kind of coin.

At this time, the abundance of gold here is such as to have produced increased facility in distant specie operations, and it is becoming more widely and beneficially diffused over the different sections of the union, to the greater accommodation of most classes of people, particularly in travelling and exchanges, and to the permanent improvement of our circulating medium. The amount of gold coined since the new valuation in 1834, has been near $10,000,000, and has exceeded by one or two millions the whole amount coined in the thirty-one previous years which had elapsed, after the mint went into operation. The amount coined during the past twelve months alone is greater than that during the whole of the first sixteen years after its establishment. Another important and gratifying consequence which has resulted principally from the present policy and system as to the currency, has been, that, of all the gold coined before August, 1834, amounting to about $12,000,000, probably not $1,000,000 then remained in the country, of that small amount only a very diminutive portion was in active circulation.

Indeed before 1834 our coinage of gold was of little benefit except to purify and prepare the bullion for exportation and for the use of foreign mints.

But the great mass of near $10,000,000, since coined, undoubtedly remains in the country, and an increased and increasing proportion of it, is in active and convenient circulation. To promote this desirable end, a larger portion than usual of quarter eagles has been recently struck, and the whole number of gold pieces of every kind made since the beginning of the present year is about 1,000,000, and almost equals the entire number coined during the whole forty years previous to the new coinage. The change in the amount of specie of all kinds in the country, during the last three years, is highly gratifying, as an earnest of a more solid basis to a paper circulation already too large in proportion, and as a security not only to those classes who are most safe in the employment of a metallic currency for all common purposes, but to the banking institutions themselves in periods of panic and unfavorable balances in foreign trade. The whole specie in the country in October, 1833, when the public deposits were removed from the United States bank, did not probably exceed $30,000,000, and the portion of this in banks is not supposed to have exceeded $26,000,000; while now the whole specie in the country probably exceeds $73,000,000, and of that the portion in banks is believed to be over $45,000,000, leaving $28,000,000 in active circulation.

The paper circulation within the above period, has also been greatly and unfortunately enlarged.—From about $80,000,000, which was then the supposed aggregate after deducting the large amount of $20,000,000 for notes held in different banks, it has probably risen, and chiefly within eighteen months past, to about $120,000,000. But this increase, though great, it will be seen is not half so great a relative increase as has taken place in the whole specie in the country, nor quite as great as has happened in the specie in the banks alone.—Computing that the paper in active circulation in the United States has generally averaged about two to one of specie on hand in the banks, and was, in October, 1833, about three to one, or near 50 per cent. over the usual proportion, the comparative amounts of specie at the several returns, from 1833 to 1836, presented a very favorable change, had become greater than the usual proportion, and even now, in all the banks, taken as a whole, are somewhat improved since 1833. But they have much deteriorated the last year and a half. Again: While the amount, as well as proportion of specie in the country, is much greater than it was two years ago, and the proportion is ample for the paper circulation in several of the banks and states, yet it is manifest that many institutions in other states have of late departed more widely from the proper and safe proportions than their peculiar location or advantages for business, however favorable, might warrant on sound banking principles. As some illustration of the general changes on those points since 1833, the following brief exhibit in round numbers, and in a tabular form, prepared partly from actual returns, and partly from estimates, may be useful.

Dates.	Paper in active circulation.	Specie in active circulation.	Specie in banks.
Near.
October, 1833,	80,000,000	4,000,000	25,000,000
1 January, 1834,	76,000,000	12,000,000	27,000,000
1 January, 1835,	82,000,000	18,000,000	43,000,000
1 January, 1836,	108,000,000	23,000,000	40,000,000
1 Dec'r, 1836,	120,000,000	28,000,000	45,000,000

At all these periods, except the 1st of January last, twenty millions of paper have been computed as issued, but not in active circulation among the people, being held by other banks, and so far considered as equivalent to a deduction of a like amount from their own circulation, liable to be redeemed in specie. On the 1st of January last, the amount so held was about thirty-two millions; and in July last the active paper circulation was also probably some millions larger than it now is. This exhibit makes the whole active circulation of both paper and specie, about $6 50 per head of our whole estimated population in October, 1833; about $6 50 in January, 1834; about $7 in January, 1835; about $8 50 in January, 1836; and near $10 at the present time. Though this is a less proportion of circulating medium than is now usual in the countries of Europe, which are most commercial, and where specie is more used than bills, yet it is a larger ratio than has ever been supposed to be necessary in the United States, considering the character of two or three millions of our southern population. The average here has usually been about $6 per head. Nor has the amount ever before 1811 been supposed much to exceed $5, and at no time since has exceeded about $7 per head, except under the excessive paper issues towards the close of the late war, by which, in 1816, it was estimated to have reached $11 per head.

While our country has, of late years, become more commercial and wealthy, and has a larger portion of specie in use, which circumstances would somewhat increase the necessary and proper amount of circulation per head, it has, as counteracting causes to these, greatly increased in the ease and quickness of communication, whether by mail or otherwise, and in the use of bills of exchange and drafts, instead of money, for distant operations.—Hence our circulation, during the past twelve months, at $8 50 and $10 per head, is deemed excessive, and as in 1816, one great cause of the exorbitant prices which have prevailed in relation to almost every article, as well as of the extraordinary propensity to overtrading and speculation which has pervaded almost every section of the country. It is true that during a few months past the paper portion of our circulation has, as before suggested, been considerably reduced; but till that, with our present large amount of specie in circulation added, falls as low as about $7 per head, or the bank notes, to about $80,000,000, instead of $120,000,000, the currency may be considered as too redundant, and in an unnatural and inflated condition. The credit system has not only undergone an unusual expansion among individuals and states, but it has, by means of these inordinate paper issues, penetrated more deeply than is safe into the whole currency of the country, and rendered that which, as money, is and should be deemed the substitute or antagonist of credit, dependent too much on credit itself, and subject to many of the dangers and fluctuations in value inseparable from mere credit, rather than possessing the intrinsic and uniform value attached to specie.

This condition is believed to have been produced chiefly by numerous incorporations of new banks, without suitable legal restrictions, in many states, on the amount either of discounts or of paper issued, in proportion to the specie on hand; and by the excessive demands for money, thus tempted and stimulated, to aid an unusual number of extravagant adventurers in lands, stocks and trade.

These, acting together, and in some degree influencing and exciting each other, have induced many banks to hazard unreasonable and indiscreet issues, as well as loans, to supply the wants of such an extraordinary crisis, and which there is good reason to believe, (however large a proportion of specie fortunately exists in the country, and which may tend sooner to avert the usual evil consequences from the above state of things), will produce much distress, embarrassment and ruin, before this specie can be duly equalized, the excesses of paper sufficiently curtailed, and the exorbitant discounts gradually lessened to their safe and proper limits.—This increase of about forty millions or one-third of the paper circulation in a year and a half, is a sudden and great fluctuation, which never could occur in a currency entirely metallic, and which would probably during the past year, as in 1811, have been much greater, had not the larger proportion of specie now in the country, and the increasing disuse of small bills, operated strongly as preventive checks.

But even now the excess has been sufficient to constitute the chief cause for the artificial augmentation in prices, an unnatural stimulus to speculation, and a rapid vacillation in the regular modes of doing business, which cannot, under sound views of political economy, be too greatly deprecated, or their recurrence too carefully guarded against.—These sudden and great vibrations in the value of property, labor and debts, however produced, or however flattering to many at first, are in the end dangerous to all classes, as well as ruinous to commerce, and every species of regular industry.

But should paper issues, according to anticipation, continue to be reduced, as during the four months past, by the natural and conservative reaction of commercial causes, at home and abroad, and by the general, wise and increasing discontinuance of the use of small bank notes through state legislation, and provisions of a similar character and tendency by congress, as at the last session, in the general appropriation act, and in the deposit law, and by the diminished receipt of all bank notes, the last few months at the different land offices for the sales of the public domain, a sounder and less artificial state of things will ere long return.

The prospect on the subject of the currency is, therefore, on the whole, becoming more satisfactory, even without further legislation. But if all the states would unite in repressing entirely the circulation of small notes, and in rigidly restricting all paper issues, so as not in any case to exceed three to one of specie on hand, which would be about two of paper in active circulation to one of specie on hand, and would add a few judicious limitations on the amount of discounts as compared with the capital and deposits, and on the safe kind of security to be taken for them, with the requirement of frequent publicity of their condition in detail, and of rigid accountability to periodical examinations by legislative authority, the time is not distant when our currency would become quite stable.—Indeed, it deserves consideration, whether, under such circumstances, the whole monopolies of banking might not, with public advantage, be entirely abolished, and the banking privilege, under the above general restraints, securities, limitations and requirements, might not, particularly if the personal liability of the stockholders is superadded, safely be thrown open to all.

A larger amount of tax or bonus to the states would probably be thus collected, without any increase in the usual rate; and, it is believed, that the interest now paid by borrowers, would by these changes become at an early day sensibly reduced. But without the most careful and rigid restrictions, such a measure in this country, whatever may have been its operations elsewhere, would, under our different institutions and habits, probably increase, rather than diminish, any existing evils in the currency.

It is conceded that these disproportionate issues by banking institutions, are, in fact, much more frequent in regions where the number of banks is small, than where it is large, provided their charters be similar, in omitting prudent limitations. Because, in the former case, there is less vigilance, caution and correction, produced by the jealousies and interests of rival institutions to prevent excessive issues, and irregular and dangerous discounts.

But the tendency to excessive trading, excessive credits, and rash enterprises, is so strong, and sometimes ungovernable, in individuals, and in some respects equally, or more so in corporations, as to endanger the stability of both banks and business, unless the power to manufacture paper money is carefully restricted and wisely regulated. The present amount of bank capital, as well as its increase for some years past, is another kindred topic of some interest. But space does not exist on this occasion, for its full exposition, and at the same time, it is not very alarming, except where it has been authorised without proper limitation on paper issues, and without other prudent bank restrictions.

The whole bank capital in active operation, is computed to have been over

231,000,000 in 1834-5.
250,000,000 in 1835-6.

And near fifty millions more has been authorised, most of which is supposed not yet to be in full operation.

More facts will be exhibited on these points, and particularly on the amount of bank capital in each state, in a special report, soon to be presented from this department to congress, concerning the detailed condition of the state banks near the 1st of January, 1836.

Had it not been for large sales of American stocks abroad, and the very high prices given there for our principal staples, a demand for specie, for export, would doubtless have arisen ere this from our over-trading, and have greatly enhanced the present difficulties which some of the banks now experience chiefly from the great excess of paper in circulation. The comparative value of specie being reduced by such excesses, the evil would have been still more aggravated, if those excesses had not become somewhat diminished, and specie had not become in greater demand here, in consequence of the circular, as to the kind of money receivable for the public lands, issued by direction of the president in July last. This demand has contributed to retain and diffuse it wider, and to make its great and early export less probable, than it otherwise would have been. The other objects of that circular were gradually to bring back the practice in those payments to what was deemed to be the true spirit, as well as letter of our existing laws, and to what the safety of the public money in the deposit banks, and the desirable improvement of our currency, seemed at that time to unite in rendering judicious. The reasons, more in detail, for the measure, are contained in the document itself, of which a copy is annexed. (G). Our moneyed operations have also been somewhat affected by a few difficulties abroad, in the nation with which our commercial intercourse is greatest, and whose monetary system of late years, often beating with a pulse like our own, is under influences nearly corresponding.

Since 1833 the paper circulation in England is supposed to have increased over sixteen millions of dollars, while the specie possessed by the banks has diminished over twenty-three millions. The whole circulation of private banks, joint stock banks, and the bank of England, is now probably about $152,000,000 of paper to less than 26,000,000 of specie on hand; whereas in 1833 it was only about 137,000,000 to 50,000,000 of specie, or now from five and six to one, but then only two and three to one. Consequently, an alarm and pressure have arisen there, which are operating unfavorably here, though they have arisen not so much from an excessive amount of both the paper and specie currency united, as from the greatly increased disproportion being quite doubled between the paper issues and the specie on hand by all the banks. What portion of their paper was, or is now, held by each other, is not known; but as the bills of the bank of England are a tender by all the private and joint stock banks, the amount is probably large. Their banking system, as a whole, with every supposed benefit to be derived from a national bank, is believed to be under much more defective regulations, as to excessive issues, excessive discounts, and secrecy of condition and proceedings, than is our own in most of the states of the union. Indeed so unsatisfactory has been its operations, that they have recently become the subject of parliamentary inquiry, which it is proposed to resume and push much further at a subsequent session.

8. Land office.

Immediately after the passage of the law at the last session, reorganizing the general land office, some doubts arose whether it still remained attached to the treasury department, and the opinion of the attorney general was taken on the question. In consequence of his opinion, that the supervision over its concerns remained here, and of the direction of the president of the United States, under whose control that law now places all the affairs of the general land office, steps were taken by me to carry it into immediate effect.

The result thus far has been a sensible diminution in the pressure of the business of that office; a better system of supervision and despatch for most of it, and much less delay in completing titles to the public domain. Should the sales not continue very large during a few ensuing years, it is believed, that the whole arrearages of business can be disposed of, and the promptitude in all its future operations secured, which is so immediately important to the great western and south western sections of the country, and more or less beneficial to all, as well as creditable to the administration of the government. The report of the commissioner will speedily be laid before congress in a separate communication and contains many suggestions, which seem to deserve careful attention.

9. Miscellaneous.

Great inconveniences have been sustained in many parts of the country, by an omission to repeal or modify the provisions in the tariff act of 1832.

A detailed report on this subject has once been submitted by this department; and the interests of the community, connected with the articles of hardware, affected by these provisions, and convenience in the execution of the revenue laws, appear to require the earliest attention of congress to the subject. The revision of the present system of compensation to custom house officers, with the various changes in our collection laws, heretofore recommended in connection with that revision, is deemed very important to the mercantile community, as well as to the treasury, and at the same time to the just and rateable compensation for arduous and responsible duties to many collectors, and other officers who are now inadequately paid, while some receive an amount disproportioned to their situation and labors.

In connection with this subject, and in addition to former recommendation to congress, as well as the valuable report on the safety of steam boilers, submitted at the last session from the Franklin institute, it seems proper to urge earnestly for consideration the necessity of some provision for the more careful management of steamboats navigated under papers from the custom houses—subjecting their commanders, and in suitable cases their owners, to the forfeiture of their papers, and other severe penalties, in cases of carelessness or neglect, destructive to property or life.

The security of the public money would be promoted in many cases, by requiring bonds from district attorneys through the hands of some of whom large sums pass, in collections, without any collateral obligations being given for the indemnity of the United States, as required in most analogous cases of public officers.

The act in respect to insolvent debtors, the execution of which is placed in the charge of this department, expires in June next, and the propriety of the further continuance of its provisions is suggested to congress.

The four first instalments due, under the French treaty, have been paid in Paris, since my last annual report. The sum claimed by our agent, and by this department, exceeds that paid by the French government, in the amount of more than a million of francs, and the difference is now, the subject of correspondence and negotiation. What was actually paid has been remitted to this country in gold, and divided among the claimants. From the rates of exchange and price of gold, it was deemed most advantageous to the claimants to have it sent home in that form, though a direction was subsequently given to substitute bills of exchange or other modes of remittance, if more profitable, but which the agent did not find it expedient or beneficial to do.

The third instalment of the Neapolitan indemnity, and the first payments due on the inscriptions under the treaty of indemnity with Spain, have also been since discharged with punctuality, and remitted here in a similar manner under similar instructions.

Various other topics suggested in the two last annual reports to the consideration of congress, and not yet finally legislated on, the department would earnestly, but respectfully, present again to its attention. Among them may be more particularly mentioned the reorganization of this department, and the change of the commencement of the fiscal year and of the annual appropriations.

Several other subjects have received proper attention, which are connected with the official duties of the treasury, or have been specially devolved on its charge; such as the repairs of the bridge across the Potomac, the survey of the coast, and the manufacture of weights and measures, not only for the different custom houses, but for each state in the union; the appropriate sites for new marine hospitals, the practices pursued in other countries as to the transportation of their poor citizens hither, who have been burdensome for their maintenance, a digest of the returns and condition of state banks near January first, 1836, the sums disbursed under each appropriation made the present year, and more detailed exhibits of all the contingent expenditures of the department.

The most important of these will at an early day be made the subject of separate communications.

All which is respectfully submitted by
LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Navy department, December 3d, 1836.

To the president of the United States:

SIR: In presenting for your consideration at this time the condition of our navy for the passed year, I am enabled to assure you that since my report of the 5th of December last, there has been an increased activity in the construction and equipment of vessels at our navy yards, and in the movements of our ships and squadrons at sea and on foreign stations.

The Columbia, a frigate of the first class, has been finished, launched and nearly completed for sea.

The brigs Dolphin and Porpoise have been built, launched and fitted for sea.

The frigate Macedonian, of the second class, has been finished, launched and equipped for sea; and she is now receiving her crew, as the ship of the commanding officer of the South Sea exploring expedition.

The two barks, Pioneer and Consort, and schooner Pilot, have been built, launched and so far equipped, as to be ready for receiving their crews.

The store-ship Relief, has been finished, launched and equipped, and is now receiving her stores.

The repairs of the ship of the line North Carolina have been completed, and she is equipped and fitted for sea, and is now under sailing orders for the Pacific station.

The repairs of the razee Independence have been completed, and she is now nearly equipped for sea.

The ship of the line Delaware has been placed in dry dock, and her repairs commenced.

The ship of the line Columbus, has also been put into dry dock, and her repairs commenced.

The repairs of the ship of the line Ohio, have been commenced and considerably advanced.

The repairs of the sloops of war Falmouth and Fairfield, have been completed.

The sloop of war Natchez, and schooner Grampus, have been repaired and equipped for sea.

The labor upon the ship of the line Pennsylvania, has been resumed, with a view to her completion; and she will probably be ready for launching in the early part of next summer.

The steam vessel building at New York, is so far completed as to be ready for the reception of her engines and machinery; in procuring which, there has been some unavoidable delay. It was desirable to secure the services of the most able engineer in the United States, to superintend the construction of the engines and machinery of this, as well as other steam vessels proposed to be built for the service of the United States. Efforts have been made to secure the services of such an engineer, but without success. The first attempt to procure the requisite engines and machinery, by contract, by advertising for proposals, proved abortive; as the lowest offers for the boilers and for the engines, were made by different persons; and the person offering for the engines, declined the contract, because he could not also have the contract for the boilers. Arrangements, however, have been since made for procuring the engines and boilers wanted; and the vessel will probably be ready for service in the course of next summer.

For a detailed statement of the condition of our vessels on the stocks, as well as those afloat at our navy yards, and the means of completion, as well as repair, I beg leave to refer to the reports of the commissioners of the navy board, herewith submitted, marked H and I; and for the amount of timber, iron and other materials, procured for the gradual improvement of the navy, I refer to their report, marked L.

Much has been done in advancing the works and improvements hitherto authorized at the different navy yards, except at that of Pensacola. The works and improvements for which appropriations have been made at that yard, have been delayed until a permanent plan for the same, after a due examination of a board appointed for that purpose, could be adopted.

Since my last annual report, the following vessels have been employed in the Mediterranean: the frigates Constitution, United States and Potomac; the sloop of war John Adams, and the schooner Shark; the ship of the line Delaware having been withdrawn from that squadron, and the frigate U. States added to it, within the present year.

The frigate Potomac having been employed on that station for upwards of two years, has been ordered home, with instructions to run down the coast of Africa, and visit the settlements at Cape Mesurado, Cape Palmas and Bassa Cove; thence, to proceed to Rio de Janeiro, and after communicating with the commander of our squadron there, to return to Norfolk.

In the West Indies, the frigate Constellation, the sloops of war Vandalia, St. Louis, Concord, Warren, Boston and Natchez, and the schooner Grampus, have been actively employed. The Warren sailed for that station the latter part of December last, and has returned within a few days to Norfolk for repairs; and when these shall be completed, she will rejoin the squadron.

The Concord sailed from Portsmouth, N. H. the 27th of February last. The Boston on the 10th of July last, from Boston. The Natchez from New York on the 4th of August, and the schooner Grampus on the 10th of April last. All these vessels, except the Warren, are now on that station.

The brig Porpoise has been employed in conveying the commissioners appointed under a resolution of the senate, directing an examination of the harbors south of the Chesapeake bay, with a view to their fitness for the purposes of a navy yard. She is daily expected at Norfolk, after which it is intended that she shall sail as soon as conveniently may be, to join the West India squadron.

On the coast of Brazil, the sloops of war Erie and Ontario have been employed. The Ontario returned to the United States in June last, has been undergoing repairs at Norfolk, and she is reported to be in readiness for a crew.

The brig Dolphin sailed in September last from New York, with instructions to proceed to the coast of Africa, and visit the settlements at Gambia, Bissau, Nunez, Cape Mesurado, Bassa Cove and Cape Palmas; thence to proceed to Rio de Janeiro, to form a part of the Brazilian squadron.

In the Pacific, the frigate Brandywine, the sloop Vincennes, and the schooner Boxer, have been employed. The sloop Vincennes, which previously to my last report was ordered to return to the U. States, by way of the East Indies, arrived at Norfolk on the 6th of June last. The frigate Brandywine has been ordered home, and she is probably on her way at this time: her place will be supplied by the ship of the line North Carolina, now under sailing orders.

In the East Indies, the sloop Peacock and schooner Enterprise have been engaged in protecting as well as extending our commerce. They are now on their return to the United States, with orders to visit the settlements of the American Colonization society on the coast of Africa, near Cape Palmas, Bassa Cove and Monrovia.

Our squadrons at sea and on foreign stations, have afforded to our commerce all the aid and protection that their means would permit.

It was believed that our commerce in the Gulf of Mexico, and in the West Indies, would be more exposed than in any other quarter. To meet the apprehended danger, an unusually large force has been placed at the disposal of commodore Dallas, the commander of the West India station. In addition to the vessels already stated as forming his squadron, three revenue cutters and three steamboats have been placed under his command: and he has been charged with the complicated duties of protecting our commerce, of preventing the importation of slaves into Texas or the United States, and of co-operating with the officers of the army and militia, in prosecuting the war against the Creek and Seminole Indians; in the performance of all which duties, his squadron has rendered the most essential services to the country.

In maintaining so large a force on the West India station, which ought to be still increased, it has not been in the power of this department to send to other stations the number of vessels which the safety of our commerce required, and serious apprehensions have been justly entertained, that our merchants might sustain heavy losses from the want of an adequate force on the Pacific and Brazilian stations, especially on the latter. Although these apprehensions have not been realized, yet a due regard to the interests of commerce, and the honor of our country, requires that a more respectable force should be sent to those stations, as soon as practicable. There is no serious difficulty in sending out such a force, but that arising from the want of seamen; and this difficulty will be in some degree obviated on the arrival of the vessels now on their return to the United States.

When, at the commencement of the last and preceding sessions of congress, it was recommended that a considerable addition should be made to the number of our ships in commission, to meet the exigencies of the rapidly increasing commerce of our country, it was perceived that, should the measure be adopted, as it has been, by the liberal appropriations of congress, it would be necessary to adopt, at the same time, measures for increasing the number of our seamen. The most obvious means of accomplishing this object, was the one recommended, of enlisting into the service of our navy, boys over the age of thirteen, and under the age of eighteen, until they shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years. A bill for this purpose has been before the senate for the last two sessions, which, it is confidently hoped, will become a law during the approaching session of congress. In the meantime, as a larger number of seamen is required for the merchant service than usual, and as there is at present actually in the naval service of the United States, one-fifth more seamen than were employed three years ago, and a greater number than has been employed at any time within the last fifteen years, some difficulty must necessarily exist in recruiting seamen required for immediate service.

The terms of service of the seamen on the Pacific and Brazilian stations, are about to expire.—Those on the Pacific station have been ordered home, but will not probably arrive, before the middle of January next. In the mean time, the North Carolina is ordered to that station, requiring, immediately, a large number of seamen: and captain John B. Nicolson has been selected to sail in the razez Independence, to relieve the commander on the coast of Brazil, who, when relieved, will return with the seamen belonging to his station.—The Independence will require a large number of seamen to complete her crew. Besides, it is important that each of these ships should be attended by one or two smaller vessels; but this is impracticable in the present state of the service.

It will be easily perceived, therefore, that the force wanted for the protection of commerce, exceeds the means of supply which this department can immediately bring into operation. When, therefore, on the 18th of May last, it was provided by an amendment to the general naval appropriation bill, that the president of the United States should be authorized to send out a surveying and exploring expedition to the Pacific ocean and South Seas, I considered it impracticable to fit out this expedition in a manner to meet the views of congress, under eight or nine months, without a serious injury to other branches of the naval service.

The only insurmountable difficulty, however, in my opinion, was the recruiting the requisite number of seamen in three or four months, without interfering with arrangements already made for sending ships to the Pacific and Brazilian stations, and for sending an additional force to the West Indies.

As, however, it was your earnest wish that the intentions of congress, in authorizing this measure, should be carried into effect with the least possible delay, and that the expedition should be fitted out upon the extensive and liberal scale which the indications of public opinion seemed to require; and as the officer, captain Thomas ap Catesby Jones, selected for the command of the expedition, gave assurances that the difficulty of obtaining seamen could be obviated, by giving him power to have them recruited under his immediate superintendence, and for this particular service, it was determined to make an extraordinary effort to accomplish these objects.

Every facility consistent with the rules and regulations of the navy, was afforded captain Jones for recruiting seamen in the manner he proposed: and measures were immediately adopted to have one frigate of the second class, one store-ship, two barks, and one schooner, all which he considered as indispensably necessary to the success of the enterprise, prepared without delay. The frigate and store-ship, which were on the stocks when this measure was adopted, have been finished and equipped, and are now receiving their crews; and the other three vessels have been entirely built and equipped for sea. The whole have been finished in the most substantial manner, and adapted to the particular service for which they are destined. These vessels will sail to Norfolk to complete their crews, take in their stores, and to await further orders.

To prevent any delay that might arise from the want of mathematical, astronomical and philosophical instruments, books, maps, charts, &c. required for the expedition, lieutenant Wilkes of the navy was sent to Europe, and sailed from New York on the 8th of August last, to make the necessary purchases, in which he has been successful as to the greater part of the articles wanted. For some instruments, however, he has been under the necessity of waiting until they can be manufactured. His return is expected about the middle of this month.

It is believed that every proper exertion has been made to recruit men for this service, but without the anticipated success; no more than about two hundred, according to the returns received, being as yet recruited; and as captain Jones requires five hundred and eighteen petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, boys and marines, together with eighty-five commissioned and warrant officers, for his squadron, it is evident that a considerable time must yet elapse before the expedition can be ready for sea.

Recruiting seamen for particular service, may be attended with great inconvenience, and should not be adopted but upon the most urgent occasion, such as that of the exploring expedition was conceived to be. If the exigencies of the government should require of such recruits service different from that for which they were enlisted, discontent, and even mutiny, may be apprehended. Besides, this mode of recruiting cannot but interfere with the recruiting for the general service; and, in the present case, the order to recruit for the exploring expedition, has made it necessary to adopt the same mode of recruiting for the crews of the vessels about to sail for the Pacific and Brazilian stations.

Recruiting for three distinct objects of service at the same time, while the usual recruiting for the general service is continued, cannot but retard the whole, and compel us to keep in receiving vessels a much larger number of recruits, constantly disposed to desert, than would be required if recruited for the general service alone.

Although the number of recruits is small for any one of these objects, yet, in the aggregate, the number is quite as great as should be expected, when we consider the unusually great number of seamen now in the naval service of the United States, and the great demand for them in the merchant service.

Although the return of the public vessels now ordered to the United States, will, to a considerable extent, furnish men for service, yet, sending out so large a force as that required for the exploring expedition, to be detained for the term of three years, cannot but be felt as a serious inconvenience, in fitting out the number of vessels wanted for the immediate protection of commerce.

As it has been evident, for the last three months, that this exploring squadron could not be ready for sea before the commencement of the approaching session of congress, nor indeed until a late period of the session, I have not yet attempted to organize a scientific corps for the expedition. But from inquiries made, I am happy to say, that in most of the departments of science, we have gentlemen ready and willing to embark in this enterprise, whose labors will reflect honor upon themselves and upon the country.

From several learned and philosophical societies, as well as from distinguished individuals, I have received the most ample and satisfactory communications; embracing all the various subjects which it will be necessary to give in charge to the gentlemen who are to conduct the scientific researches, which form the most important objects of the expedition.

These communications, so promptly and liberally furnished, are in the highest degree creditable to their authors.

The scientific corps may be organized as soon as accommodations can be afforded them in the vessels of the exploring squadron, and those vessels may leave their place of rendezvous at any season of the year when prepared for sea.

Under the acts concerning naval pensions and the navy pension fund, there are, of Widow pensioners	153

Invalid pensioners	308
Total	466

The annual amount to pay widows, is $34,185

“ “ to pay invalids, is 23,824

$58,009

The nominal value of stocks of every description belonging to the fund is $1,143,638 84; of which $841,600 is, by direction of congress, vested in the stock of the United States bank; and until the law which directs such investment shall be repealed or altered, this department will have no authority to withdraw the money, or make any different investment of it. If permitted to continue in the United States bank stock, it is very probable that many months will elapse before any income can be derived from this part of the capital, and, in the meantime, the pension fund may sustain a loss by the necessity of selling other stocks to meet the necessary disbursements.

Of widows on the pension list, eighty-nine have been paid from the day of their husbands' deaths, respectively; and sixty-nine have been paid only from the 30th day of June, 1834, as required by the act of congress of that date.

Under the privateer pension fund, the number of pensioners is 35.

The annual amount to be paid them is $2,766.

The amount of stock (Maryland five per cent.) belonging to the fund, is $4,667 05.

From this statement it is evident that legislative provision must be made for the payment of these pensioners when the fund shall be exhausted, which will probably occur before the first of January, 1838.

I would, therefore, respectfully suggest the propriety of making a permanent provision for the payment of these pensions, which by law are granted "during disability, or during life."

Of the navy hospital fund, the balance on the 1st of October, 1835, was $52,878 79
Payments to the fund from the 1st of October, 1835, to the 1st of October, 1836 25,840 73

$78,219 52

Disbursements during the same period 2,602 16

Balance on the 1st of October, 1836 $75,717 36

The necessary disbursements of the fund, it will be seen, bear but a small proportion to the amount of its receipts; and I therefore repeat a recommendation heretofore offered, that provision be made by law for investing this surplus, in some safe stock, for the benefit of the fund. The documents heretofore annexed, marked and numbered, O No. 1, to O No. 5, P No. 1, to P No. 4, and Q, furnish all the information respecting those funds required by the 3d section of the act of congress of the 10th of June, 1832.

I must beg leave to repeat, what I have heretofore stated, that under the act of June 30th, 1834, the widows of officers, seamen and marines who have died in the naval service since the 1st of January, 1824; or who may die in the said service by reason of disease contracted, or by casualties, by drowning, or otherwise; or of injuries received while in the line of duty, are entitled to pensions equal to half the amount of the pay to which their husbands respectively were entitled at the time of their deaths.

The act of the 3d of March, 1835, "to regulate the pay of the navy of the United States," and which increased the pay of many of the officers, is silent as to pensions. A difficulty arises in ascertaining the proper amount of pension to be allowed to the widows of naval officers, whose pay has been increased by this act.

The pay of a captain in command of a squadron on a foreign station, was increased to four thousand dollars a year; when on other duty, to three thousand five hundred dollars, and when off duty, to two thousand five hundred dollars. A corresponding increase of pay is made to other officers.

In the case, for instance, of a captain dying when in command of a foreign station, a question arises whether his widow shall receive a pension to the amount of six hundred dollars a year, to which she would be entitled if the act increasing the pay had not passed; or whether she shall receive the half of the amount to which her husband was entitled as commander on a foreign station, as a captain on other duty, or as a captain off duty.—Like difficulties occur with respect to the widows of other officers.

The necessity of an explanatory act, to obviate these difficulties, was respectfully suggested. The subject received the attention of both houses of congress, but no final action was had upon it. The question remaining unsettled, creates much embarrassment in this department.

That the widow of a captain who for years has commanded on foreign stations, but has returned to his country, and not on duty at the time of his death, shall receive but little more than half the pension she would be entitled to had her husband died a few weeks or days sooner, is evidently unjust. Nor is it just that the widows of captains who died of wounds received in battle or otherwise in the late war, should receive pensions of but a little more than half what might be awarded to the widows of captains dying since the third of March, 1835.

The rank of the officer, it is respectfully suggested, should regulate the amount of pension to the widow, rather than the accidental circumstance of service at the time of his death.

In my last annual report, I stated that previously to the passing of the act of the 30th of June, 1834, for the better organization of the United States marine corps, double rations had been allowed to the commandant of the corps, and to the officers of the same, commanding at the navy yards at Portsmouth, Boston, N. York, Philadelphia, Washington, Norfolk and Pensacola; and to the senior marine officers in the squadrons in the Mediterranean, the West Indies, the Brazil coast, and the Pacific ocean, all receiving the sanction of congress by their appropriations. By this act, the officers of the marine corps are to receive the same pay, emoluments and allowances as are given to officers of similar grades in the infantry of the army.

The act of the 16th of March, 1802, fixing the military peace establishment of the United States, authorizes allowances to the commanding officers of each separate post of such additional number of rations as the president of the United States shall from time to time direct.

These provisions of this last act were continued by an act of the 3d of March, 1815, fixing the military peace establishment.

The paymaster of the marine corps made payments for double rations to officers heretofore receiving the same, from the first of July, to the 30th of September, 1834; but the accounting officers of the treasury did not think proper to allow the same, inasmuch as the commands of these officers had never been designated as separate stations, agreeably to the rule prescribed for the army.

This is a case of difficulty, which, it is respectfully suggested, requires legislative interposition. This subject received the favorable consideration, but not final action, of congress at their last session. It is confidently hoped, that the claims of this corps will receive the early attention which their necessities require, and to which they are entitled by their merits—merits which are much strengthened by their patriotic conduct, in volunteering their services in a campaign against the Creek Indians, in which they have distinguished themselves by their zeal and perseverance in the duties assigned to them. As, however, they have been attached to the army, while on this campaign, their merits will more appropriately receive the notice of the war, than of the navy department.

In obedience to the resolution of the house of representatives of the 3d of March last, requiring a course of experiments to be instituted, for the purpose of ascertaining the efficiency, and testing the safety, of the medium or light guns of the navy, and of comparing their effects with the guns for which they were proposed to be substituted, a board of commissioners has been appointed, consisting of commodore Charles Morris, commodore Daniel T. Patterson, commodore Thomas ap Catesby Jones, captain William B. Shubrick, and captain Lawrence Kerney, to make the course of experiments required. Several officers have been detailed to co-operate with them, and very extensive preparations have been made near Old Point Comfort, to have the experiments made in the most complete and satisfactory manner. As soon as the proper experiments can be made, the results will be reported to the house of representatives.

By your directions given under a resolution of the senate of the United States of the 24th of May last, that the executive be requested to cause to be made the necessary examinations and surveys of the several harbors south of the mouth of the Chesapeake bay, and a report of the comparative facilities and advantages of the same, for the establishment of a navy yard, a board has been constituted, consisting of commodore M. T. Woolsey, captain Alex. Claxton, and master commandant E. R. Shubrick, who were sent out in the brig Porpoise, under the command of lieutenant Wm. Ramsay, to make the required examinations and surveys. After having made those examinations and surveys, the commissioners have returned to New York. Their report will, as soon as received, be communicated, as required by the resolution.

By your directions, also, a board has been constituted, consisting of commodore Charles Stewart, commodore Alexander J. Dallas, and captain W. C. Bolton, aided by a competent engineer, to examine the navy yard at Pensacola, and to prepare plans for the improvement of the same. These commissioners have completed their examinations and plans, the result of which will be submitted to you in a separate report for your consideration and approval.

Under the act of the 30th of June, 1834, authorizing the secretary of the navy to make experiments for the safety of the steam engine, and appropriating five thousand dollars for that purpose, the memorial of John C. F. Salomon, presenting a plan of a steam boiler, composed of inverted arches, which he has invented, and which he considers as superior to the common cylindrical boiler, was referred to me by the house of representatives.

On the assurance of Mr. Salomon that the sum of four hundred dollars would be amply sufficient for making all the experiments necessary for testing the value of his alleged improvement, I directed that sum to be expended in making and preparing two boilers, under his immediate superintendence. One of a common cylindrical boiler, the other upon his plan of inverted arches. Experiments were made upon these boilers in February last, near the eastern front of the capitol, in the presence of a large number of the members of congress and others, but without any satisfactory result.

Mr. Salomon requested me to make further experiments upon these boilers, which I declined, but permitted him to have the use of the boilers for making such experiments as he might think proper; so that, if there is any value in his alleged improvement, he has the means of showing it at the public expense.

The sum of $519 75 was heretofore expended under this act in testing Mr. Phillips' supposed improvement in steam boilers, as stated in my last report; which, added to the sum expended on Mr. Salomon's supposed improvement, amounts to $919 75, leaving an unexpended balance of the appropriation of $4,080 25.

By the statement marked W. hereto annexed, it will appear that of the appropriations heretofore made for the suppression of the slave trade, there remains in the treasury a balance of $11,413 53.

The necessary references to papers and documents connected with this report, will be found in a schedule hereto annexed.

All which is respectfully submitted,

MAHLON DICKERSON.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS,

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

December 12. Mr. Black, senator from Mississippi; Mr. Tallmadge, senator from New York; and Mr. Webster, senator from Massachusetts, appeared to-day and took their seats.

A message, of an executive character, from the president of the United States, was received by the hands of Andrew Jackson, jr. his private secretary.

Mr. Ewing, on leave, introduced the following joint resolution, to rescind the treasury order of the 11th of July, 1836, and to prohibit the secretary of the treasury from designating what species of funds shall be received in payment for the public lands; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Resolution to rescind the treasury order of the eleventh day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and to make uniform the currency receivable for the public revenue.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, &c. That the treasury order of the eleventh day of July, anno domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, designating the funds which should be receivable in payment for public lands, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Resolved, also, That it shall not be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to delegate to any person, or to any corporation, the power of directing what funds shall be receivable for customs, or for the public lands; nor shall he make any discrimination in the funds so receivable, between different individuals, or between the different branches of the public revenue.

Mr. Tipton, on leave, also introduced a bill, setting apart certain lands, west of the Mississippi, for the occupation and perpetual possession of the Indians. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. Benton:

Resolved, That the committee on finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the present copper coinage of the United States, and of substituting therefor a coinage of mixed metal, compounded of copper and silver, and called in the French mints billon; also, that the said committee inquire into the expediency of directing a gold coin of the value of one dollar to be stamped at the mint of the United States.

Mr. Benton called up the resolution he had offered on Thursday last, respecting an alteration in the mode of printing the annual report from the treasury on commerce and manufactures.

Mr. Knight moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved," and inserting—

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That the annual statement of the commerce and navigation of the United States be hereafter printed under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, and communicated as soon as possible after the commencement of each stated session of congress, and that said statement be printed in the same form and at the same price as the ordinary printing of the two houses of congress; that the same number of copies as are usually printed be furnished for the purpose of binding and distribution, and that five thousand additional copies be equally distributed to the members of the senate and house of representatives.

Mr. Benton said that, on looking further into the existing law providing for the printing of this document, he had become convinced that some such modification of the resolution was necessary as had now been proposed. The only objection he had to it related to the five thousand additional copies to be printed for the senate; he thought this number larger than necessary, and proposed that it be reduced to three thousand.

Mr. Knight assenting, the resolution was so modified accordingly, and in this form it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message was received from the house of representatives, through Mr. Franklin, their clerk, informing the senate that the house had passed a joint resolution for the appointment of a committee on the library, and had appointed a committee on their part. The senate concurred in the resolution.

The senate next, on motion of Mr. King, and in accordance with the order of Thursday last, proceeded to ballot for a secretary of the senate in place of Walter Louvie, esq. resigned.

On the first ballot, Mr. Asbury Dickens received 20 votes; hon. Arnold Naudain, late of the senate, 18; scattering 3; 21 being necessary to a choice.

On the second ballot, Mr. Dickens received 21; Mr. Naudain 18; Mr. Bryan 1; 21 being necessary to a choice.

Mr. Dickens was accordingly declared to be duly elected secretary of the senate.

The senate proceeded to ballot for the chairmen of their several standing committees.

The several elections resulted as follows:

Mr. Buchanan, chairman of the committee on foreign relations, by 21 votes.

Mr. Wright, chairman of the committee on finance, by 20 votes.

Mr. King, of Alabama, chairman of the committee on commerce, by 20 votes.

Mr. Niles, chairman of the committee on manufactures, by 22 votes.

Mr. Page, chairman of the committee on agriculture, by 21 votes.

Mr. Benton, chairman of the committee on military affairs, by 26 votes.

Mr. Wall, chairman of the committee on the militia, by 19 votes.

Mr. Rives, chairman of the committee on naval affairs, by 20 votes.

Mr. Walker, chairman of the committee on public lands, by 21 votes.

Mr. Linn, chairman of the committee on private land claims, by 21 votes.

Mr. White, chairman of the committee on Indian affairs, by 29 votes.

Mr. Hubbard, chairman of the committee of claims, by 19 votes.

Mr. Brown, chairman of the committee on revolutionary claims, by 18 votes.

Mr. Grundy, chairman of the committee on the judiciary, by 21 votes.

Mr. Robinson, chairman of the committee on the post office and post roads, by 22 votes.

Mr. Hendricks, chairman of the committee on roads and canals, by 21 votes.

Mr. Tomlinson, chairman of the committee on pensions, by 31 votes.

Mr. Kent, chairman of the committee for the District of Columbia, by 19 votes.

Mr. Morris, chairman of the committee on engrossed bills, by 25 votes.

The election of the remaining members of the committee was deferred until to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Tipton, of Indiana, it was Resolved, That, in memory of the late hon. Mr. Knard, a member of the house of representatives from the state of Indiana, the members of the senate wear crape on the left arm for the space of thirty days.

And then the senate adjourned.

December 13. Asbury Dickens was sworn, and entered on the duties of secretary of the senate.

A report was received from the secretary of the navy, of the disbursements which had been made from the appropriations for that department, at the last session.

Mr. Grundy, pursuant to notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill supplementary to the act to amend the judicial system, which was read and ordered to a second reading. [This bill adds two associate justices to the supreme court, and makes a new arrangement of the circuits—Maryland and Delaware are constituted the fourth district.]

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Benton, on the subject of a new mixed copper and silver coinage, and a gold dollar currency, was taken up and agreed to.

The senate proceeded to the unfinished business, being the election of standing committees, when the following were elected:

Foreign relations—Messrs. Buchanan, Tallmadge, King of Ga. Clay and Rives.

Finance—Messrs. Wright, Webster, Cuthbert, Nicholas and Benton.

Commerce—Messrs. King, of Ala. Davis, Linn Brown and Ruggles.

Manufactures—Messrs. Niles, Morris, Black, Hubbard and Preston.

Agriculture—Messrs. Page, Morris, Kent, McKean and Clay.

Military affairs—Messrs. Benton, Preston, Tipton, Wall and Ewing, of Ill.

Militia—Messrs. Wall, Hendricks, Swift, Ewing, of Ill.

Naval affairs—Messrs. Rives, Southard, Tallmadge, Cuthbert and Nicholas.

Public lands—Messrs. Walker, Ewing, of Ohio, King, of Ala. Ruggles and Fulton.

Private land claims—Messrs. Linn, Porter, Bayard, Preston and Sevier.

Indian affairs—Messrs. White, Swift, Tipton, Linn and Sevier.

Claims—Messrs. Hubbard, Tipton, Prentiss, Crittenden and Ewing, of Ill.

Revolutionary claims—Messrs. Brown, White, Hubbard, Crittenden and Niles.

Judiciary—Messrs. Grundy, Crittenden, Morris, King, of Ga. and Wall.

At this stage of the balloting, the senate adjourned.

December 14. Mr. Calhoun, of S. C. appeared to-day in his seat.

After the presentation of a number of petitions and resolutions, chiefly of a private or local character, Mr. Morris, on leave, introduced a bill to prohibit the sales of public lands, except to actual settlers and in limited quantities—which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Some other preparatory business was next transacted, which will be noticed in its progress, when the chair presented a communication from the war department, with a report of the chief engineer and colonel of ordnance, on the subject of fortifications and armories, which was referred to the committee on military affairs.

On motion of Mr. Rives, that part of the president's message which relates to Mr. Madison was referred, together with the documents, to the committee on the library.

The senate then resumed the balloting for the remaining members of standing committees not yet filled up, and the result was as follows:

On the post office and post roads—Messrs. Robinson, Knight, Grundy, Brown and Niles.

On roads and canals—Messrs. Hendricks, McKean, Robinson, Nicholas and Page.

On pensions—Messrs. Tomlinson, Prentiss, Hubbard, Morris and Sevier.

On the District of Columbia—Messrs. Kent, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Buchanan and Nicholas.

On engrossed bills—Messrs. Morris, Page and Fulton.

Joint committee on the library—Messrs. Robbins, Preston and Wall.

The joint resolution offered by Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, on the subject of rescinding the treasury order requiring specie in payment for the public lands, then coming up in order.

Mr. Ewing addressed the senate at considerable length in support of the resolution. Mr. Benton expressed his intention to reply at length, but wished further time to obtain some official returns, and other statements, which he wished to employ in his argument. Mr. Webster adverted to the importance of the subject, and the state of the public mind in regard to it, and hoped an early day would be assigned to enter upon its discussion. He proposed Monday next. To which Mr. Ewing, after a few words of reply to some remarks of Mr. Benton, assented; and the resolution was accordingly made the order of the day for Monday next. The joint resolution introduced some days ago by Mr. Benton, providing for the earlier preparation of the annual report on commerce and manufactures, was read a third time, and passed. When the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, Dec. 12. The appointment of the following committees, made by the speaker since the last adjournment, was announced by the journal.

On elections—Messrs. Claiborne, of Va. Griffin, Hawkins, Burns, Kilgore, Buchanan, Maury, Boyd and Young.

Of ways and means—Messrs. Cambreleg, McKim, Loyall, Corwin, Johnson, of Tenn. Smith, Lawrence, Ingersoll and Owings.

On claims—Messrs. Whittlesey, of Ohio, Forrester, Grennell, Davis, Taliaferro, Chambers, of Ky. Darlington, Graham and Russell.

On commerce—Messrs. Sutherland, Pinckney, Pearce, of Rhode Island, Gillett, Phillips, Johnson, of Lou. Ingham, Cushman and McKeon.

On public lands—Messrs. Boon, Williams, of N. C. Lincoln, Casey, Kennon, Dunlap, Chapman, Harrison, of Missouri and Yell.

On the post office and post roads—Messrs. Connor, Briggs, Laporte, Hall, of Vermont, Cleveland, French, Shields, Hopkins and Kilgore.

On the District of Columbia—Messrs. W. B. Shepard, Heister, Bouldin, Washington, Lane, Rogers, Fairfield, Moore and Claiborne, of Mississippi.

On the judiciary—Messrs. Thomas, Hardin, Pierce, of N. H. Robertson, Peyton, Toucey, Martin, Vanderpool and Ripley.

On foreign affairs—Messrs. Howard, Cramer, Hamer, Allan, of Ky. Parks, Cushing, Jackson, of Geo. Dromgool and Rencher.

On the territories—Messrs. Patton, Potts, Brown, Pickens, Pearce, of Md. Hall, of Maine, Johnson, of Va. Boyd and Miller.

On revolutionary pensions—Messrs. Wardwell, Lea, of Tenn. Lay, Jones, Storer, Morgan, Klingensmith, Bond and Fry.

On invalid pensions—Messrs. Beal, Schenck, Taylor, Harrison, of Penn. Doubleday, Hoar, Howell, Jeffer and Williams, of Ky.

On roads and canals—Messrs. Mercer, Vinton, Lucas, Reynolds, of Illinois, Steel, Calhoun, of Ky. Evans, McKennon and Hard.

[The following committees, appointed at the last session, being committees of the whole house, still exist, viz:

Committee on expenditures in the state department—Messrs. A. H. Shepperd, Calhoun, of Mass. Hunt, Morris and Sickles.

Committee on expenditures in the treasury department—Messrs. Allen, of Vermont, Harper, Spangler, Russell and Barton.

Committee on expenditures in the war department—Messrs. Jones, of Ohio, Johnson, of Va. Love and Huble.

Committee on expenditures in the navy department—Messrs. Hall of Maine, Sloane, Seymour, Pettigrew and Mason, of New York.

Committee on expenditures in the post office department—Messrs. Hawes, Burns, Childs, Bailey and Reynolds, of New York.

Committee on expenditures for the public buildings—Messrs. Darlington, Hazletine, Pearce, of R. I. Galbraith and Beale.

Among the petitions presented this day, was one by Mr. Adams, from S. Brainerd and eleven hundred other citizens of Boston, praying for a repeal of the duties on foreign coal, which he moved be referred to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Patton thought that, inasmuch as petitions of a similar import had already been referred to the committee of ways and means, it would be well that this petition, also, should take a similar reference.

Mr. Adams said that he considered these petitions, of which there would probably be a great number, as materially affecting the whole question of the tariff, and, consequently, the whole manufactures of the country. He did not wish to enter into any debate on the subject at this time, but he moved that the question on the reference be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, Mr. Lincoln, of Mass. (who had presented a petition of similar import, from sundry citizens of that state, which had been referred to the committee of ways and means), rose, and proceeded to state that, if the reference proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), was persisted in, his (Mr. L.'s) memorial would be placed in a very awkward situation. Mr. L. was going on to examine the propriety of the respective references proposed, when

The speaker said that under the 45th rule of the house, the subject could not be debated on the same day on which the petition was presented, and that it would come up first in the order of business to-morrow morning.

So the subject was postponed accordingly.

After the petitions and memorials presented, were disposed of the following resolves were offered:

By Mr. Jarvis—Resolved, That the secretary of the navy be directed to furnish this house with the names of the officers of the navy who have, during the year 1836, received orders for service, and who have asked to be excused, together with the reasons offered by them for such indulgence. [Lies over one day].

By Mr. Everett—Resolved, That the committee on revolutionary pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the benefit of the 3d section of the act entitled "an act granting half pay to widows or orphans, where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes," to all widows of revolutionary pensioners, so far as to allow them half the pension to which their husbands were entitled.—Agreed to.

By Mr. Gillet—Resolved, That the committee on the public lands inquire into the expediency of so altering the laws relating to bounty lands as to allow those entitled to them to locate on any public lands subject to entry or private sale, or to receive land scrip in lieu of bounty in land. Agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the annual report of the secretary of the treasury on the subject of the finances, together with the estimates for the year 1837, was referred to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Childs offered a resolution granting the use of the hall to the American Colonization society on the evening of Tuesday next. Mr. C. asked for the yeas and nays on this motion, which the house refused to order. And the question having been taken by a division, the resolution was adopted—ayes 91, noes 59.

On motion of Mr. Hard the usual resolution for the election of chaplains was adopted.

The following resolution was also presented:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of immediately abolishing the duties upon foreign grain, or bread stuffs of all kinds.

Mr. Reed moved to amend the resolution by striking out the committee of ways and means, and inserting the committee on agriculture. Mr. Fry said the question involved in the resolution was a plain matter of fact, and that, though he had no great solicitude as to the reference, he thought the one proposed by himself was the most appropriate. Mr. Reed thought that, as the question was one which bore greatly on the interests of the agricultural community, he thought it would be best to refer it to the committee having the special care of those interests.

The question on the amendment was then taken and carried—ayes 87, noes 67. So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Reed observed that there existed no manner of necessity that this resolution should be referred to the committee of ways and means, since every body is well aware that the revenue is sufficient, and far from requiring expedients or inquiries relating to an increase of it. He also deemed it to be a desirable thing that importations from all countries should be made as free as possible, and even without duty. But (Mr. R. observed) representing as this house did the interests of the whole country, we were bound to examine into the subject. He was therefore of opinion that the whole question should be referred to the committee on agriculture, as being the most appropriate for its consideration, and because the whole agricultural interests of the country were concerned in this question.—It is true (observed the honorable member) that this is a year, it may be almost said, of famine, such as has not been known for twenty years: but, notwithstanding, it must not be lost sight of that the most important interests were in direct opposition to this proposition. He concluded by proposing as an amendment that the resolution be referred to the committee on agriculture.

A division took place, when there appeared for the amendment 87, against it 58. So the amendment was carried.

Mr. J. Q. Adams proposed as an amendment, to insert the words "also foreign coals, salt and iron." "Sugar" was also proposed to be inserted at the suggestion of a member.

A debate was about to spring up on this question, when a motion was made to postpone the further consideration of the subject to Monday next; which motion was carried.

The presentation of resolutions in the order of states was then continued, of which a further account shall be given.

[One of these resolutions, moved by Mr. Mercer, of Va. was in the following terms:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to report a bill to amend the 18th section of the act of the last session of congress, entitled "an act to regulate the deposits of the public money," by releasing the several states which may receive any part of the surplus revenue of the United States, in pursuance of that act, from any obligation to return the same.

After some brief discussion, a motion was made to lay the resolution on the table; which was decided in the affirmative—yeas 126, nays 73.]

Various additional resolutions were offered;

And, at 3 o'clock, on motion of Mr. Pinckney, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Dec. 13. On motion of Mr. Loyall, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. J. Q. Adams in the chair.)

On motion of Mr. Loyall, the several portions of the message were, as usual, referred to appropriate standing committees.

Mr. Dixon H. Lewis moved to refer to a select committee that portion of the message which embraces the topics of indemnity to citizens for Indian depredations, and compensation for individual property taken in Alabama and Georgia for public use.

After some conversation, in which Messrs. Lewis, Bell, Glascock, Williams, of N. C. and others took part, the resolution was modified by striking out the former subject, and was then agreed to.

Mr. Underwood moved to refer so much of the message as relates to an amendment of the constitution in reference to the election of president and vice president, to a select committee of nine. His object, he said, was to ascertain whether it was the intention of the house to act on those topics at this session.

After some conversation the motion was agreed to.

Mr. Carter, of Tennessee, asked a select committee on so much of the message as relates to the compensation of the Tennessee volunteers lately in the service of the United States but at present disbanded.

Mr. Carter then stated that these men supposing themselves enlisted for twelve months, had sold their crops and abandoned their usual business, and encountered much exposure. If they were not suitably compensated, and without delay, the government might in vain invoke their aid on any future emergency.

After a little discussion the subject was referred to the committee on claims.

Mr. Wise offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to the condition of the executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint from any quarter, and the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation, be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint from any quarter at the manner said departments, or their business, or officer, or any of their officers, or agents of any description whatever, directly or indirectly, connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, are fulfilled, or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured or impaired the public service or interest, and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper.

Mr. Wise commenced his remarks in support of the above motion, by an allusion to the fact that this was the last annual message of Andrew Jackson, whose character and course of life, from his earliest youth, he proceeded to trace, and in glowing terms of commendation up to the time of his accession to the presidency. He then noticed the principles upon which general Jackson came into office, as an advocate of retrenchment and economy, and a scourge to office holders, in consequence of which he was borne along upon the flood-tide of prosperity. He professed the most pure and stoical democracy, and was buoyed up by the affections of his people. But he found that he had enemies to punish and friends to reward. He was beset with servile tools, who inculcated in him the maxim that "to the victors belong the spoils." The proscription policy was established and fully carried out, and the people it was contended, supported and approved its course.

Mr. Wise then passed to general Jackson's course in regard to the senate; to the destruction of the independence of congress by base bribes to its members, administered through executive appointments to office; to the extravagance and wastefulness of the public expenditures; to the seizure of the public money, and the usurpation by the president of royal prerogatives—in all which it was claimed that the people supported him.

What the last message of a president to a people thus constant and confiding ought to be, he went on to portray and to put in contrast with what the message was. He asserted however that the document did not come from the president, who had ever since his return been too sick to write or dictate it. The compliment to the ability and integrity of the officers of the department was, he contended, gratuitous and unfounded. Complaints had been made against some of these officers which it was the duty of the house to investigate. He had therefore submitted the resolution. The resolution was agreed to; 86 to 78.

The house then adjourned.

Wednesday, Dec. 14. The speaker laid before the house a communication from the first comptroller of the treasury, transmitting a statement of unsettled accounts, or accounts on which balances have been due for three years prior to the 30th of September, 1836, on the books of the second auditor of the treasury.

On motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey, the same was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Loyall, the house proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions reported yesterday from the committee of the whole, on the state of the union, referring the various parts of the president's message to the appropriate committees.

Mr. A. Mann moved that the resolutions be read, and that the question be taken conjointly on all of them, except such as might be excepted to by any member; which motion prevailed. The resolutions were then read, and the house concurred with the committee of the whole on the state of the union, except those numbered 3, 12 and 15, which were excepted on the suggestion of different members. The third resolution was read as follows:

3. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the finances and every thing connected therewith, the safe keeping of the public moneys and every thing connected therewith, and the bank of the United States, including the stock in that institution, be referred to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Adams moved to amend this resolution by inserting after the words "as relates to the finances, and every thing connected therewith," the words "except so much thereof as relates to the protective duties, and every thing connected therewith," and then to add to the end of the resolution the following words: "Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to the protective duties, and every thing connected therewith, be referred to the committee on manufactures."

This proposition gave rise to a discussion of much interest, a report of which we are reluctantly compelled to postpone until next week. The result was that Mr. Adams' motion was referred to the committee on manufactures, leaving the terms of resolution three otherwise to stand as they are.

The 12th resolution which is as follows, was agreed to.

12. Resolved, That so much of the said message as relates to amending the constitution of the United States, together with all propositions and resolutions submitted at the last and present sessions of congress, proposing amendments to the constitution, be referred to a select committee, to be composed of nine members.

When the 16th resolution was reached, being that offered yesterday by Mr. Wise relating to the administration of the executive departments, Mr. Pearce, of R. I. moved an adjournment, which was carried.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the senate—Mr. Rives presented the credentials of Richard E. Parker, senator elect from Virginia; and Mr. Brown the credentials of Robert Strange a senator elect from North Carolina.—Messrs. Strange and Parker appeared, were qualified and took their seats.

Mr. Webster presented two petitions signed by a great number of persons praying for a reduction of the duty on coal, and expressed an opinion that unless the duty on that article was to be considered a part of the general system of protection, it ought to be reduced, or, perhaps, repealed altogether.—The memorials were then referred to the committee on manufactures.

A number of petitions were presented, among them one by Mr. Davis from Richard D. Tucker and other importing merchants of Boston, praying that the fifth section of the act of 1832 may be repealed, and the system of credits restored in the collection of the customs as provided for by the law of 1818; also, that the duties in relation to goods entitled to debenture be further modified.—Referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Fulton presented the following memorials from the legislature of Arkansas, viz:

1. Asking congress for additional fortifications for the defence of the southern states;
2. Praying pre-emption floats to certain classes of settlers;
3. Praying pre-emption rights on certain unsurveyed lands of the United States;
4. Praying that the refuse public lands in Arkansas might be granted to settlers or to the state;
5. Praying the removal of obstructions to the navigation of Black, White and Third rivers, in Arkansas;

Together with several others, the description of which was not distinctly heard.

Mr. Robinson presented the following resolution, and moved its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be instructed to inquire into the cause of the destruction by fire of the building in which were kept the general post office, the city post office and the patent office.

Mr. Clay suggested whether it would not be expedient to invest the committee with power to send for persons and papers, so far as there might be any papers remaining.

Mr. Robinson said the idea of the committee was that the proposed committee of inquiry should proceed in the duty assigned them till they should find it necessary to send for persons and papers, when they could readily ask and obtain the requisite power.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Several gentlemen gave notice of their intention to introduce bills, and a number of private bills were read a second time, when, on motion of Mr. Grundy, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and when the doors were opened adjourned to Monday.

In the house of representatives. On motion of Mr. Connor, it was:

Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be instructed to inquire into the causes of this morning's conflagration of the general post office building, and also to inquire what losses have been sustained by the government, and whether any and if any, what legislation is rendered necessary by such conflagration.

After the transaction of some business of minor importance, the house resumed the consideration of the 16th of the resolutions. (Mr. Wise's) reported by the committee of the whole on the 13th inst. on the president's message. Mr. Dutée J. Pierce was entitled to the floor, and addressed the house at considerable length in opposition to the resolution. He concluded by moving to amend the said resolution by striking out all after "resolved," in the said resolution, and inserting the following: that so much of the president's message as is in the following words, to wit: "Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various executive departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint from any quarter at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation"—be referred to a select committee of nine members, with instructions to inquire into any specific causes of complaint which may be alleged against the integrity of the administration of any of the departments or their bureaus, or the vigilance and fidelity with which their duties have been discharged, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

The subject was further debated by Messrs. Peyton, Glacock, Ripley, A. Mann and Underwood.

Mr. Lane then moved that the house adjourn, but yielded the floor to enable Mr. Briggs to offer the following additional resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be authorised to send for persons and papers, in investigating into the causes of the burning of the post office building.

The resolution was adopted; and thereupon, on motion of Mr. A. Mann, the house adjourned.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

The Hudson river is greatly obstructed with ice, and the navigation to Albany is prosecuted with great difficulty.

Public sale of lands in Ohio ceded by the Wyandots. A proclamation of the president has been issued, directing the sale in April next of the tract of land in Ohio which was ceded to the U. States, by the treaty of the 23d April last, with a band of the Wyandot Indians. By the stipulations of the treaty in question the proceeds of these sales will be paid over to the Indians, and do not go into the treasury of the United States. [Globe.]

Fire at Quebec. There was a most calamitous fire at Quebec on the 24th ult. which destroyed a large number of houses and a vast amount of property. It was supposed to be the work of an incendiary. Another fire broke out on the 29th ult. which threatened serious injury—but two or three houses having been pulled down, its progress was arrested.

The number of vessels which arrived at Quebec from sea, this season, is 1,185, being an increase of 53 over the last year, when the total of the arrivals amounted to 1,132. The excess of tonnage, for the present year, is also considerable.

A praiseworthy example. The underwriters at Philadelphia have fitted out the well known pilot boat William Price, with pilots, and a good supply of provisions, for the purpose of cruising off the coast for inward bound vessels. She is to cruise until the 10th of March next.

American enterprise in Egypt. As a proof of the high estimation in which the mechanical genius of our country is held in the dominions of the pacha, an advertisement is now in course of publication by several of the New York papers, requiring mill wrights and engineers, "to fit up and manage a steam rice mill in Egypt; also a cotton seed oil mill." The advertisement adds—"none but native Americans, of good character, &c. will be engaged."

The great match race. The match, $5,000 aside, between Hickory John and Miss Medley, was run over the Lafayette course at Augusta, on the 6th inst. and won by the former in two heats with ease. The time is differently reported. The Chronicle makes it 7m. 56s.—8m. 4s. and the Sentinel 8m. 13s.—8m. 4s. Betting in favor of Hickory John at odds. The turf was wet and heavy, in consequence of the rain, which fell considerably before and during the race.

Execution of Indians. Columbus, (Geo.) Dec. 1. Six Creek Indians were hung in Gerard, Alabama, on Friday last, convicted at the last term of Russell superior court for murder, &c. The Indian who killed young Fannin some months ago, and a chief, were included in the number. The chief declared that the others were innocent, but that he was guilty of the charges preferred against him; he, however, acted in accordance with instructions given him by Neah-Emarthla and Neah-Micco, who it will be recollected have been permitted to go unpunished, and are now safely and quietly reposing in the forests of Arkansas. They met their fate with what might be termed true Indian philosophy, having sung several songs and given the well known "whoop" before taking the fearful leap. We have been told by those who witnessed the scene, that it was one of an affecting character, and well calculated to draw forth the sympathies of the white man in behalf of those deluded and unhappy people.

lated to draw forth the sympathies of the white man in behalf of those deluded and unhappy people.

Mail lost. A Charleston, (S. C.) paper of the 30th ult. says—We learn with much regret that the northern mail, due here on Wednesday last, containing, without doubt, the letters for this city, brought by the 24th of Oct. Liverpool packet ship Roscoe, was lost in Dee Dee swamp, and the driver having it in charge unfortunately drowned. Since the above was in type we learn that the mail has been recovered.

John Randolph's will. The argument in this case before the court of appeals of Virginia, was closed by John R. Cook, esq. on Friday the 9th inst. The decision of the court is not expected for some weeks.

A life spar has been invented by a Mr. Armstrong of New York, which would be of great service in case of shipwreck. It is twenty feet long and thirty six inches in circumference, of a cylindrical form, composed of the strongest twine duck, and covered between its lining and exterior with India rubber. It can be inflated with ease and transported with little effort, and when placed in the water will support twenty-five persons.

The stage robbery, near Gettysburgh. The York (Pa.) Republican states that Blumer, the young man who was arrested at that place, on the charge of robbing a fellow passenger of $15,000, and taken to Gettysburgh for trial, has been discharged by the court of Adams county, on giving bail in the sum of two thousand dollars, for his appearance at the January term of that court.

Ink, composed of sulphate of iron and an acid, can be removed from paper if placed between two sheets of copper. The fact was discovered in consequence of a Hindoo, at Calcutta, having placed a quantity of notes on the bank of Bengal in a copper box, by which the signatures, after a time, were entirely effaced. He demanded specie for them, when the bank, in consequence of their not having signatures, refused to pay them on the ground that they were not issued by the institution; but on referring to their record, and trying the effect of copper by placing common writing between sheets of that metal, they admitted they were genuine and paid them accordingly.

Honesty of the Indians. Mr. Catlin says, in one of his interesting letters lately published, that the first proposition made by the Indians in every treaty that he had ever attended, was that the government should pay the requisite sum of money to satisfy all their creditors, who were then present, and whose accounts were handed in, acknowledged and admitted.

Finances of Virginia. According to the account of the auditor transmitted to the general assembly on the 5th inst. the condition of the finances was as follows:

The balance in the treasury on Oct. 1, 1835	$118,253 07
Receipts during the year ending on Sept. 30, 1835	433,614 85
	551,867 92
Expenditures	530,895 17
	$20,972 75

Large yield. Mr. Israel Rogers, residing near Niles, Mich. raised nearly half a bushel of potatoes from the seed of a single potatoe ball which was buried last winter; the largest potatoe weighing a pound.

Price of pork. The Cincinnati Evening Post of the 3d inst. says—As we predicted, sellers have given way, and the market is pretty brisk at five dollars. We think it probable that it will suffer a still further decline to four or four and a half.—Live hogs are extremely abundant in the country and the price must come down.

We hail this "retrograde" in the price of pork, as an indication of a general decline in the price of edibles of every description, which were recently selling at prices varying from one-half to one-third, demanded at this period last year.

Georgia. Colonel J. C. Alford has been nominated by the state rights party of Georgia, a candidate for congress to supply the vacancy in the delegation of that state, occasioned by the resignation of colonel Towns.

The citizens of Norfolk with great unanimity have recommended in public meeting that the corporation of the borough subscribe $400,000 to the Roanoke, Danville and Junction rail road, and that they petition the legislature to sanction the same by enactment.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. It is now settled that the election of a vice president will devolve on the senate, Indiana having cast her electoral vote for Wm. H. Harrison and Francis Granger. The candidates who will be presented to that body are, Francis Granger and Richard M. Johnson, from whom a selection must be made according to the following provision of the constitution.

"The person having the greatest number of votes as vice president, shall be vice president; if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the senate shall choose the vice president; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice."

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT. The "Globe" states that "the business of this department has been resumed in the capacious buildings recently occupied by Mr. A. Fuller as a hotel.

The entrance to the apartment occupied by the postmaster general, is the second door west of the porch covering the main entrance to the buildings.

The "contract office" is approached by the third door, the "inspection office" by the fourth, and the "appointment office" by the first.

The entrance to the "auditor's office" is by the flight of stairs leading up to the second story from side pavement of 14th street.

As soon as the committees of congress have finished their investigations into the causes and extent of the recent calamity, we shall make a full statement to the public."

The investigation of the facts connected with the recent calamity is still going on; but no developments have been made which point with certainty to the cause of it. It is, however, generally supposed to have originated from the cinders and ashes deposited in the cellar by the persons having charge of the fires.

FLORIDA. Notwithstanding the letter of colonel Randall, inserted in the present sheet, contains much information heretofore published, it forms an important link in the history of the Florida war, and is placed on record for future reference.

It appears from a letter from Volusia, dated December 9, that general Jesup had assumed the command of the army, that he had issued an order that officers entitled to forage shall carry on their horses one bushel of corn each, besides other necessary articles. The letter states, "our prisoners gave important information relative to the Indians, and we expect the Wahoo Swamp to be the scene of much bloody fighting"—and further, "we march with thirty days provisions."

The health of governor Call is said to be in a very precarious state, and it is said he will resign the government of Florida. The term of service of the Tennessean volunteers expired on the 16th of November, and they had signified to general Call their intention to go home. It was thought that in this they were determined by the dismissal of gen. Call to whom they were much attached.

The loss of the Indians in the several actions in the Wahoo Swamp is estimated at one hundred, and that of the whites, 25 killed, and 59 wounded.

A detachment of Florida volunteers, consisting of two companies, under the command of colonel Sanches, had been ordered to proceed down to Tomoka where Philip and his band have had undisturbed possession since the last campaign. It is, doubtful, however, whether they will be able to effect any thing, as the force sent is small.

TEXAS. It is said that Santa Ana has been released by the Texian government, and is now on his way to Washington. According to the Texas Telegraph, it appears that president Houston sent a message to the senate apprising them of the determination of the executive to release Santa Ana, and leave him at liberty to go to Washington—on which measure he asked the advice of that body. The senate, after a warm debate, left the matter in the hands of the president, who immediately released Santa Ana.

The latter left soon after for the United States, accompanied by his secretary Almonte, and escorted by five cavalry soldiers to the American territory. The senate, surprised at this hurried procedure, then passed a resolution instructing the president to explain to congress the reasons which had prompted him to release Santa Ana. As Houston enjoys the confidence of the army and the people, no opposition was shown at Columbia to the release of the prisoner.

It is said that colonel Nunez, brother-in-law to Santa Ana—not nephew—is charged with important despatches from the latter for the Mexican government, and will probably sail without delay for Mexico.

Mexico is making vigorous preparations for another campaign against the Texians, who are also on the alert, and preparing themselves for a determined resistance.

THE MILITARY COURT at Frederick is still engaged in the trial of gen. Scott. Since our last, gen. Clinch and capt. Drane, two important witnesses, have arrived at Frederick, and gen. Scott has applied to the court to issue a summons for Francis P. Blair, editor of the "Globe," whose testimony he deems important.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SENATOR. Franklin Pierce, esquire, at present one of the representatives from New Hampshire, has been elected a senator in congress from that state, from the 4th March next, when the term of Mr Page expires.

INDIANA SENATOR. Oliver H. Smith has been elected a senator of the United States from the state of Indiana for six years from the 4th March next, in the place of Mr. Hendricks whose term of service will then expire.

SOUTH CAROLINA. Colonel P. M. Butler has been elected, by the legislature, governor of this state without opposition, and William Dubose, lieutenant. Mr. McDuffie's farewell address is very eloquent, and manifests a determination to retire to private life.

LOUISIANA. The returns from Natchitoches and Claiborne, the two parishes not officially returned in Louisiana, have been received at New Orleans. They give an aggregate majority of 15 for White. Mr. Van Buren's majority therefore, would, had all the parishes been returned, have been 225.

MINISTER FROM TEXAS. The "Globe" of Tuesday last contains the following:

"The hon. Wm. H. WARTON, minister plenipotentiary from the republic of Texas, and colonel John Wolfe, his secretary, arrived yesterday, and have taken lodgings at Gadsby's hotel.

EXPRESS MAILS. Sufficient time has not elapsed to say how far these mails will prove beneficial to the commercial community in the speedy transportation of letters, &c. but the articles of news received through them are generally of the most meager and uninteresting character. The "experiment" will not be an expensive one to the government, for it is stated by the "Globe" that it will cost less than $5,000 a week, and that that amount will be received in postage on letters.

ALABAMA. The presidential electors of Alabama met at Tuscaloosa, on the 7th inst. and gave the seven votes of that state to Martin Van Buren for president, and Richard M. Johnson for vice president.

The house of representatives have passed the expunging resolutions by a majority of about twenty votes. The senate had not acted on them, though it was thought they would pass that branch of the legislature also.

BURNING OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT. The circuit court, now in session at Washington, is engaged in the trial of Richard H. Wills, charged with burning the treasury department in 1833.—Much curious testimony has been elicited, which will be noticed at the conclusion of the trial.

BANKING CAPITAL. From a list of applications to be made to the New York legislature at its next session, we learn that there will be applications for thirteen new banks, and applications for an increase of capital from two existing banks, making in all an aggregate increase of six million six hundred and fifty thousand dollars of banking capital. There are other applications before noticed to the amount of twenty millions; so that the whole increase of banking capital already notified as to be asked from the next legislature, will exceed twenty-six millions of dollars.

SURPLUS REVENUE. The disposition of Pennsylvania's portion of the surplus caused much discussion and numerous propositions in the house of representatives of that state. Finally a resolution was passed agreeing to receive it and leaving its disposition to future legislation.

In the senate on the 18th inst. Mr. Toland offered a resolution, which was read and laid on the table, premising that the surplus to be distributed will be no longer required, and instructing the delegation in congress from that state to endeavor to obtain the passage of a law, vesting in the several states the absolute right and ownership of the funds to be distributed under the act of congress, passed 23d day of June, 1836, and to effect the repeal of so much of said act as is inconsistent therewith.

ASSISTANT SURGEONS. Navy department, Dec. 10. The following is the order in which the assistant surgeons, who passed before the late board of naval surgeons, were reported to the department in point of relative merit, viz:

Class of 1831—Jonathan M. Foltz.
Class of 1832—No. 1. John C. Mercer, No. 2. Samuel C. Lawrason, No. 3. Edward Gilchrist, No. 4. Lewis Wolfley, No. 5. Lewis W. Minor, No. 6. Robert M. Baltzer, No. 7. William John Powell.

THE SURPLUS REVENUE. There are many projects in the different states for the appropriation of the sums they may receive under the distribution law—but the following from a correspondent of the Charleston (S. C.) "Mercury" is the most quaint and exclusive we have yet seen: If, however, Mr. McDuffie's theory about the operation of the tariff laws upon the planting interest is correct, he must admit the justice of the proposition.

"The governor suggests to the legislature to deposit the whole amount due this state, into the bank. Now let me suggest first, that this sum has been advanced according to the governor's theory, by the planters. If so, they ought to have the benefit of it. It should be loaned to planters by the year, being secured not by lands only, but by negroes, and to make that security valid, let the bank make that same fund an insurance fund, to insure negroes at such rates as would bring sufficient business. Then a planter, by assigning such a policy, could get a loan to save selling his negroes. The state is fast becoming a wilderness; every year negroes are leaving the state never to return, and with them the most enterprising planters. If the legislature does not take steps to put a planter on as good a footing as a factor, and let the negro capital be an available security for borrowing on every year, will see more plantations abandoned, and finally the whole low country will be abandoned. Already our land tax is grossly unequal. No planter but what is tempted to sell now, although negroes must advance every year. But if his money, refunded by the United States, is to be loaned only on endorsed notes, he must pay a town endorser two and a half per cent. and then renew every sixty days. This he cannot do, and so he sells his negroes, they are carried to the west, and the state is thus weakened—they pay no more taxes to South Carolina. The excitement about a rail road has drawn off public attention from the appalling fact, that this state is daily losing its agricultural labor, and its lands becoming valueless. The rail road, if ever it is built, will pass over the whole low country and not redeem an acre. The city may become the resort of strangers in the winter to trade, not with the state but through it. The drain of negroes is drawing off the very life blood of the state. Here is a chance of saving it, by applying the planter's own money on the security of his property. The very rise in the value of negroes is one cause which operates to drive them off to the more productive west, and if the attachments of home are to be balanced by the pressure of debt, most men will sell their negroes, abandon their lands, and with the remnant of their estate become tax paying citizens of other states. The attention of the legislature is called to this subject—by one who still prefers the SEA SHORE.

THE CONCORD MONUMENT. The readers of the Gazette will remember that the rev. Dr. Ripley gave a piece of land, on condition that, within a given time, on it should be erected a monument in commemoration of the first action that was fought in the revolutionary struggle. For such a purpose, no locality could be more appropriate, as the land thus given is the spot on which the first of the enemy fell.

On Tuesday last the corner stone of the monument was laid, on which occasion an impressive and appropriate prayer was made by the reverend donor. The monument, when finished, will be creditable as well as ornamental to our town. The material is granite, the model an obelisk; its height will be about 25 feet; the base, which is square, is a large block, 5½ feet broad, and about 3 in height. On the west side of the next block is inlaid a slab of white Italian marble, on which is engraved the following laconic, but modest and unassuming inscription:

Here
On the 19th of April,
1775,
Was made
The first forcible resistance
To British aggression,
On the opposite bank.
Stood the American militia.
Here stood the invading army,
And on this spot
The first of the enemy fell
In the war of that revolution
Which gave Independence
To these United States.

In gratitude to God,
And
In the love of freedom,
This monument
Was erected
A. D. 1836.

It is not often such emotions of pleasure flit across our bosom, as we felt on reading this simple and eloquent appeal to our piety and patriotism, and pardon us, gentle reader, if the recollection of the sufferings of our countrymen on that memorable struggle, caused a tear to steal from our eyes. Matter-of-fact, as our vocation may be, we trust that none will accuse us of being poetical, when we say, that anticipation painted the time when this plain obelisk, and this simple inscription, will draw more pilgrims to the spot where the first gun of liberty was fired, than ever journeyed to the lady of Loretto, or any other single shrine of monkish superstition. The minions of slavery, we admit, have raised more splendid piles to commemorate the actions of a tyrant; but, excuse our American feelings that, although we admire the triumphs of art in those magnificent efforts, yet we think it better suits the genius of our nation, and the spirit of our republican institutions, to erect such tributes in memory of our departed brave as the CONCORD MONUMENT.
[Concord Yeoman.]

ORIENTAL COMPLIMENT.

Our readers doubtless know that a treaty of friendship and commerce was negotiated, about three years ago, with the sultan of Muscat, (a gentleman, by the way, and a liberal enlightened monarch), by Edmund Roberts, esq. (lately deceased), who went out in the Peacock for that purpose. The second mission of Mr. Roberts, on which he was engaged at the time of his death, in June last, was to carry out the ratification of the treaties entered into with the sultan of Muscat and the king of Siam; and also, we believe, to make another effort to negotiate a treaty with the emperor of Cochin-China, the first having failed through the absurd and vexatious requisitions of etiquette insisted on by the Cochin-Chinese officers. The following translation of the letter written by the sultan of Muscat to the president, is a good specimen of oriental courtesy and compliment. We have obtained it from the narrative of the mission, written by Mr. Roberts, and now almost ready for publication.
[N. Y. Com. Adv.]

Translation of a letter from the sultan of Muscat to the president of the United States.

"IN THE NAME OF GOD, AMEN."

"To the most high and mighty Andrew Jackson, president of the United States of America, whose name shines with so much splendor throughout the world. I pray most sincerely that on the receipt of this letter it may find his highness, the president of the U. States, in high health, and that his happiness may be constantly on the increase. On a most fortunate day and at a happy hour, I had the honor to receive your highness' letter, every word of which is clear and distinct as the sun at noonday, and every letter shown forth as brilliantly as the stars in the heavens. Your highness' letter was received by your faithful and highly honorable representative and ambassador, Edmund Roberts, who made me supremely happy in explaining the object of his mission, and I have complied in every respect with the wishes of your honorable ambassador, in concluding a treaty of friendship and commerce between our respective countries, which shall be faithfully observed by myself and my successors, as long as the world endures. And his highness may depend that all American vessels resorting to the ports within my dominions, shall know no difference, in point of good treatment, between my country and that of his own most fortunate and happy country, where felicity ever dwells. I most firmly hope that his highness the president may ever consider me as his firm and true friend, and that I will ever hold the president of the United States very near and dear to my heart, and my friendship shall never know any diminution, but shall continue to increase till time is no more. I offer most sincerely and truly, to his highness the president my entire and devoted services, to execute any wishes the president may have within my dominions, or within any ports or places wherein I possess the slightest influence. This is from your most beloved friend, "SYED BIN SULTAN."

"Written on the twenty-second day of the moon, Jamada Alawel, in the year Alhajre, 1249," at the royal palace in the city of Muscat.

"This letter is to have the address of being presented to the most high and mighty Andrew Jackson, president of the United States of America, whose name shines with so much brilliancy throughout the world."

AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

A Washington correspondent of the New York Journal of Commerce furnishes the following notice of the proceedings of this society, at its recent annual meeting:—

Washington, Dec. 14th, 1836.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY was held last evening, at half past seven o'clock, in the hall of representatives. The hon. Henry Clay took the chair, and called the meeting to order.

The meeting being very thinly attended, on account of the inclemency of the weather, it was proposed by some to adjourn, but, after some consultation, it was determined to proceed.

The rev. Ralph R. Gurley, secretary of the society, read the annual report, giving a detail of the operations of the society for the last year. The report presents a most encouraging view of the condition and prospects of the colony. In health, temperance, industry and happiness, it is on a footing of equality with any other settlement on the face of the earth. It seems to require nothing but agricultural improvement, and the establishment of schools, to bring the people to a high state of civilization, prosperity and importance. The accounts from the intelligent agent of the Maryland colony represent the settlers as moral and happy. No reasonable man, says one account, could desire greater facilities for living than are here open to all. The articles of foreign demand spring up simultaneously in their hills and valleys. The coffee tree flourishes luxuriantly, and produces fruit after three years.—All that is necessary for a settler to do, is to plant 20,000 coffee trees; and in three years he will have a good income.

The report mentions one fact of great importance in reference to the slave trade, from which it appears that this opprobrium of Christendom is about to be blotted out. A treaty has been concluded between England, France and Spain, conceding, each to each, a mutual right of search, with a view to the total suppression of the slave trade, carried on under the Spanish flag. This alliance had heretofore been confined to England and France. The accession of Spain to the league will secure the suppression of the nefarious traffic, which has constantly been carried on between Cuba and Africa. It appears that the United States was solicited to join the league, but declined it, on the ground that they would thereby yield the right of search, which right of search was so liable to abuse, as we had experienced. The report expresses the hope that the United States, which was the first nation to denounce the traffic, and to declare it piracy, would accede to the proposition of granting a mutual right of search, under such guards as would secure it from abuse, as the most efficient means of suppressing the traffic.

The report also mentions that the Liberia colonists had expelled the trade from a coast of 300 miles in extent.

The finances of the society are small in reference to its objects, but are increasing. The receipts, during the past year, were $16,157, and the expenditures about $35,000. The amount of the receipts is less than that of the preceding year, for the reason that in that year $10,000 were raised by issuing the society's stock, and over $4,000 more received from the government for the transportation to Africa of recaptured Africans. But the amount received from donations and auxiliary societies was never so great as during the present year. The debt of the society has not been sensibly diminished, but hopes are entertained that the legacies recently left to the society will be fully adequate to the extinction of the debt. It is also expected that the agricultural prosperity of the colony will soon render any aid from the society unnecessary.

In the states of Virginia and Maryland the society is in greater favor than it ever was at any former period of its existence. It is believed that a majority of the intelligent citizens of the former state are in favor of an appropriation of money, by the state, for the objects of the association. In Kentucky, also, at several large public meetings, it was resolved that the objects of the institution are worthy of the patronage and support of the national and state government.

On motion, the report was accepted, approved and ordered to be printed.

The Rev. Dr. Proudfit submitted a resolution declaring that the society for the colonization of the free people of color, in Africa, with their own consent, is entitled to an honorable rank among the benevolent institutions of our land and age, and that the success which has attended the efforts of its friends, ought to encourage them to persevere. The reverend mover spoke at some length in illustration of his views, as stated in the resolution.

Dr. Reese offered a resolution declaring that the present prosperity of the settlements on the African coast, afforded a practical refutation of the calumny of its enemies, &c.

This gentleman spoke with much animation, in regard to the condition of the colony, and particularly in reference to its health, temperance and industry.

The hon. Mr. Grennell remarked that most of the donations received during the year by the society, were the results of collections made on the Sabbath preceding or near the fourth of July. He therefore begged leave to submit a resolution expressive of the thanks of the society to the ministers of the gospel who had aided it by affording facilities for such collections, and respectfully requesting them to continue the practice.

Mr. G. supported the resolution with some very judicious remarks.

Z. Collins Lee, esq. submitted a resolution declaratory of the expediency of applying to the federal and state legislatures for aid in the promotion of the objects of the society, and, thereupon, he spoke at some length, and in an able and interesting manner.

The rev. Dr. Hill, (of Alexandria), offered a resolution stating that the society looked with interest and gratification upon the formation of an association of young men in the city of New York for the purpose of endowing a seminary of education in Liberia. Dr. Hill spoke briefly on the subject indicated in the resolution.

The rev. Mr. Andrews and rev. Dr. Laurie also offered resolutions which the writer did not distinctly hear read.

George W. P. Custis, esq. delivered a most eloquent and appropriate eulogy on the deceased vice president of the society, the rev. bishop White, and Robert Ralston, esq.

The utmost harmony prevailed at the meeting. The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and, at half past ten o'clock, the meeting, on motion of Mr. Gurley, adjourned, to reassemble this evening at the rev. Mr. Post's church.

THE TREASURY ORDER—REMARKS OF MR. EWING.

In the senate on the 14th, the following offered by Mr. Ewing was taken up, on its second reading. Resolution to rescind the treasury order of the eleventh day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and to make uniform the currency receivable for the public revenue.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, &c. That the treasury order of the eleventh day of July, anno domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, designating the funds which should be receivable in payment for public lands, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Resolved, also, That it shall not be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to delegate to any person, or to any corporation, the power of directing what funds shall be receivable for customs, or for the public lands; nor shall he make any discrimination in the funds so receivable, between different individuals, or between the different branches of the public revenue.

Mr. Ewing then addressed the senate in explanation of his reasons for offering the resolution.—He stated that he did not think that the objects which had been avowed as those for which the circular had been issued, were the only or the leading objects. He then took a view of the condition of things previous to and during the last session of congress. It was foreseen before congress met that there would be a struggle to obtain some legislative measures for the purpose of checking the accumulation of the public money in the hands of the executive. When the bill for the distribution of the surplus revenue was brought forward, it was met constantly by the most positive assertion, that there would be no surplus revenue. This was repeated as long as it could be with any prospect of success; but when it was found that the public money was coming in so fast that such statements could be no longer sustained, it was then declared that the whole of the surplus would be required for the necessities of the country. In the report made by the secretary of the treasury, on the 6th of December 1835, the erroneous estimate of the amount of revenue which would be in the treasury on the 1st of January next, was sent forth, in which the secretary under-estimated the amount by many millions, although all the receipts of that year were nearly all come in at the time when he issued the statement. A mistake of a couple of millions might have been attributed to mistake, but such a misstatement at the time, when the president must have been in possession of the facts, could scarcely be attributed to inadvertence.

Mr. Ewing went on to refer to a speech made by himself, in which he stated the evils to be apprehended from the irresistible influx of money into the treasury: when he was met with declarations that we should want all our means to sustain us through an expected war with France; that we were to look for a French squadron battering down the walls of the capitol, and to defend us, in these dangerous contingencies, we should require large expenditures in the erection of fortifications: we were further told that the contest with the Seminoles in Florida would spread into an Indian war along the whole of our western frontier, and that we must expend liberally to build forts in the west. Heavy appropriations had been made for fortifications, heavier than had ever before been made in time of peace. Still there remained a large surplus in the treasury. When every other expedient failed, only seven days after the adjournment of congress, this treasury circular was issued. It was not issued by the advice of congress, but was sent abroad in seven days after the adjournment, as soon as gentlemen were out of the city, changing the character of the funds to be derived from this, one of the greatest sources of our revenue.

Attempts had been made to make the people believe that the mischiefs which had resulted from the treasury circular, are in truth attributable to the distribution bill. These attempts however had not been successful. The true source of the evil was well understood; and was doubtless foreseen by those who advised the order to be issued. There were doubtless other interests which influenced the issuing the order which were not generally known. It was not the act of any single individual, but was advised by many. One of the effects of the order was to limit the sales of public lands and to raise their prices, and it had operated in favor of those speculators who had borrowed money from the deposit banks, and also in favor of the deposit banks themselves. This he had no doubt was one of the objects contemplated to be effected by the order. Another object was this: It was known that some of the deposit banks would not be able to pay over the moneys belonging to the public. It had been said on this floor that the distribution bill would break many of these banks.—This idea would have the effect of collecting specie in the land offices, and this could be distributed among these particular banks for the purpose of sustaining them, through the process of paying over the public money to the states. It had been said that this order would prevent the over issues of banks. He replied to this that there were no over-issues except by the deposit banks, and these would not be effected by this order. These banks had made great loans to speculators, and the effect of the order would be to accumulate specie to relieve them from the effect of their improvident loans.—He took views in extenso of the condition of the western banks which had increased their issues, of late years, as called for by the increasing commerce of that part of the country; but there had been no over-issues. As soon as this order was issued, these banks had closed their doors against all who wished to borrow, and had been compelled to push their debtors. Thus the whole commerce of the west had been crippled. He expatiated at length on these points.

Mr. Benton, after a brief reference to some of the topics of Mr. Ewing's remarks, (not heard with sufficient distinctness by the reporter), said that some time would be requisite for a reply at large to the senator from Ohio. He would now say that he concurred with him in his construction of the law in relation to the deposits remaining in the treasury. But he denied that any one had said, at the last session, that there would be no surplus remaining in the treasury at the end of the year. Assertions in any way like this were always made with some qualification. It is now declared, on the other hand, that there is a large surplus. But the president's message shows that fifteen or sixteen millions of that surplus is already appropriated, and continues in the treasury because it could not be used. That such would be the fact, Mr. B. had repeated so often in the course of the last summer, that the walls of the senate chamber, if they could speak, would utter it. Every appropriation had been kept off, till it was known all round that it could not be used; and, accordingly, there now remained fifteen or sixteen millions unexpended.—The whole organization of the senate committees was such as to oppose appropriations and favor a surplus. Congress sat till July, when half the year was gone. Suppose they had continued in session till October, there would then have been a surplus of $20,000,000; and if they had sat till this time, the whole revenue would still have been surplus, and there would have been double the amount to distribute that we have now got.

Do you see, sir, said Mr. B. these few and slender leaves? They contain every act of the last session up to the second of March; and they are nearly all private acts, sent up here by the industry of one member of the other house. Every appropriation of any moment was put off to the end of the session. If the appropriations had been made in time, there would have been no more surplus than often before. If it had not been for the organization of the chamber against appropriations and in favor of a surplus, the surplus now would have been many millions below what it is. We have often had a surplus to the amount of fifteen, sixteen and seventeen millions. If the appropriations of the last session had been made in time, and if many had not been even given up for the want of time to expend them, there would have been no surplus now.

Mr. B. said he had only intended now to state some points on which he concurred with the senator from Ohio, and to say what he thought of the construction which he (Mr. E.) had given to the deposit law. He had shown that the surplus is not a surplus in the ordinary import of the term, but a surplus created by congress itself. He wished now that some such disposition should be made of the resolution of Mr. E. as would permit bills now, and soon to be, in progress to go on, without blocking them up. It might either be laid on the table, or be made the order of some day sufficiently distant to give him time to prepare for a reply to the senator from Ohio. He was about to move the former, when

Mr. Webster expressed his assent to a postponement of the discussion, but hoped it would not extend beyond the residue of the week. He knew of no subject more important, or in which the public mind seemed at this moment to take a deeper interest. The condition of the country in reference to the currency was admitted on all hands to be greatly deranged. A state of things, indeed, existed which was anomalous and unprecedented; for while the price of all sorts of commodities was unusually high, there existed, at the same moment, a scarcity of money. Such a state of the pecuniary interests of the country called for investigation, and demanded the prompt attention of congress. He concluded by expressing a hope that Monday might be fixed upon for the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. Ewing had no objection to such an arrangement, though he was opposed to any unnecessary delay. He said a few words in reply to some of the remarks which had fallen from Mr. Benton, disclaiming all agency in retarding the appropriations for the purpose of creating a surplus, &c. but reserved himself for the fuller discussion of the subject.

The resolution was then postponed to and made the order of the day for Monday.

INTERESTING FROM FLORIDA.

From the Charleston Courier of the 5th instant.

Col. Randall, late adjutant and inspector general of the army in Florida, but who retires from his command on the near approach of the session of the court of appeals of Florida, arrived in this city this morning in the steam packet Dolphin, from St. Augustine, to whom we are indebted for the following interesting particulars of the movements of the army in that territory.

Col. Randall is the bearer of despatches from gov. Call to the department at Washington.

Friday, November 11th, the army, composed of the Tennessee brigade about 950 strong, of about 350 regular troops, 200 Floridians, and the regiment of Creek volunteers of about 600 warriors, marched from Fort Drane in pursuit of the enemy. On the 12th the army encamped within three miles of the Wythlacoochee, and opposite the point where the passage of the river was attempted on the 15th of the preceding month. Preparations were made for forcing a passage on the following morning.

On the next day, (13th) the Tennessee volunteers applied for men, on the point of obtaining the honor of forcing the passage of the stream at the point, when a month before the high waters had baffled their attempt, when it being reported that the enemy had retired, they were detached to march and attack the Negrotown to the left, where also an ineffectual effort had been the month before made to cross, which had been prevented by the same cause.

The regiment of Creek volunteers then supported by the greater part of the regular troops, the whole under the command of col. Pierce, crossed the river with no opposition from the enemy, but an immense danger and peril from the intrinsic difficulties of the passage, the river, although about four feet lower than on the former visit of the army, presented still a most formidable and dangerous obstacle. It was about 220 yards wide, deep at all points and swimming for about 50 yards, with a dense swamp on either bank. Four of the regular troops were drowned in effecting its passage.

On a report that trails of the enemy were discovered on the opposite bank, the commander-in-chief crossed the river with the mounted men under command of col. Warren. No enemy, however, was found; the cove had been deserted for some days by the hostile Indians, whose trails were discovered leading into Ochlawaha and the Wahoo Swamp; no appearance of recent habitation or cultivation was visible.

The left division, under gen. Armstrong, encountered no opposition from the enemy in crossing the creek to the Negrotown.

The creek was deep enough to swim their horses—Col. Trawdsdale's regiment crossed it, burnt two well-built negro or Indian towns on the opposite side; after which the brigade retreated to the camp near the river. From the report of an old and infirm negro, left at this place by the enemy, it was ascertained that they had fled for the Wahoo Swamp on the approach of our army, carrying with them all their property and corn. From the same source we learnt that, at the previous affairs of the 13th October, at the river and the creek, the loss of the enemy had been at the first 13, and, at the last 33 killed.

Dispositions were then made to pursue the enemy in every direction, by which he could possibly retire. Col. Pierce with 250 of the regulars, the Creek right, and col. Warren's mounted men were ordered to pass out of the cove, by the only practicable outlet in that direction, and after fully exploring the country south and west of the river, to reunite with the army about the 19th or 20th near Dade's battle ground, the commander-in-chief reserving the river, marched with the Tennessee brigade, two companies of artillery and the Florida footmen, and with the whole wagon train in search of the enemy, on the north side of the river and towards the Wahoo Swamp. Both divisions marched on the 16th, and on the 17th about noon, a large party of the enemy was discovered near the line of march of the main army, encamped near a hammock. The first regiment of Tennessee volunteers under col. Bradford, constituting the regiment under the immediate command of gen. Armstrong, was instantly detached to attack the enemy, then distant about 400 yards.

The enemy, though surprised, had time to withdraw themselves and a portion of their property into an adjoining hammock and swamp, where they awaited the approach of our men, who advanced rapidly to the encounter. Before the troops could dismount they were received with a severe fire from the enemy, the fire was promptly returned. The fight was vigorously maintained by the enemy firing from their covert upon our troops, but upon a charge being ordered and promptly executed by our men, in the most gallant manner, the enemy precipitately fled, leaving 20 dead in the wood, and all their horses and baggage. Other dead and a great number of wounded were carried off by them during the fight, as indicated by numerous bloody trains. The pursuit was continued by our men waist deep in water and mud, as long as the traces of the enemy could be followed.

At the beginning of the action two companies of the 2d regiment, and the companies of spies afterwards, were detached to the left, to cut off the retreat of the enemy, but the nature of the country prevented all effectual pursuit. The enemy were supposed to amount to from 150 to 200.

Our loss was one killed, and ten wounded—one mortally. This was a very gallant affair, in which both officers and men behaved with the utmost spirit and intrepidity. After bringing off our killed and wounded, the army moved four miles on its route, and encamped. On the 19th, the commander-in-chief, after leaving the wagon train under a strong guard, marched at the head of about 550 Tennesseans, consisting of colonel Trawdsdale's regiment, principally footmen, and a part of the 1st regiment and the companies of spies, all under the immediate command of general Armstrong, into the Wahoo Swamp. About three miles from the camp, they struck into a large Indian trail, which led to the left, through two dense hammocks, and over two creeks into a large field, surrounded on three sides by hammocks. The enemy, on our approach, were found to have just deserted their position, having set fire to their houses, which were then burning. Evidence of their presence in the hammock in front, was soon afforded, and the line was quickly formed to attack them. The footmen under colonel Trawsdale, were formed in open order to charge into the hammock, while the horsemen to the right and left were thrown back to protect the flank, and to act as a corps of reserve. Before our troops had received their final orders to advance, they were saluted by a tremendous fire along their whole front from the opposite hammock. After exchanging shots with the enemy for a short time and slowly advancing upon them, on receiving the orders to charge, our troops rushed forward with a shout to the wood, and were soon closely engaged in a deadly combat. Nearly at the same moment, a heavy fire was opened on both flanks, and soon after a large party of the enemy—at least fifty in number—boldly threw themselves in the rear following the courageous example of their comrades in the front, the horsemen on the right and left, quickly dismounted and charged into the wood.

The action was maintained on all sides with great animation and effect, for about forty or fifty minutes, when the enemy was driven at all points; a small company of men commanded by captain Fletcher, being led off from the left flank, charged down and dispersed the enemy in the rear. The enemy in front were driven completely through the hammock, and pursued so long as they could be seen or heard, after which they retired in order to the field, bringing off the dead and wounded; our loss was three killed and fifteen wounded. The enemy left dead on the field twenty-five, and others were doubtless carried off; of their wounded we could form no estimate. This was really a most brilliant affair. The enemy could not have been less than from 600 to 700 men, at the same moment their fire covered our entire front and both flanks, while a large party openly exhibited themselves in the rear. At this point of ground in the center of the field, occupied by the commanding general and his staff, the balls were distinctly seen and heard to strike and cross each other from three sides at the same moment. The extent of the ground, and the open order taken by our troops, together with the success of our charge, alone prevented the enemy from obtaining a decided advantage from their position and numerical superiority.

No terms can do justice to the gallantry of the troops on the occasion. Wherever the enemy could be found, they were promptly charged upon, and followed even to the very depths of their hammocks and swamps. Thus ended the first battle of the Wahoo Swamp. The lateness of the hour, ignorance of the country, the fatigue of the men, and the exhaustion of their ammunition, prevented the army from following up the advantage.

The next day, the 19th, the army marched to the place appointed for its junction with the right division under colonel Pierce, near Dade's battle ground, a position more formidable for the renewed attack meditated on the Wahoo Swamp. This juncture was effected late the next day.

On the 21st, the army marched in three columns into the swamp—the Tennesseans for the right, the regulars with colonel Warren's mounted men, the centre under colonel Pierce; and the Creek regiment the left. On reaching the scene of conflict of the 18th, the enemy showed themselves ready to renew the fight. The Tennesseans and regulars formed on the right and centre, and advanced steadily towards the hammock in line of battle, and were met by a general fire from the enemy on their whole front. Without pausing and without firing a gun, they marched into the hammock, and poured a destructive fire on the enemy. The charge was irresistible, the enemy fled and scattered.

So soon as the direction of their retreat was discovered, colonel Pierce, with his division and Creek Indians, were ordered to pursue, and, soon after, colonel Trawsdale, with his regiment, and colonel Warren, with the Florida horsemen, were sent to support them. The greater part of the regulars and the Tennesseans unfortunately took a trail to the right by which they became involved in an almost impassable morass, where no horse could move, and where the men were wading breast deep in mud and water.

A small body of Creek Indians on the left led by lieutenant-col. Brown, taking a better path followed closely upon the enemy and found them strongly posted in a cypress swamp; there they were briskly charged upon by the Creeks, and the gallant major Monica, in attempting to cross a creek fell dead in the stream. Some others of the Indians fell at the same time, and it was soon discovered that the party was too small even to defend their own ground against the enemy, without a desperate struggle. Two companies of Florida militia, under command of capt. Groves and lieutenant Myrick, followed some companies of artillery under major Gardiner, captains Tompkins, Porter and lieutenant Lee, and by colonel Waire, with his mounted men, coming successively into action, enabled our men to sustain the unequal conflict.

A desperate struggle ensued, sustained with great animation on both sides, when the superiority of our fire was soon exhibited the arrival of colonel Pierce with the reserve of his battalion, and of colonel Trawsdale with the Tennesseans.

So soon as they could extricate themselves from the morass, rendered their superiority still more apparent, and almost silenced the fire of the enemy, yet the passage was not gained for all; previous attempts to turn or pass it had failed, and its practicability was unascertained, the hostile chiefs were distinctly heard by the friendly Indians encouraging their warriors, with assurances that the whites would not pass it, and appearances all led to the same conclusions. The officer in command of the troops engaged, decided that the attempt should not be made at so late an hour of the day, with an entire ignorance of the country behind, and they accordingly withdrew their men after carrying off the dead and wounded.

In this last affair, our loss was considerable, compared with that of any previous fight; besides the heroic Monica, two of the Creek Indians were killed. Capt. Ross, of the marines, commanding a company in the same regiment, was severely wounded in the thigh. Five of the regulars were killed, and seven of them wounded, including captain Maitland. The Tennesseans sustained a loss of 1 killed and 8 wounded.

The loss of the enemy was ascertained to be ten left dead on the field from which they were routed; their loss on the other side of the stream, cannot of course be certainly known, but must of necessity have been great, the orders of their chiefs, moreover, as heard by our Indians, directing the disposition of their dead and wounded, furnish the testimony of the enemy to the same conclusion—fifty at least must have fallen in the conflict.

The army having now exhausted the last day that could be spared in pursuit of the enemy, without incurring actual starvation, was compelled to return to the camp, which it reached about 10 at night; it thence marched the next day for Volusia, where supplies had been previously ordered, and which it reached on the morning of the fifth day. Before this last march had been undertaken, the troops had been for some days on half rations, all the corn exhausted, not a grain was left for the wagon horses.

These privations were borne by the troops with the utmost patience, and even cheerfulness, from the anxiety to protract the contest as long as possible. The results, then, of this campaign are, that the strong holds of the enemy, the heart of the Wythlacochee and the Wahoo, have been penetrated and overthrown. Morasses, hitherto uninvaded by our armies, have been explored; the enemy have been defeated in four several battles, with great loss; that our troops have now shown them that neither the swamps nor the hammocks, with a numerical superiority, afford them safety or defence, and that nothing can insure their escape but some impassable barrier of nature; that adequate supplies of provisions, to which the country can contribute nothing, alone were wanting to enable our troops to destroy the enemy utterly. The army may also boast that in all its marches through the country, encumbered as it was by an immense baggage train, the enemy, on no occasion, dare to assail it, nor did he, in any instance, cut off any of its detachments or convoys.

We further learn that the army is now at Volusia, receiving ample supplies of provisions, and that fresh horses are being transported to that point, to enable it speedily to enter upon another expedition. The Tennessee brigade, whose term of service will expire in this month, are eagerly looking forward to another fight with the enemy on the Wythlacochee, at which point it is proposed to embark them for their return to their homes. Should general Jesup, of whom nothing has been heard since his arrival at Tampa, be in a condition to follow up our blow on the Wythlacochee and Wahoo, into the very heart of which our trails will conduct him, the result may prove decisive.

The enemy, weakened, defeated and dispirited, can offer no effectual resistance to the final army commanded by that able officer. On the other hand, should the enemy have dispersed and retreated on the night of the 21st, as there is great reason to suppose, from the numerous small trails discovered by our spies on the 22d, all conveying into one large trail, leading to the south and east, the route expected to be pursued by general Jesup, from Tampa bay, it is hoped may bring him in contact with the flying bands, in an open country, where their destruction will be inevitable.

At present, the army is engaged in reconstructing the stockade work and buildings, at Volusia, to serve as a post and deposite for the army, and it will be ready in a few days to receive the ample supplies of provisions into it from Black Creek.

Gov. Call's health is yet very feeble, but he continues to struggle against his disease, and to sustain himself, in the midst of the most laborious and trying difficulties. He left Fort Drane just after his recovery from a dangerous fever, and soon after had twice to swim the Wythlacochee, and to encamp in the cove without tents, and almost without fire, in cold rainy weather. His spirit and zeal for the service sustain him in a wonderful manner, amidst the greatest sufferings and privations, under an extreme prostration of bodily strength.

From the Jacksonville Courier of the 1st instant.

Nothing further has been heard of the movements of the army. They cannot have reached Volusia yet, as the steamboats, ordered there to await their arrival, have not returned. Should general Jesup have come up on the other side of the Wahoo Swamp with his regulars, they have probably been successful in their engagements with the enemy; otherwise, we fear, this attempt like all others before it, will end only in disgrace.

Last Friday a party of seven men started with five carts to go from Black Creek to Fort Mills. On their way, near New river, they encountered a party of about 60 Indians, who suddenly fired upon them and wounded one man. The men fled and left the horses, carts and their contents in the possession of the enemy. Captain Smith went in search of them next day. His success in pursuit we have been unable to learn, as he had not returned when we last heard from Black Creek. This attack proves the enemy too strong to require all their force to oppose the army. We hope ere long a force will be in the field sufficiently large to restrain these desperate and predatory bands, who are plundering our property and taking the lives of our citizens who have struggled with disease and poverty in daily expectation of relief.

"GENERAL ORDER."

"Head quarters, Volusia, 30th Nov. 1836.

"The commander-in-chief regrets, that ill health, and the numerous duties which have claimed his attention, since the arrival of the army at this place, should have prevented him from returning at an earlier day, his grateful thanks to the whole army under his command, for the gallantry with which it has fought, and the patience and cheerfulness with which it has borne the fatigue and privations of the march.

"The commander-in-chief reflects with pride and pleasure on the good conduct of every corps, and while it was painful to him to be compelled to reduce one half the allowance of rations, both to officers and men, it is now his highest gratification to remember and record to their lasting honor, that it was submitted to without a murmur, throughout the line.

"In a few days you have fought your battles, and gained as many victories. You have won for yourselves honor and the gratitude of your country.—You alone have taught the savage that his swamp and his hammock can afford him no longer a shelter or a hiding place.

"The commander-in-chief believes that it is no fault of yours that a final blow was not given to the enemy, and that a few days supply of rations would have produced this result. He still hopes and believes that it may and will be effected by the army under his command, in another campaign, as short and brilliant as the last.

Brigadier general Walker K. Armistead, of the United States army, having reported himself for duty, will forthwith assume command of the regular forces, the Florida militia and the regiment of Creek volunteers, which will form a separate brigade.

"By order of the commanding general,

"THOS. RANDALL,

"Adjutant and inspector general."

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR AD INTERIM.

Department of war, December 3, 1836.

SIR: In compliance with your directions, I have the honor to lay before you the usual annual reports of the several divisions of this department, and to submit, for your consideration, a summary of the contents of those documents, together with such additional statements and suggestions as seemed to me to be required by the present condition and necessities of the public service.

1. THE ARMY.

1. Organization and force. It appears, from the report of major general Macomb, and the tables annexed to it, that the regular army of the United States consists of 648 commissioned officers, and 7,310 non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers and privates; making an aggregate of 7,958—organized as follows: General staff, 14, viz: one major general commanding; two brigadier generals, each commanding one of the two military districts into which the United States are divided; one adjutant general; two inspectors general; one quartermaster general, and four quartermasters; and one commissary general of subsistence, and two commissaries; pay department, 18, viz: one paymaster general, and seventeen paymasters; medical department, 76, viz: one surgeon general, fifteen surgeons, and sixty assistant surgeons; purchasing department, 3, viz: one commissary general of purchases, and two military storekeepers; corps of engineers, 22; topographical engineers, 10; ordnance department, (including 294 non-commissioned officers and enlisted men): two regiments of dragoons, each containing ten companies of sixty privates each; four regiments of artillery, each containing nine companies of forty-two privates each; and seven regiments of infantry, each containing ten companies of forty-two privates each.

The present actual force of the regular army, according to the last general return, is 6,283; but it also appears from that return, that after making the necessary deductions for sickness and other circumstances, the available force for service in the field, at the latest dates, was 4,282. The difference between the actual force (6,283) and the force allowed by law (7,958) is 1,675, and is occasioned by the fact, that only 360 recruits have yet been obtained for the new regiment of dragoons authorized by the act of the last session, and the by vacancies caused by expiration of service, and other casualties, in the other regiments.

2. Distribution and present positions of the troops. The eastern department, under the command of major general Scott, includes thirty posts, from twenty of which the troops have been mostly withdrawn for service in the Creek country and in Florida. The whole number of officers of the line and men, at the several stations in the eastern department, including absentees, is therefore now only 1,124. Of that number, 118 are at Fort Winnebago; 114 at Fort Brady; 105 at Fort Mackinac; 149 at Fort Howard; 67 at Fort Dearborn; 122 at Fort Gratiot; all which posts are on the north western frontier, or in that vicinity; and the remainder at posts in the Atlantic states.

The western department, under the command of major general Gaines, now includes twenty posts, and four temporary stations. Several of these posts have also been evacuated, and the troops ordered to Florida; so that the whole number of officers of the line and men now stationed at them, including absentees, amounts only to 2,458. Of that number, 233 are at Fort Snelling; 185 at Fort Crawford; 821 at Fort Leavenworth; 132 at Fort Gibson; 158 at Fort Towson; 44 at Fort Coffee; 380 at Fort Jesup, and 124 at a station seventy miles from that place; 147 at Camp Sabine, and 428 at Camp Nacogdoches; all which posts and stations are in the north west, or on or near the western frontier; 186 at Fort Mitchell, Alabama; and 58 at Fort Cass, Tennessee.

The regular force serving in Florida consists of the four regiments of artillery, five companies excepted; eight companies of the fourth regiment of infantry, one company of dragoons, and a battalion of 820 marines; making in the aggregate about 2,000, according to the latest returns received at the adjutant general's office. After deducting the number reported sick, and absentees, the efficient regular force for field service in Florida will not exceed 1,500.

For want of the necessary returns of the volunteers serving in that quarter, the estimate of that auxiliary force at this time is less accurate; but, from the best data in the adjutant general's office, it may be thus computed: Tennessee volunteers about 1,200; Alabama volunteers 300; Florida volunteers 250; and Washington city volunteers 58; amounting in all to about 1,800, besides 780 volunteer Creek Indians, who have been mustered into the service of the United States, and are now employed with the army. The whole active force, then, regular, volunteer, and Indians, now in Florida, is probably somewhat less than 4,000.

Besides the volunteers above mentioned, there are also employed of that description of force, 361 in Tennessee, under the command of brigadier general Wool; 537 in Arkansas, under the command of brigadier general Arbuckle; and 58 in Alabama; making, when added to those serving in Florida, an aggregate of near 2,800.

3. Movements during the last year, and now in progress. At the date of the last annual report from this department, several companies had been placed in Florida under the command of brigadier general Clinch, for the purpose of restraining any hostile intentions on the part of the Seminole Indians, and of enforcing the execution of the treaty providing for their removal. It was then hoped that an open rupture would be prevented; and it was confidently believed that the eleven companies actually in Florida, amounting to 536 officers and men, would be amply sufficient, with the reinforcements then under orders, and with such aid as might be derived from the local militia and volunteers, to put down any hostile attempt which might be made by the disaffected portion of the tribe. Both these expectations were disappointed, and a protracted warfare ensued which has not yet been terminated.

The most important military operations growing out of this state of things are mentioned in the accompanying report of major gen. Macomb, which brings down the narrative of events in Florida to the retirement of the forces under governor Call from the Wythlacoochee in October last. Authentic intelligence of that event reached the department on the 1st ultimo, through the medium of letters received by some of the bureaus, and of officers direct from Florida. By the same channels of information, it was also ascertained that the health of governor Call had been so much impaired by sickness and fatigue, as to make it doubtful whether he could renew the campaign with the promptitude and energy demanded by the crisis. On the 4th ultimo, no report having been received from that officer, and it being necessary that the department should act, without further delay, on the information then in its possession, despatches were sent by express to governor Call and to major general Jesup, expressing to the former the surprise and disappointment of the president at the failure of his movement, and calling for an explanation, and directing the latter to assume the command.—General Jesup was also instructed to establish posts at or near the mouth of the Wythlacoochee, at Fort King, and at Volusia, and, after taking the proper measures for securing through them the safety of the frontier, and for procuring sufficient and regular supplies, to concentrate all his disposable forces, and to proceed without delay to possess himself of the positions occupied by the Indians, and of the whole country between the Wythlacoochee and Tampa bay. Should the war thereafter be continued, he was then directed to take such advanced positions to the south of Volusia, and to the east and south of Tampa bay, as the nature of the country might admit, and to push from them such further operations as might be necessary to the most speedy and effectual subjugation of the enemy.

No acknowledgment of the receipt of the despatches of the 4th of November has yet reached the department; but it is known that governor Call and general Jesup have both been very actively engaged in preparing for offensive movements; and the latest intelligence gives reason to hope that the objects of the campaign will soon be accomplished. But as these expectations may be disappointed, and as the term of service of the Tennessee volunteers, who compose a very important part of the force serving in Florida, will expire on the 1st of January, it has been deemed important to make provision for supplying their places, in part at least, from the regular army. With this view, the commanding officer of the second regiment of dragoons was directed, on the 26th ultimo, to organize the recruits enlisted for that corps into companies, and to hold them in readiness to be moved to Florida on the shortest notice. It is also expected that two additional companies of artillery may be prepared for the like purpose, during the present month. After maturing these arrangements, information was received at the department, that general Jesup had recently called on the governor of Alabama for a battalion, and on the governor of Georgia for a regiment of volunteers, to meet the contingency of a want of force on the discharge of the Tennessee brigade. This call has been approved as a proper precautionary measure; but it is believed that the other troops now in Florida will be sufficient, especially when reinforced as above suggested, for all available purposes, even should the war be continued; and that the services of the volunteers last called for may therefore very soon be dispensed with.

I beg leave to refer to the report of the general-in-chief for a succinct account of the operations rendered necessary by the hostile movements of the Creek Indians. To that account, however, it is but just to add, that the marine corps, at a very alarming juncture, generously volunteered their services to aid in suppressing these hostilities, and were accordingly employed for that purpose. Since the termination of their tour of duty in the Creek country, they have been moved to Florida, where they now compose a most efficient portion of general Jesup's army.

Indications of a mischievous disposition having been exhibited by the Winnebagoes and other tribes in the north west, some movement of the troops in the Upper Mississippi were had in the months of July and August last, which produced the desired effect of awing them into quietness.

The movements of the forces under the personal command of major general Gaines, on the western frontiers of Louisiana and Arkansas, are sufficiently stated in the report of the general-in-chief. Gen. Gaines has recently been relieved of this command by brigadier general Arbuckle, who was instructed, under date of the 10th of October last, to make a full report of the condition of things in that quarter. He was also particularly advised, that under the instructions previously given to general Gaines, that officer was not to advance into the territory claimed by Mexico, and if he should have advanced, was to retire, unless the Indians were actually engaged in hostilities against the United States, or unless he had undoubted evidence that such hostilities were intended, and were actually in preparation within that territory. On the 11th ultimo, a communication was received from the officer in command at Camp Nacogdoches, giving an unfavorable account of the health of the troops at that post, and stating that their continuance there during the winter would make it necessary to construct barracks and quarters for their comfortable accommodation. In consequence of this communication, brigadier general Arbuckle was instructed, under date of the 12th ultimo, to take all necessary measures to restore the health of the troops, and in the event of his deciding to retain possession of Camp Nacogdoches, to provide at that place all needful accommodations. He was also informed, that it was not in the power of the department, with the limited information then in its possession, to give any positive order in regard to the further occupation of the post. The opinion was, however, expressed, that there seemed to be no adequate cause for any longer maintaining a position so unhealthy and inconvenient; and he was instructed, in case he had not already withdrawn the troops, to give the requisite orders for that purpose immediately on the receipt of that communication, unless he should then have in his possession information satisfying him, that the maintenance of the post is essential to the protection of our frontiers, and to the due execution of our treaty stipulations, as explained in the previous instructions to general Gaines and to himself.

In the month of June last, it became necessary to call on the governor of Tennessee, under the act of the last session, for a volunteer force sufficient to put down any hostile attempt on the part of the disaffected Cherokees, and to insure the peaceful execution of the treaty then lately conducted with that tribe. The command of the troops to be raised for this purpose was committed to brigadier general Wool, who immediately repaired to the Cherokee country, and is yet in command there. The force under him amounted, at one time, to about 2,450, but has lately been reduced to 361—a number sufficient, from present appearances, to prevent any difficulty in that quarter. Much praise is due to general Wool, for the promptitude and zeal with which he has devoted himself to the execution of his duties.

The whole number of militia and volunteers mustered into the service of the United States, in the various movements and operations above mentioned, appears, from the rolls received in the office of the adjutant general, to have been about 24,500.—In the case of the Tennessee volunteers mustered by general Wool, a larger number appeared than had been called for, but as they acted in good faith, and under patriotic impulses, and as the commanding general deemed it best to receive them, it seems proper that provision should be made for their pay. Legal provision will also be required for the just settlement of many of the accounts growing out of the employment of militia and volunteers; and for the satisfaction of claims which, though equitable, cannot be allowed by the accounting officers.

In executing the first section of the act of the 28th of May last, "to provide for the payment of expenses incurred and supplies furnished on account of the militia or volunteers received into the service of the U. States for the defence of Florida," it has been decided that this section does not authorize any allowance for horses or other property impressed into the service of the United States, nor for any special damage done to individuals or their property by the troops of the United States or the enemy. Some of these cases ought undoubtedly to be provided for by congress; and perhaps, under the peculiar circumstances which attended them, provision should be made for embracing the whole.

In addition to the movements now in progress, already mentioned, the troops stationed at Fort Dearborn, Chicago, have been ordered to proceed to Fort Howard, and to join the garrison at that post, and 75 recruits are on their way to join the first regiment of dragoons at Fort Gibson. The public property at Fort Dearborn will remain in charge of the late commandant of the post.

4. General staff. The reports of the chiefs of the different staff departments exhibit a perspicuous view of their operations during the past year.

I beg leave to call your attention to the communication of the adjutant general, setting forth the difficulties which have been, and are yet experienced in various branches of the public service, for want of additional staff officers.

The fiscal operations of the quartermaster's and subsistence departments have been unusually heavy, in consequence of the hostilities in which the army has been employed. It is due to these two important arms of the service, that I should state that from the time when adequate means were placed at their disposal by congress, nothing has been omitted on their part to provide the necessary supplies for the troops in the field.

The report of the acting quartermaster general states the progress made, or rather the inability to make progress, in the construction of the roads, and other works with which the department is charged. It also exposes, in a lucid and convincing manner, the utter insufficiency of this branch of the service, as now organized by law, to the execution of the duties committed to it.

The expenditures incurred during the past year in the emigration and subsistence of Indians, will appear in the report of the commissioner of Indian affairs, to whose office that business was transferred by a regulation made on the 1st ult. This change was made from a conviction that the interests of the service would be promoted by bringing all matters belonging to any one branch under the care of the bureau to which they properly belonged. The clerks and messengers allowed by law, have been transferred with the business.

The complaints made in the accompanying papers, as to the want of sufficient strength in the staff departments, appear to me to be well founded.

The present system seems to have been framed upon the principle of concentrating the business of those departments at the seat of government, and of employing therein a very small number of officers commissioned in the staff; the deficiencies being supplied by selections from the lines. This arrangement is very well adapted to a time of profound peace, when officers can be spared from the line without injury to the service; when the positions of the troops are chiefly permanent; and when the changes which occur, are made with so much deliberation as to afford ample time for preparing adequate means of transportation and supply; but when large bodies of troops, whose numbers and movements may be varied by unforeseen contingencies, are to be supplied in the field, and at a great distance from the seat of government, the system is worse than insufficient; it is the parent of expense, confusion and delay. During the time necessarily occupied in the transmission of despatches to, and of instructions from, the war department, the state of things may be so entirely changed as to render the instructions inapplicable; and even if it remain unaltered, the loss of time in military operations is always a great evil, and sometimes a fatal one. To prevent inconveniences of this sort, it is evidently necessary that staff officers of experience and rank should be associated with the commander; and to supply such associates, the staff departments must be enlarged. On the other hand, to make the line of the army truly effective, officers should not be taken for staff service, or other detached duties, in large numbers, nor for long periods, from their companies. And when, to relieve the weakness of the staff, on a pressing emergency, officers are selected from the line, the difficulty, instead of being remedied, is only exchanged for a new, and possibly a greater one. The embarrassments occasioned by these causes, during the operations of the year, have been of constant recurrence, and of the most serious character.

5. Pay department. So far as the regular army is concerned, there is nothing in the report of the paymaster general demanding particular remark.—

His suggestions, in regard to the services and responsibilities of the paymasters who have been, or may be, employed in making payments to militia and volunteers, undoubtedly demand the attention of congress. In order to a clear understanding of this subject, it should be observed, that after the reduction of the army on the conclusion of the late war, and until the act of July 14th, 1832, the secretary of war appears, in several instances, to have exercised the power of making discretionary allowances to paymasters of the army of the United States, for the risks and losses sustained by them in making payments to militia and volunteers. These allowances were made in the shape of commissions on the money paid, and were usually fixed at two and a half per cent. The only ground on which such a power could have been exercised, was the absence of any legislative provision making it a part of the regular duty of the army paymasters to make payments to militia and volunteers. But by the third section of the act of the 14th July, 1832, it was made the duty of the district paymasters of the army of the United States, "in addition to the payments required to be made by them to the regular troops, to make payment to all other troops in the service of the United States whenever required thereto by order of the president." The discretionary power before possessed by the secretary of war to make an extra allowance for payments to the militia and volunteers, was, as I suppose, taken away by this provision; and it was doubtless in consequence of this change, that the second section of the act of the 2d of March, 1833, expressly provided, "that the secretary of war be authorized, at his discretion, out of the moneys appropriated by this or any former act, for the payment of the militia ordered into the service of the United States according to law, during the last year, to allow and pay to the district paymasters of the army of the United States, employed in making such payments, a commission on the sums respectively paid by them, not exceeding one per centum upon the amounts."

The act of the 14th of January, 1836, making appropriations for the suppression of hostilities commenced by the Seminole Indians, provides "that the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand dollars be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense attending the suppression of hostilities with the Seminole Indians in Florida; to be expended under the direction of the secretary of war, conformably to the provisions of the act of April 5th, 1832, 'making appropriations for the support of the army;'" and the same reference is in effect made in the subsequent acts.—When the act of the 5th of April, 1832, thus referred to, was passed, the discretionary power spoken of above, was possessed by the secretary of war, and was exercised in the settlement of the paymasters' accounts under that act, by the allowance of a commission of two and a half per cent. In a case of peculiar hardship, and of just merit also, which occurred before the resignation of the late secretary of war, the paymaster general, under the impression that the general reference to the act of the 5th of April, 1832, contained in the acts of the last session, included authority to allow a per centage, recommended such an allowance to the extent of one per cent. The secretary of war referred the case to me as attorney general, and called for my opinion as to the power of the department to allow the proposed commission. My opinion was, that the discretionary power was taken away by the act of 1832, above quoted, and also by the act of the 3d of March, 1835, making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater and other works, and that the intent to confer such a power was not sufficiently apparent in the general reference to the act of 1832, to authorize the allowance applied for. But as it would seem, from the report of the paymaster general, that justice requires that additional compensation should be allowed, I concur in recommending a special provision, similar to that inserted in the act of the 2d of March, 1833.

6. Medical department. The number of cases treated by the officers of the medical department, during the year ending the 30th of September last, was 14,856; of which number only 189 died. This result may well be taken as evidence of the professional skill of the surgeons and assistant surgeons, and of the care with which their duties are performed. For other matters respecting this department, I beg leave to refer to the report of the surgeon general ad interim. His suggestions in regard to the pay of hospital stewards, and the repairing and erection of hospitals at the different military posts, appear to me to be worthy the attention of congress.

7. Purchasing department. The report of the commissary general of purchases exhibits the several amounts drawn and disbursed for clothing, camp equipage, &c. during the present year, with estimates for the like service for the year 1837.

8. Engineers and topographical engineers. The reports of the chief engineer, and of the head of the topographical bureau, exhibit the progress made during the last year upon the fortifications and other works under their care.

The failure, during the session of 1834-5, of the bill containing the usual appropriations for fortifications, occasioned a suspension of those works during the year 1835; and though liberal appropriations for resuming them were made at the last session of congress, yet it unfortunately happened, that the season for active operations was too far advanced at the time of the passing of the appropriation laws, to allow of much progress during the present year. Operations have been also retarded by the difficulty of procuring laborers, and still more by the insufficiency of the engineer department to furnish an adequate number of engineers to superintend the constructions. Several important works, authorized at the last session have not even been commenced, and but little has been done towards the completion of those previously undertaken. The like remarks are applicable to the various improvements in harbors on the seaboard and lakes, and at the mouths and in the channels of navigable rivers.

From the causes above stated, but a small portion of the sums appropriated by the present congress for the engineer and topographical service has yet been expended. The balances of those appropriations may, however, be expended without any further law; and measures will be taken for resuming operations at an early day, and with all practicable vigor.

In the last annual report of the secretary of war, he stated the insufficiency of the corps of engineers, and of the topographical corps, to the expeditious and economical performance of the duties committed to them, and recommended their increase. His suggestions on this subject were approved by you, and the attention of congress was invited to them in your message. The propriety of such a measure is greatly strengthened by the present condition of those branches of the service, and by the delays and embarrassments occasioned by a want of the necessary force. In connection with the proposed reorganization of the topographical corps, it may well be questioned, whether the existing arrangement as to the civil engineers attached to that corps, and the practice of lending the topographical engineers to the states, and to incorporated companies, ought longer to be continued. In my judgment, it would be better that all the engineers in the service of the United States should belong to one or other of the organized military corps. And the information derived from the services of engineers when employed by the states, or by companies, though useful in a military point of view, does not seem to me sufficiently important to counterbalance the inconveniences and objections incident to the practice.

9. Ordnance department. It appears from the report of the colonel of ordnance, that $857,570 45 have been expended and accounted for during the first three quarters of the present year, being about $207,000 more than was expended in the same service during the corresponding quarters of the year 1835. These moneys have been expended in the manufacture, repair and purchase of ordnance, ordnance stores, small arms and accoutrements, and in building materials, the details of all which will appear by the statements annexed to colonel Bomford's report.

During the year ending on the 30th of September, 1835, the sum of $220,813 88 was expended in procuring and distributing artillery, small arms, accoutrements, &c. under the act of 1806, for arming and equipping the militia of the states and territories.

The munitions of war issued during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1836, have been very large, in consequence of the actual hostilities in which the army has been engaged.

No returns of lead made at the United States lead mines have been delivered to the superintendent during the last year, and there yet remains due to the United States, on account of rent-lead which accrued prior to the 30th September, 1835, an aggregate of 498,813 pounds. It appears that the refusal to account for and to pay over the rent reserved in the leases, mentioned in the last annual report, has become general, the lessees denying the validity of the laws under which the leases were made, and that suits have been commenced against several of the delinquents, but are not yet determined. Colonel Bomford recommends the selling of the mineral lands, as the most effectual mode of terminating difficulties now existing between the government and the inhabitants, and of securing to the United States the value of the mines.

Of the works authorized by acts passed at the last session of congress, and belonging to the ordnance department, all have been greatly delayed, and some entirely suspended, by the want of the necessary officers to conduct them. The interests of the service, as well as the just claims of contractors, whose contracts are frequently delayed from inability to make the proper inspections, call loudly for an increase of this corps.

10. Proposed increase in rank and file of artillery and infantry. In compliance with the suggestion of general Macomb, and with my own convictions of duty, I beg leave to invite your attention to a proposal for the increase of the rank and file of the artillery and infantry.

The insufficiency, in several respects, of our present military establishment has already been noticed. It is greatest in the general staff and the rank and file; those arms of the service being much less numerous, in proportion, than the officers retained in the line of the army. The object of congress in this arrangement evidently was, on the one hand, to reduce the rank and file and the general staff to the lowest allowable point; and, on the other, to retain in the line officers enough to preserve an amount of military knowledge and experience competent to the direction of a large effective force, whenever such a force might be required by special emergencies, or by the permanent interests of the country. This policy was recommended at the time of its adoption (1821) by the existence of other and more pressing claims upon the treasury, and by the comparatively few calls then made for active military operations. In both these respects our condition is now widely different. The extinction of the public debt, whilst it gives us the ability to attend to other subjects of national importance, lays us under new obligations to do so.—We have a much larger number of fortifications and other posts to be garrisoned; and our Indian relations have now reached a point which demands an effective military provision.

There are thirty-two forts on the Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico, each of which ought to be garrisoned by a force adequate at least to the preservation of the public property, and to the retaining of some knowledge of artillery practice.—This will require, as I understand, an average of about ninety-six men to each post, or about three thousand in the whole. The rank and file of the present regular army, supposing the new regiment of dragoons to be filled, amounts in the total to seven thousand and sixteen; from which number a large deduction must always be made for sickness, arrests, occasional absence and time lost in recruiting and marching. The effective force, exclusive of officers, which may be relied on, under the present arrangement, can, therefore, scarcely ever exceed six thousand men; a force utterly inadequate to the necessities of the public service, inasmuch as it affords, after the scanty provision for the seaboard, above suggested, only about three thousand for the interior.

In that part of his report which relates to Indian affairs, I shall have occasion to specify some of the weighty reasons which make it necessary that we should establish additional posts on our western borders and in the Indian country, and that each should be permanently garrisoned by a respectable force. We have now in that region sixteen posts, including three temporary stations, the whole of which are now occupied by about three thousand men, including a regiment of Arkansas volunteers recently called into service. All, probably, will agree that the present force at several of the existing posts is inadequate, and a deliberate survey of all the immense field of operations, and the various interests involved, will, I think, lead to the conclusion that this branch of the service cannot safely be left, for the next five or ten years, with a force at any time less than from five to seven thousand men.

The seaboard may be provided for in the manner above suggested, and adequate protection may be given to the interior and to the Indian country, by augmenting the number of men in each company of artillery and infantry to one hundred. This would increase the legal force, independently of commissioned officers and non-commissioned officers of artillery and infantry, to twelve thousand and thirty, from which we might at all times expect to command an available force of not more than about ten thousand effective men. Two plans for a similar increase in the rank and file of the army were submitted to congress in the report of the secretary of war of the 8th of March, 1836, and the accompanying communication of general Macomb, of the 7th of that month, both of which communications were laid before the senate of the United States in compliance with a resolution of that body. I refer to these documents for the details of those plans, and for an estimate of the expense, which, according to the statement then made, would be, for the increase above proposed, about $850,000 per annum. Such an addition to the heavy expenses of our present establishment should undoubtedly be well weighed before it is incurred; but if we may judge from the experience of the last few years, the measure is as plainly called for on the score of economy as it is by other and more impressive considerations. The expenses occasioned by the hostile aggressions of the Sac and Fox Indians in 1832 amounted to more than $3,000,000; and the several appropriations for suppressing Indian hostilities, made by congress at the last session, and amounting to $5,000,000, have already been drawn from the treasury; and though a considerable amount is yet in the hands of disbursing officers, the whole will be required to meet expenses already incurred.

If it be one of the first objects of legislation to guard against the evils of war, then must it be admitted that the prevention of Indian hostilities, so far as human foresight is competent to that end, should be the great care of the congress of the United States. For, whilst our exposure to such hostilities is imminent, the evils which attend them are so peculiar and unmitigated as to bring on those public agents who may neglect to guard against them the most fearful responsibility. The presence of an adequate military force at or near each of the points where the Indians are numerous, is the most effectual, if not the only effectual means of security and defence. In my judgment such a force cannot be furnished by our present establishment; and as neither militia nor volunteers can be employed for permanent garrisons, the object can only be effected by the increase of the regular army. I trust it will be provided for without delay.

11. Proposed revision of the pay of certain officers. My attention having been called, by repeated resignations and other circumstances, to the pay of the subordinate grades, I have looked into the subject with some care, and the result is a decided conviction that the pay of the several grades above that of second lieutenant, and below that of colonel, ought to be increased; and that a new principle of periodical increase in each grade ought also to be introduced.

By the law, as it now stands, there is no increase of the fixed pay and emoluments, except when the officer is promoted; and, as promotion in time of peace is generally very slow, officers may serve over ten years in a single grade, and, after a service of twenty or thirty years, may still rise no higher than a majority, or even a captaincy. On the other hand, it will occasionally happen that resignations, or other casualties, may produce numerous vacancies, within a comparatively short period, in particular regiments, which may lead to rapid promotions, so that a second lieutenant may, within three or four years after entering the service, be advanced to a captaincy. To remedy the inadequacy of the present system, when promotion is slow, and to prevent its inequality, when its movement in particular regiments is rapid, it has occurred to me that it would be expedient and just to introduce the additional feature of increasing the pay after five years' service in any one grade, agreeably to the precedents established by the act of 1834, in relation to surgeons and assistant surgeons of the army, and by the act of 1835, regulating the pay of surgeons in the navy.

Concurrently with the introduction of this principle, I would also revise the scale of pay and emoluments, with a view to a moderate increase of the different grades above that of second lieutenant and under that of colonel. I think it would be just to allow to second lieutenants, for the first years from the dates of their commissions, the present pay and emoluments of their grade; and to those who have been in commission over five years, the present pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant; to first lieutenants for the first five years the present pay and emoluments of a captain; and to those who have been commissioned over five years, a corresponding increase; and, in like manner, to provide for an increase in the pay of those captains, majors and lieutenant colonels, who shall have been in commission over five years, taking care, however, that the increase, by means of five years' service in one grade, shall not be more than one-half the difference between the first pay of such grade and the first pay of the next grade. The effect of this double arrangement for increase of compensation would be to secure to the officer the certainty of an increase of pay, at periodical stages, corresponding to the probable increase in his wants, and in the value of his services. But it would not interfere with the ancient and just practice of increasing the pay of the officer on his advancement to a higher grade. When promotions are slow, the principle is greatly needed, and then it would apply; when they are rapid, it would not be needed, and would not take place.

As the pay, emoluments and allowances now given by law depend on the grade of the officer, the corps to which he belongs, and his particular position and circumstances, the attempt to state them in this place would lead to inconvenient prolixity; and should you think proper to submit the subject to congress, the proper information can be laid before the committees of that body. It is, however, deserving of consideration whether the principle adopted in the act of 1835, regulating the pay of the navy, by which all allowances, (except for travelling expenses when under orders), are prohibited, and a gross sum in lieu thereof added to the pay, may not, to some extent at least, be advantageously followed. The whole subject undoubtedly demands revision, especially with a view to retain in the departments of engineering, and other branches requiring scientific attainments of a high order, experienced and valuable officers. Several of that class have retired from the army during the year, induced, as I have reason to suppose, by the inadequacy of the existing compensation, and the great demand for their services in civil life.

12. Proposed increase of the pay of privates—land bounty on re-enlistments. I think it highly expedient that the pay of privates should also be increased. They are now allowed, when serving as cavalry in the regiment of dragoons, eight dollars per month; in all other cases six dollars per month. No bounty is given except on a second enlistment, which is encouraged by a gratuity of two months' pay. In consequence of the great increase in the price of labor, it has been found difficult, during the last year, to procure able bodied men to supply the places of those soldiers whose term of service had expired; and the recruiting of the second regiment of dragoons, and to fill up vacancies in the other regiments, goes on very slowly. I submit whether it be not advisable to increase the regular pay; and as the services of an experienced and disciplined soldier are far more valuable than those of a new recruit, I cannot doubt the propriety of increasing the bounty on re-enlistment. It might be granted in land at less inconvenience to the government than if paid in money, and would probably be equally acceptable to the soldier. And as the service of the army, for some years to come, will be chiefly on our western frontiers, most of the men, when discharged in that region, would probably find it for their interest to become actual settlers. The policy of the government, in regard to the disposition of the public lands, would thus be promoted; and the settlers, whom this arrangement would plant on the frontiers, would be found, from their military knowledge, among the most useful of their class. These objects might be still further promoted by giving an increased quantity of land on the condition of actual settlement.

13. Proposal for the employment of chaplains.—Some provision, as it appears to me, should be made for securing to the army the services of chaplains. The act of April 12, 1808, required one chaplain, with the pay and emoluments of a major of infantry, to be appointed to each brigade. This provision was continued in force until superseded by the act of the 3d of March, 1815, fixing the military peace establishment; and there is now no authority for employing such an officer in the army at the public expense, except at the military academy.

The constitution of the United States has wisely provided that congress "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" but this cannot lessen the obligation of congress to furnish to the officers and men employed in the military service such opportunities of religious worship and of moral culture as may be compatible with the appropriate duties of the army. And when it is considered that even the common soldier resumes, sooner or later, the character of a citizen, how important does it become that he should be shielded as much as possible from the pernicious influences to which a military life is usually exposed? The enlightening and tranquillizing effects of a regular attendance on public worship, and the aid which a judicious and devoted chaplain may give, in the promotion of discipline and subordination, ought not to be overlooked in the organization of an army.

Since 1815, the services of the chaplains at the fixed posts have frequently been secured by voluntary contributions, collected and applied, as I understand, by the council of administration. As the officers composing that council will be enabled to consult the wishes of the garrison, and are, in other respects, better qualified to make judicious selections for services of this nature than the authorities at the seat of government, I recommend the passage of a law authorising them to select and employ chaplains from time to time, and giving to the persons so employed the pay and emoluments of such grade as congress may think proper to prescribe. To each regiment, when employed in the field, the like arrangement might be extended.

14. General condition of the army, &c. The vacancies in the rank and file being numerous, and many officers of the line being engaged on detached service, or absent with leave, or on furlough, the army, though in a high state of discipline, has not been found in the fittest condition for active field service. And notwithstanding the successive orders which have been issued, directing officers to join their regiments, the deficiency in officers has not yet been supplied—many having resigned, and others being so situated, by reason of sickness, or other causes, as to make a suspension of the orders, in respect to them, unavoidable. These circumstances, however, only enhance the merits of the officers and men, whether regulars, marines, militia, or volunteers, who have encountered the difficulties, privations and perils of field service on the western frontier, and in the south. Several instances have occurred, during the war with the Seminoles, in which our troops have nobly sustained the honor of the American name; and those who will dispassionately consider the events of the past year will find, in the services of the army, many strong claims on the confidence and gratitude of the nation.

The general-in-chief has noticed in his report, and in appropriate terms, the gallantry and good conduct of brigadier general Clinch, who commanded in Florida on the breaking out of hostilities in that quarter. The merits of that officer were so highly appreciated by this department, that his resignation was not accepted until it had been ascertained to have been rendered necessary by important private affairs. In consequence, doubtless, of pending inquiries, gen. Macomb's report intimates no opinion as to the conduct or operations of any other general officer in Florida, or in the Creek country. This forbearance was manifestly proper, as will be intimated by the department. But it is not inconsistent with the rule thus adopted, to express the hope that it may ultimately appear that nothing has occurred to justify permanent estrangement between soldiers who trod together the path of renown, nor to dim the lustre of those honorable services which each has rendered to his country.

II. MILITIA AND VOLUNTEERS.

It has already been stated that, within the last year, no less than about 24,500 militia and volunteers have been mustered into the service of the United States. As these forces, when in actual service, form a part of the army of the United States, such particulars concerning those employed during the year, as seemed proper to be noticed in this report, have been presented under the preceding head.

The defective organization of the militia was noticed at length in the last annual report of the secretary of war: and the outlines were suggested of a plan for its improvement, which received your sanction, and was submitted to congress in the opening message of the last session. No legislative action having been had on the subject, I deem it my duty to invite to it your renewed attention. If any arguments, in addition to those heretofore urged, were needed on this point, they would be found in the experience of the last year. Whilst the calls on the militia have been answered in a manner highly honorable to their patriotism, they have led to new illustrations of their deficiencies in organization and discipline. The matter has very often been presented to the consideration of congress; and, until the constitutional power of organizing, arming and disciplining this arm of the national defence shall have been more adequately exercised, it will continue to be a duty to invoke their enlightened interposition.

III. FORTIFICATIONS, ARSENALS, ROADS, &c.

The present condition of our fortifications, arsenals and other works of public defence, will sufficiently appear by reference to the accompanying documents from the engineer and ordnance departments; and the elaborate and very able report of the secretary of war of the 7th of April last, transmitted to the senate with your message of the following day, contains so full a view of the measures proper to be taken for their completion and armament, as to make any further observations on that point superfluous in this place. I would, however, particularly invite your attention, and also that of congress, to the proposal contained in that paper, and in the last annual report, for the establishment of a national foundry for cannon, and to the suggestions on the subject of depots for arms, then also submitted.

The reports of the chief engineer and of the head of the topographical bureau must also be referred to for a succinct account of the present condition of the Cumberland and other roads, and of the harbors and other improvements authorised by law.

IV. MILITARY ACADEMY AT WEST POINT.

The report of the board of visitors, giving the results of the last annual examination, is well calculated to confirm the favorable opinion so generally entertained in respect to this institution. It also states some facts which, it may be hoped, will remove some of those misapprehensions which have occasionally prevailed to the prejudice of that establishment.

By the existing law, each cadet, on his appointment, is required to sign articles, by which he engages to serve five years, unless sooner discharged. As four years of this term, by the regulations in force since 1819, are to be spent at the academy, the engagement secures to the United States only one year's service after graduation. It appears, however, from the report of the visitors, that out of 841 graduates, the total number from the commencement of the institution, only sixty-five had resigned at the end of their term of enlistment.—The visitors also ascertained that, out of the same number, 403 still remained in the army; and that, of the others, fifteen had been killed in battle, and 106 had otherwise died in service. These facts illustrate the value of the institution as one of the effective means of providing for the national defence.

Whilst it thus appears that the public service has not been materially prejudiced by the early resignation of the graduates, I am yet inclined to think that its interests should be more effectually secured. In my judgment, the engagement for service after graduation should be considerably prolonged; and the graduate should be made liable by law, in case of his discharge after graduation and short of the prescribed term, for neglect of duty or other misconduct, to pay to the government an equivalent for the expenses incurred in his education and support. Such a provision would not only be just in itself, but seems due to other considerations. As there is no constitutional authority to maintain the institution, except as a part of the military establishment necessary to the defence of the country, it should be so regulated as to contribute directly to that end. Such, also, seems to have been the design of the act of 1812, in prescribing the articles above referred to. There was at that time no prescribed term of study; and, as the position of the cadet, on his entrance, was regulated by the extent of its attainments, he might, and, as I understand, usually did, complete his course in about two years. It was, therefore, intended by the framers of the act of 1812, that a term of army service should be secured, equivalent, in some measure, to the expense incurred by the government. I recommend the reassertion of this principle in a new enactment, adopted to the changes since made in the term of study.

The board of visitors having submitted various propositions for the enlargement of the public buildings, and of the courses of instruction, I have deemed it due to the subject as well as to the high character of the board, to present their suggestions to your consideration and to that of congress.—They are accordingly embraced in the estimates made by the chief engineer, with a single exception, which could not be submitted in that form. The recommendation thus excepted relates to the duties of the chaplain. By the second section of the act of the 14th of April, 1818, it is provided that there shall be one chaplain stationed at the military academy at West Point, who shall also be professor of geography, history and ethics. To assist the chaplain in the duties of his professorship, an officer of the army has been associated with him, and the two instruct in the branches above named, and also in grammar and rhetoric, and in the elements of political science, including the law of nations and the constitutional law of the United States. It has been found physically impossible for the chaplain to give adequate attention to his clerical duties, and, with the aid of one assistant, to instruct in a suitable manner in the various studies above named. The consequence is, that the religious instruction of the cadets receives less attention than is commensurate with its importance, and with the probable intent of the act of congress. The visitors, therefore, recommend, and the suggestion strikes me as important, either that the functions of the chaplain be separated from those of the professor, or that another assistant be provided to aid him in the professorship. The latter mode of relief may be extended by executive regulation; but the former is deemed most appropriate, and for that reason the interposition of congress is solicited.

V. INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The report of the commissioner of Indian affairs, herewith laid before you, embraces a detailed account of the operations of his office during the past year.

It appears from that document that, within this period, more than 18,000 Indians, of whom 400 were Seminoles, 16,900 Creeks, and the remainder Pottawatomies, have reached the west bank of the Mississippi, on their way to their new homes; and that arrangements have been made for the removal of the residue of those tribes as early as day as circumstances shall allow. The mere process of removal has been conducted with greater expedition, as much economy, and as little of suffering and privation to the Indians as in former years; but the opposition made by the hostile portions of the Seminoles and Creeks, already noticed under a former head, has subjected the government, in those cases, to the painful necessity of resorting to coercive measures, which, in respect to the Seminoles, are yet continued.

The same report also exhibits the progress made by the commissioners appointed in pursuance of the resolution of the house of representatives of the 1st of July, 1836, requesting the president of the United States "to cause measures to be taken for investigating certain alleged frauds in the purchase of the reservations of the Creek Indians, and the causes of their hostilities." The investigations, thus directed, have necessarily suspended the action of the executive on many contracts for the sale of Creek reservations, and there are also other difficulties in respect to them which will probably require the intervention of congress.

A commissioner has recently been appointed to certify contracts and to take proof of residence, under the treaty with the Choctaws of the 27th of September, 1830, and has probably entered on the duties assigned him.

The provisions of the treaties of 1832 and 1834 with the Chickasaws, which are to be carried into effect before their removal, have been nearly completed; and an arrangement, it is hoped, will soon be concluded between them and the Choctaws west of the Mississippi for a portion of the territory assigned to the latter.

Measures have been taken for fulfilling the engagements of the United States contained in the treaties with the Chippewas and Ottawas, the Swan-creek and Black-river bands of the Chippewas, and the Wyandots, ratified at the last session of the senate; and, so far as allowed by the short time which has since elapsed, those engagements have been faithfully executed.

Immediately after the ratification of the treaty with the Cherokees east of the Mississippi, the initiatory measures for carrying it into effect were taken by the department; and though much retarded by various unforeseen occurrences, they are now going on with all the despatch of which the case is susceptible. The military movements deemed necessary to the maintenance of peace, and to the enforcement of the treaty, have already been noticed. Efforts have recently been made by Mr. John Ross, and by those of his people of whom he is understood to be the leader, to excite opposition to the treaty, and to prevent its execution; but it is believed that the steps taken by the government will be sufficient to counteract those efforts. The more intelligent part of the Cherokees are well satisfied with the treaty, and the prompt and faithful execution, on our part, of its very liberal provisions, will doubtless secure the good-will of the great mass of the nation, and issue in their peaceful establishment with their brethren in the west.

Treaties have been made with the Indians who have emigrated from New York to Green Bay, for lands on both sides of Fox river; and with four bands of Pottawatomies residing in the state of Indiana, for the extinguishment of their title to the sections of land reserved for them in the treaties of October, 1832. Negotiations have also been commenced with the Indians of New York, for the extinguishment of their title to lands in that state, and for their removal to the west of the Mississippi.—With a view to the extinguishment of the Indian title to the country between the state of Missouri and the Missouri river, negotiations were opened with the tribes interested therein for the relinquishment of their rights; and treaties to that effect have already been concluded with the Ioways and Sacs of Missouri, Omahas, Yancton and Santie Sioux, and Ottos and Missourias. Measures have also been taken for opening negotiations with the united nation of Ottawas, Chippewas and Pottawatomies, for an exchange of the lands north of the Missourias river, signed to them by the treaty of Chicago of 1833, for lands south of that river; and with the Miamies, for a cession of their lands in Indiana.

The commissioner points out several defects in the laws relative to Indian affairs, and, for the purpose of remedying those defects, submits various propositions, to which I beg leave to call your attention, as worthy of being presented to the consideration of congress. He also recommends the removal of the seat of the superintendency of Indian affairs from St. Louis, where it is now fixed by law, to Fort Leavenworth, or some other point on the Missouri river; and the substitution of full agencies for the present sub-agencies of the Creeks, Cherokees and Osages, as measures rendered necessary by the onerous nature of the duties now pressing on the incumbents of those offices, and by the great accessions recently made, and hereafter to be made, to the tribes west of the Mississippi.

From the facts stated by the commissioner, it would seem that the proviso to the act of the 3d of March, 1835, making appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, &c. operates harshly on the military officers in the Indian department. I concur in the propriety of asking from congress, as an act of justice to those officers, the allowance of a commission on disbursements, as recommended by the commissioner.

Connected with the general subject of our Indian relations are two measures, proposed by the commissioner, which I deem of great moment. They are, the organization of an efficient system for the protection and government of the Indian country west of the Mississippi, and the establishment of military posts for the protection of that country and of our own frontiers, in addition to those now authorized by law.

These measures are due to the numerous tribes whom we have planted in this extensive territory, and to the pledges and encouragements by which they were induced to consent to a change of residence. We may now be said to have consummated the policy of emigration, and to have entered on an era full of interest to both parties. It involves the last hopes of humanity in respect to the Indian tribes; and though, to the United States, its issues cannot be equally momentous, they yet deeply concern our prosperity and honor. It therefore behooves us, at this juncture, seriously to examine the relations which exist between the United States and the inhabitants of the Indian country, to look into the duties which devolve on us, and to mature a system of measures for their just and constant execution.

In almost every treaty providing for the emigration of an Indian tribe, the impossibility of preserving it from extinction, if left within the limits of any of the states, or organized territories of the U. States, and thus exposed to the advances of the white population, is expressly recognized. The advantages which the tribe will derive from its establishment in a territory to be exclusively occupied by red men, under the solemn guaranties and the paternal care of the United States, are uniformly insisted on. In the treaty with the Choctaws of the 27th of September, 1830, the wish of the tribes to be allowed the privilege of a delegate in the house of representatives of the United States is expressly mentioned; and, though not acceded to by the commissioners of the United States, yet they insert it in the treaty, "that congress may consider of and decide the application."

In the late treaty with the Cherokees east of the Mississippi, it is expressly stipulated "that they shall be entitled to a delegate in the house of representatives, whenever congress shall make provision for the same." It is not to be doubted that the hopes thus held out to these tribes had an important influence in determining them to consent to emigrate to their new homes in the west.

Although some of the Indians have made considerable advances in civilization, they all need the guardianship of the United States. To leave them to the barbarism of their own institutions, with the inadequate assistance of an agent, and the slight control of the general superintendent, would be imprudent as it regards ourselves, and unjust towards them. Under such a system, hostilities will frequently break out between the different tribes, and sometimes between them and the inhabitants of our frontiers, attended, in both cases, by the usual consequences of savage warfare. To fulfil in their true spirit the engagements into which we have entered, we must institute a comprehensive system of guardianship, adapted to the circumstances and wants of the people, and calculated to lead them, gradually and safely, to the exercise of self-government. And, at as early a day as circumstances will allow, the expectations authorised by the passage above quoted from the treaties with the Choctaws and Cherokees should be fulfilled. Indeed, from the facts stated by the commissioner, it is scarcely to be doubted that the Choctaws are already in a condition to justify the measure. The daily presence of a native delegate on the floor of the house of representatives of the United States, presenting, as occasion may require, to that dignified assembly, the interests of his people, would, more than any other single act, attest to the world and to the Indian tribes the sincerity of our endeavors for their preservation and happiness. In the successful issue of these endeavors we shall find a more precious and durable accession to the glory of our country, than by any triumph we can achieve in arts or arms.

The duty of planting a line of posts near the borders of the Indian country, and of opening along it a free communication for the passage of troops, has already been recognized by the present congress, by the act of the 2d of July, 1836, "to provide for the better protection of the western frontier." This law authorizes the president to cause to be opened a military road from some point upon the right bank of the Mississippi river, between the mouth of the St. Peter's and the mouth of the Des Moines, to Red river; and it contemplates the establishment of "military posts" at such places along said road as the president may think proper, "for the protection of the frontier, and for the preservation of the necessary communication." But this line of posts, though it will probably be sufficient, if well garrisoned, to protect our own frontier, will not be all that caution and good faith will require. To exercise the necessary supervision over the emigrated Indians, to preserve peace among the different tribes, and to protect them from their savage neighbors, we must also establish posts at convenient positions in the interior of their country.

The establishment and maintenance of these various posts is due to the emigrated tribes, for other reasons. By the most sacred pledges, the territory in which we have planted them is to be perpetually theirs; the white man, with certain specified exceptions, is not to reside among them. The pledges have been given in the utmost sincerity, and the American people cannot but desire that they should be honorably redeemed. Without a strong military force—a force adequate to repress the encroachments of the civilized and more powerful race, how can we hope for their fulfilment? In the history of the Indian tribes, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, and, indeed, in the history of barbarians in every quarter of the globe, when pressed upon by a civilized population, we may read the issue of these pledges, unless we take early and efficient measures for their fulfilment. The measures must be such as will arrest the causes which, in all other cases, have ended in the extinction of the weaker race. The operation of those causes cannot be controlled by parchment guaranties, or mere moral considerations; to resist and counteract them, a physical force must be employed, sufficiently powerful and vigilant to keep them constantly in check. To my view, nothing is clearer than the ultimate failure of the great experiment we have commenced with the emigrated Indians, unless we secure to them, by military protection, the place and the time for the fair trial of that experiment. If we leave them unprotected, they will fade away as other tribes have faded; and the process, as in their cases, will be diversified by the same sanguinary events. The only difference will be, that, as the Indians on our western frontiers are concentrated in greater force than has ever before been known in the history of the race, their inroads, if not more frequent, will probably be more terrible and disastrous than any which have yet occurred.

When it is considered that the emigration of the present year includes great numbers recently engaged in open hostilities, and that, besides these, there are probably many others who cherish unfriendly feelings, though never manifested in overt acts, is it unreasonable to suppose they will seize the first favorable opportunity to gratify the strongest of savage passions, and to re-enact the scenes which have been so recently exhibited in the south? From them, and from the events yet passing before us, we may learn how much of individual suffering and of national calamity may be occasioned by even a small Indian force, organized by stealth, and acting with characteristic quickness and ferocity. If those events shall only teach us to provide, by wise forecast, against the repetition of similar disasters, they will not have been without their use. It is to guard against the recurrence of any such event, as well as to fulfil our plighted faith to the tribes now settled in the west, that I have felt it my duty to enforce, at such length, the views presented by the commissioner.

VII. PENSIONS, &c.

The sums paid to pension agents for disbursements during the current year amount to two million six hundred and ninety-nine thousand, four hundred and thirty dollars and sixty-six cents, viz:

 For paying invalid pensioners $276,450 00
 For paying revolutionary pensioners, under the act of March, 18th, 1818 675,113 66
 For paying pensioners, under the act of June 7th, 1832, including payments made in one hundred and thirty-five cases, allowed under the act of July 4th, 1836 1,563,376 00
 For paying pensioners, under the act of May 15th, 1828 137,320 00
 For paying claims, under the act of July 5th, 1832, granting half-pay to the officers of the Virginia state troops 47,172 00
 $2,699,430 66

The particulars of which will appear by the report of the commissioner of pensions and the accompanying tables.

Under the act of the 4th of July last, granting half-pay to widows and orphans in certain cases, four hundred and thirty-six claims have been presented, of which one hundred and thirty-five have been admitted, and twenty-two rejected. The remainder have not yet received official decision.—The payments already made under this act have been from the standing appropriation made by the act of June 7th, 1832; but it would seem to be more appropriate that they should be specially provided for, and an estimate for that purpose will accordingly be submitted.

It is observed by general Macomb, and also by the commissioner of pensions, in their reports, that the existing pension laws do not extend to the widows and orphans of officers and soldiers of the regular army all the benefits now enjoyed by the widows of officers and soldiers in other branches of the service. This arises from the circumstance that the first section of the act of the 4th of July last is expressly confined to the widows and orphans of persons who served as militia or volunteers. I concur in the suggestion that this difference ought to be removed. The third section of this law has been construed to apply to those widows only whose husbands died before its passage. As this construction, though demand'd by the words employed, makes a distinction in the operation of the law which may not have been designed, it is perhaps worthy of being submitted to the attention of congress.

It appears from the accompanying report of the operations of the bounty land office, that eight hundred and seventy-six claims for services rendered in the revolutionary war, and six hundred and ninety-two for services rendered during the last war, were presented during the year ending the 30th of September last; and that of the former, forty, and of the latter and similar claims previously presented and suspended, one hundred and twenty-eight were allowed.

VII. FISCAL CONCERNS OF THE DEPARTMENT.

To exhibit, at one view, a summary of the various fiscal operations of this department during the year 1836, I have caused to be prepared the tabular statement, marked A, hereunto annexed, to which I beg leave respectfully to refer.

It appears from that document, that, on the 1st day of January, 1836, the various sums then under the control of the department, as unexpended balances of former appropriations, or by virtue of the standing appropriations made by the revolutionary pension and claims acts of May 15, 1828, June 7, 1832, and July 5, 1832, and the acts of April 23, 1808, and April 29, 1816, for arming and equipping the militia, amounted, in the aggregate, to $5,675,746 12.

The estimates made by this department for the service of 1836, and transmitted to the secretary of the treasury, and by him laid before congress at the commencement of the last session, amounted to $8,393,252 49; making, when added to the above sum of $5,675,746 12, an aggregate of $14,069,025 61, which was all then supposed by the department to be required for the service of 1836, on account of the objects then authorised by law. But, in consequence of the military operations which became necessary during the session, the conclusion of the treaty with the Cherokees and other Indian tribes, and the various increased or new expenditures directed by congress, there was appropriated at the last session, for the service of this department, an aggregate of $28,242,331 28; being an excess of appropriations over the estimates of $14,849,048 79; and making, when added to the unexpended balances and standing appropriations above mentioned, the sum of $28,918,077 40, applicable to the service of 1836, and liable to be drawn out of the treasury during the year, if needed, for disbursement; although it was doubtless known, when the appropriations were made, that in many cases only portions thereof would be so needed during the year.

During the first three quarters of the year 1836, there was drawn from the treasury, and placed in the hands of disbursing officers, the aggregate amount of $13,514,456 27; the expenditure of which, so far as the accounts have been rendered and settled, will appear by the reports of the several bureaus and of the accounting officers, hereunto annexed.

It is estimated that the expenditures which will be made during the fourth quarter of 1836 will amount to $6,307,626 92. In this sum is included all that remained, at the end of the third quarter, of the different appropriations, amounting to $3,000,000, made during the last session for the suppression or prevention of Indian hostilities. Indeed, those appropriations have already been expended, or drawn from the treasury and placed in the hands of disbursing officers for expenditure.

Should the expenditures of the fourth quarter of 1836 conform to the preceding estimate, the expenditures of the year will have amounted to $20,322,083 19; and the unexpended balance which will remain in the treasury on the 31st day of December, 1836, applicable to the service of 1837, will be $3,595,994 21; but under the standing appropriations for pensions, &c. and for arming the militia, above mentioned, there will also be under the control of the department, for the year 1837, so much as may be required for those objects.

The aggregate of the estimates made by this department, for the service of the year 1837, and transmitted to the secretary of the treasury, to be included in his general estimate to be laid before congress, is $10,753,431 33; which, if confirmed by the requisite appropriations, will make, when added to the balance of $3,595,994 21, estimated to remain in the treasury on the 31st day of December, 1836, an aggregate of $19,354,425 54, applicable to the service of 1837; besides the amount which may be required from the standing appropriations above mentioned.

The various bureaus and offices of the department to which the sums making the abovementioned aggregates are respectively referable, will appear by the table annexed, marked A; and the details of each aggregate, except those of the estimates, will appear in the documents from those bureaus and from the accounting offices accompanying this report. The details of the estimates for 1837 are included in the statement transmitted to the secretary of the treasury as above mentioned.

The estimates for the year 1837 include only those objects which are authorised by existing laws. The estimates for the engineer office, the topographical bureau and the ordnance department, embrace, in accordance with the usual course of legislation, various amounts, which, when added to the present unexpended balances, will constitute, in the case of each of those bureaus, an aggregate amount much larger, in all probability, than can be actually expended in the year 1837.

On the other hand, the estimates above mentioned include nothing for the suppression of Indian hostilities, nor for new works, or any other objects not already authorised by law.

A further appropriation is immediately needed for the suppression and prevention of Indian hostilities, including the maintenance of the volunteers on the south western frontier. The subject does not admit of specific estimates; but there is danger that at least $1,000,000 will be required for this purpose.

In concluding, I desire to express my obligations to the experienced and able heads of the several branches of the department, for the aid they have given me in the preparation of this report. Having very recently undertaken the temporary care of the department, and many of its affairs being very foreign to my ordinary studies and pursuits, I have had, in this matter, as well as in others, constant occasion for their assistance. They cannot be held responsible for all the suggestions contained in this paper; but from me, at least, are justly entitled to this tribute.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high respect, your obedient servant,
B. F. BUTLER,
Secretary of war ad interim.

To the president of the United States.

POSTMASTER GENERAL'S REPORT.

Post office department, Dec. 5, 1836.

To the president of the United States:

SIR: In his report of last year, the undersigned stated the post roads of the United States to be about 112,774 miles in extent, and the annual transportation of the mails upon them equal to about 25,869,486 miles.

On the first July last, the post roads were about 118,264 miles in extent, and the annual transportation of the mails was at the rate of 27,578,620 miles, viz:

On horses and in sulkies	8,291,504
In stages	17,408,820
In steamboats and rail road cars	1,878,296

Within the quarter ending 30th September last, improvements were ordered on old mail routes, increasing the rate of annual transportation 375,824 miles, 306,592 miles of which was in stages. Of the routes established at the last session of congress, 912 miles have been put under contract, adding 140,000 miles of annual transportation.

An express mail has been started within the last month, from Philadelphia to Mobile, a distance of 1,230 miles, adding to the rate of annual transportation 895,440 miles. The rate of annual transportation at this time is little short of 29,000,000 miles.

Of the new routes, 30,557 miles remain to be put in operation, which will add to the annual service 8,487,786 miles.

The accompanying report of the first assistant postmaster general, marked 1, will give this information more in detail.

The number of post offices in the United States on the 1st July, 1835, was 10,770; and on the 1st July, 1836, it was 11,091; and on the 1st instant, 11,100.

During the year ending the 30th June last, 666 post offices were established, 845 discontinued, and there were 1,844 changes of postmasters.

The number of post offices will be greatly increased in the coming year, in consequence of the great extension of mail routes.

The accruing revenue of the department for the year ending the 30th of June last, according to statements from the auditor's office was as follows, viz:

From letter postages	$3,010,249 43
newspaper and pamphlets	876,217 13
fines	3,054 63
Estimated for deficient returns	8,934 00

Total	$3,398,465 19
-------	----------------

The engagements and liabilities of the department for the same year, were as follows, viz:

For transportation of the mails,	$1,638,051 76
compensation of postmasters	812,802 67
ship, steamboat and way letters	26,470 76
wrapping paper	15,013 82
office furniture	3,508 35
advertising	22,596 43
mail bags	24,837 44
blanks	27,029 06
mail locks and keys, and stamps	5,877 07
mail depredations, and special agents	5,113 12
clerks for offices	122,933 35
miscellaneous	31,389 93
Estimated for claims not presented	20,000 00

Total	$2,755,623 76
-------	----------------

Excess of revenue over engagements and liabilities $642,831 43

In the report of last year the excess was estimated at $476,227 00; but the revenue was $105,763 19 more than the estimate, and the expenditure $60,841 24 less, which accounts for the difference.

The revenue of the last exceeds that of the preceding year $404,878 53, equal to thirteen and a half per cent. increase.

The general condition of the department on the 1st of July last, is shown by statements from the auditor's office to have been as follows, viz:

Due to the department prior 1st July, 1835	$602,482 40
Deduct for bad and doubtful debts	131,327 36
	$471,155 04

Due to the department for the year ending 30th June, 1836	590,111 51
---	------------

Cash in bank, 1st July, 1836	192,005 46
------------------------------	------------

Due from the treasury for extra clerk hire	22,419 81
--	-----------

Estimated for deficient returns	8,934 00
---------------------------------	----------

Total available means	$1,284,625 82
-----------------------	----------------

Due from the department accruing prior to 1st July, 1835	$76,542 93
--	-------------

Accruing within the year ending 30th June last	546,240 58
--	------------

Estimate of claims not presented, say	20,000 00
---------------------------------------	-----------

	$642,783 81
--	--------------

Balance in favor of department	$641,842 01
--------------------------------	--------------

The suspended claims, a part of which has been paid, are not included in these statements.

Of the old debts, there was paid out of the revenue of the year ending 30th June last, the sum of $486,376.

As anticipated in the last report, the bank debt was paid off in April last. The cash in bank has since rapidly accumulated, and on the 1st November last was $550,000. Deducting all outstanding warrants, it was $503,721 11. The sum of $88,278 has been paid to Messrs. Stockton & Stokes on the award of the solicitor of the treasury, but notwithstanding this payment, and a great extension of mail service, it is estimated that the cash in bank will exceed $600,000 before the first day of May next.

The accounts of postmasters are rendered, and the quarterly balances paid by them, with admirable promptitude. There are 1,010 post offices, yielding about $382,000, after deducting the compensation of postmasters and other charges paid by them, which deposit their net income in bank weekly or monthly during each quarter, or within fifteen days after its close. There are 9,888 offices, yielding a net revenue of about $222,000 quarterly, which are directed to pay their proceeds to contractors immediately after the close of each quarter. The number of offices directed to retain their funds until drawn upon, is yielding about $8,600 quarterly. The balance of the officers are special, and pay directly those who carry the mails to them for the proceeds, except a few new offices, and others, which are not yet arranged under either denomination. From an examination of actual results, the undersigned is warranted in saying that more than ninety-five per cent. of the revenue of this department is collected within thirty days after the close of the quarters in which it accrues, without any expense therefor whatsoever.

By an examination of a portion of the quarterly accounts, it appears that the increase of revenue for the quarter ending thirtieth September last, over the corresponding quarter of the last year, was about sixteen per cent. The ratio will probably be as large during the whole year, especially as the improvements, the express mail, and the new routes, will produce a considerable augmentation. For safety, however, it may be estimated at fifteen per cent. yielding a revenue for the year ending 30th June, 1837, amounting to $3,908,222.

During the year ending the 30th June, 1836, the new routes and other improvements in the mail service will doubtless produce a decided effect on the income of the department, and it may be reasonably anticipated that there will be an advance of at least fifteen per cent. over that of the current year. If this anticipation be realized, the revenue of that year, at the present rate of postage, will be about $4,494,000 exceeding the estimated current rate of expenditure at its commencement about $688,000. And it is expected that the department will have a surplus of cash in bank before the 1st of August next, exceeding $700,000.

In view of these facts and estimates, the undersigned does not hesitate to recommend a revision of the present rates of postage, to take effect on the 1st July next, with a view to a reduction of about "twenty per cent." To this end he suggests the following scale of letter postage in lieu of the present, viz:

75 miles and under	5 cents.
150 miles and over 75	10
300 miles and over 150	15
600 miles and over 300	20
Over 600 miles	25

No better plan than the present suggests itself in relation to charges of double, treble and quadruple postage, and postage by weight.

From its simplicity, this scale will be easily remembered. It proposes to introduce the federal currency, renders copper coins unnecessary in making change, and saves the loss to the people arising from fractions. It will reduce the labor now required to making up and examining postmasters' accounts, about one fourth.

If the proposed scale of letter postages shall be adopted, it will be necessary to raise the lowest rate of commissions to enable the postmasters at the large offices to carry on their business. The propriety of placing gold coins sent by mail on the same footing as bank notes, is suggested.

Great changes have taken place in the newspaper business of the country since the present rates of postage were established. Newspapers have not only increased in number, but many of them have grown to an inordinate size. Postage, however, is the same, whether the newspaper be great or small. If not carried over 100 miles and out of the state where printed, it is 1 cent; if out of the state and over 100 miles 1½ cents.

The policy of reducing the rates of postage on newspapers generally is doubted. They constitute, in weight, probably two-thirds of the mails, are in many parts of the country difficult of transportation, and produce numberless failures. These considerations would be of no moment if it were really necessary that large quantities of newspapers should be transported from one end of the union to the other, as means of instructing and enlightening the public mind, but that office can be as well performed by the local presses as by newspapers from a distance. To reduce the postage on newspapers below the actual cost of carrying them, would be to tax the correspondence of the country generally for the benefit of the large newspaper establishments in the principal cities, to the injury of all the distant and country presses. Such a measure is not believed to be consistent with sound principle or good policy. It is not sound principle to tax the business of one portion of the people for the benefit of another portion; it is not good policy to aid the large city establishments in monopolizing the newspaper circulation, to the exclusion of the local and country presses. But there is justice and good policy in graduating the postage on newspapers according to the size and weight of the matter to be conveyed. The following scale of newspaper postages is therefore suggested in lieu of the present, viz:

Size of newspapers.	Rates of postage.
	Carried not over 200 miles, nor out of the state.	Carried over 200 miles and out of the state.
Cont'g 550 sq. inches or under,	$\frac{1}{2}$ cent.	1 cent.
920 sq. inches, and over 550,	1	$1\frac{1}{2}$
Over 920 sq. inches	$1\frac{1}{2}$	2

If these rates were reduced one half, it would not materially diminish the means of the department, provided the entire newspaper postage were paid in advance. So great an innovation would probably be expedient; but where editors will pay in advance the postage of their whole impression sent by mail, the postmaster general might be safely authorised to accept one half of the foregoing rates.

Single newspapers are now extensively used, through various devices and conventional signs, to answer the purpose of letters, and evade the payment of postage. It would check this abuse if they were in all cases subjected to double postage; to be paid in advance.

The rates of postage on periodical pamphlets may be advantageously regulated upon the same principles as those suggested for newspapers, and reduced to the lowest rate which will pay for their transportation. If a preference be given to any thing, it should be to works on agriculture, science and the mechanic arts; but the principle is believed to be a good one in relation to the mails, that every thing shall pay its own way.

Fugitive pamphlets may with propriety be subjected to double postage, always paid in advance.

The proposed revision of postages, if taken as a whole, would reduce the income of the department from two to three hundred thousand dollars below its estimated expenditures; but the surplus on hand will sustain it until the regular increase of revenue will cover the difference.

The franking privilege has been so far extended, and is by many so unscrupulously used, as to constitute an abuse which requires correction. Some who possess it do not hesitate to cover the correspondence of their friends and neighbors with their franks, in direct contravention of the law. A wilful violation by postmasters, when made known to the department, is punished by instant removal from office; but public officers of higher dignity, though more criminal, cannot be reached by the same authority. Violations of law in this respect, by those who are under pre-eminent obligation to set examples of obedience to its precepts, are believed to be diminishing, and there is ground to hope that they will soon measurably cease.

An amendment of the law is necessary in reference to the mode of making contracts with rail road companies. The law prescribing the manner of making mail contracts generally, presupposes the existence of competition in bidding, and is adapted to the existing state of things on old routes where the mails are carried on horseback or in stages.—But the reason of the law is not applicable to most cases where rail road service is required, because there is no competition. To advertise for service on such lines is a mockery. Either the department must give what the companies choose to demand, or the compensation must be adjusted by negotiation before advertisement or afterwards. Practically, the power of the postmaster general as to the amount to be paid is unlimited, because he is authorised to accept the lowest offer, however enormous. It is desirable that this power shall be limited by law, prescribing some fixed basis upon which all such contracts shall be made. None present itself so equitable as the weight of the mails to be conveyed. An act fixing a reasonable rate per pound for carrying the mails a given distance, would operate as a restriction upon the power of the postmaster general; whilst it would undoubtedly facilitate the making arrangements with the rail road companies. At present, the views of the department and those of most of the companies differ so widely as to the amount which ought to be paid, as to render hopeless any present prospect of an adjustment.

If the price were limited by law, the companies would expect no more, and the department would not refuse to pay it. To secure the advantages of competition where it exists, the practice of advertising might be continued, and the contracts assigned, as in other cases, to the lowest bidder. A few of the rail road companies have exhibited a disposition to carry the mails at prices deemed reasonable. The most important of these is the Camden and Amboy company. The managers of that road, justly considering their interests as best secured by accommodating the public and the government on liberal terms, have undertaken to convey the mails in a manner, and at a price which are highly satisfactory. The Petersburg and Roanoke company have evinced a like disposition, as have some others.

To render the department measurably independent of the rail roads, and accomplish other important results, an express mail has been started on the great mail line between New York and New Orleans. From New York to Philadelphia, and from Mobile to New Orleans, it is merged in the great mail carried in rail road cars and steamboats. The great mail is twelve days and seventeen hours, according to contract, in going from New York to Mobile, and twelve days twelve hours returning. The express mail is five days seventeen hours going from New York to Mobile, and five days twenty-three hours returning. One day is occupied in transporting the mails between Mobile and New Orleans.

The success of this experiment is not doubted; and the size of the mail already affords an assurance that it will produce an income more than sufficient to support it.

This mail leaves far behind all news conveyed upon rail roads, or by any other means.

It will give unprecedented activity to commercial transactions between the north and the south; New York communicates with New Orleans in half the usual time; all enterprises are expedited; the whole intervening country and the valley of the Mississippi will feel the impulse.

The editors and people of New Orleans will receive the news from New York in less than half the time it has heretofore occupied in the transit. The editors will have the advantage of being the original dispensers of the news to their subscribers; and people will obtain it through their own papers, without postages, five or six days sooner than it can reach them in the New York papers, with postage. The editors and the people along the whole route, and to the right and left, will participate in the same advantages in a greater or less degree. On the other hand the circulation in the south of newspapers from the principal cities of the north will undoubtedly be diminished.

This injury is more than counter balanced by the benefits secured to the local establishments; and if they were not, it is not to be brought into competition with the advantages of an earlier transmission and dissemination of commercial and other intelligence.

No measure should be taken with a view to injure the great city establishments; but it would be unreasonable and unjust in the department to withhold information from the people of the south, because it cannot carry, with equal expedition, the cumbersome sheets from the northern newspaper presses. It is, and doubtless will continue to be, the policy of the department not to send the news with less expedition but to bring the whole mail to the speed of the express as fast as it can secure continuous rail road or steamboat transportation.

The undersigned confidently believes it will be found expedient, within the coming year, to start express mails from Washington city along the route of the national road to St. Louis, from New Orleans through Nashville, Louisville and Cincinnati, to connect above with the great eastern and western route and from Boston, through Albany, to Buffalo, New York.

Such mails, on these routes, he believes, would immediately support themselves, and give an activity to business and correspondence in every direction which would much enhance the general revenue of the department, and promote public intelligence, and prosperity. But should experience or reflection lead to the conviction that these enterprises will not produce an increase of revenue sufficient to support them, they will not be undertaken.

The attention of the undersigned has been urgently called by the deputy postmaster general of the British North American provinces to the insecurity of correspondence carried on through the packet ships between Canada and the U. States on the one side, and the British isles on the other. Valuable letters and packets sent from Canada through the port of New York, and from various parts of the United States, never reach their destination. The only effectual remedy which suggests itself is a regular mail across the ocean, and a direct connection between the post offices of the two countries. By a reciprocal arrangement, mails might be interchanged between the post offices in New York and Liverpool, or any other foreign port, to be conveyed by the packets, or other vessels under contract. The number of letters now crossing the ocean is so great, that a moderate postage on them would pay the cost of their transportation. There is scarcely a doubt that such an arrangement may be effected, if congress shall think it expedient to grant the necessary power.

The object of authorising printers' exchange papers to pass through the mails free of postage, would be further promoted by extending the privilege to exchanges with printers in foreign countries; an extension which is desired by the printers in the foreign provinces bordering on the United States, and will be the more useful if the proposed interchange of mails with post offices in Europe shall be authorised.

The building in which the general post office is kept is not fire proof, and its valuable books and papers are daily exposed to destruction. With such ample means as the government now has at command, the undersigned perceives no good reason why the greatest possible security should not be given to its archives. The other executive departments suffer inconveniences from the distance of the general post office; and since the passage of the late law which connects the post office with the treasury, and makes frequent references to the president necessary, that inconvenience is seriously felt by the department itself.

Annexed will be found an outline of the organization of the department under the late act of congress, marked 2.

The contract office is overwhelmed with the increased business brought upon it by extensions of mail service and the new routes. Its force is found to be inadequate to the performance of its duties, and it requires two additional clerks, one of the first, and the other of second grade.

The appointment office has a sufficient force for the performance of its duties with accuracy and promptitude.

The duties of the inspection office are rapidly extending, and its present force will not long be equal to their performance. Its chief object is a rigid supervision over the rendition of postmaster's accounts and the performance of contractors. Conducted with system and energy, it will soon be felt on our thousands of mail routes, whenever a delinquency occurs. Most of the contractors perform their service with great fidelity and precision; but there are a few, some of them on important routes, who evade their contract obligations whenever they have a temptation to do so, relying for impunity on their adroitness in making excuses, and the indulgence of the department. They will find it their interest to fulfil their engagements, or quit the service. In some parts of the country where complaints of irregular mails are loudest, the fault is not in the department, nor the contractors, but in the roads.—The department is obliged to use such roads as it finds, and it is unreasonable in the people to expect regular mails unless they will make good roads.

My three assistants are assiduous in their duties, often by night as well as by day; and in relation to their compensation, deserve the favorable consideration of congress.

The auditor's office is proceeding with vigor to accomplish the objects of its creation. The disbursement of the post office funds through the treasury, formerly deemed impracticable, is effected with the utmost facility. Post office warrants are reduced to the size of ordinary bank checks, and, with the check of the treasurer endorsed, are remitted with the same ease, and answer the same purpose. Without the inconvenience of specific appropriations, the accounts of the department are more specific, more easily understood, and more readily examined, than those of any other department of the government. It is the desire of the undersigned ed, which the auditor has shown every disposition to promote, to render them intelligible to any one who may examine the books.

Difficulty has in some cases been experienced in renewing, for six months, the mail contracts which will expire on the 31st inst. under the authority vested in the postmaster general, by resolution, at the last session of congress. The object of the resolution was to facilitate a change in the commencement of the contract year. To promote the same object and avoid a like difficulty in relation to the remaining contracts, power is asked to let them, in the usual mode, for four years and a half, which will lead to the same result. I have the honor to be, your obt' servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

December 19. The chair presented the credentials of James Buchanan, elected a senator from Pennsylvania for six additional years.

A number of petitions having been presented and referred, and several bills, on leave, having been introduced, all of which of general interest, will be duly noticed in their progress. Mr. Clay, in pursuance of the notice which he had given, rose to ask leave to introduce the land bill. He felt it due to the occasion to make some explanations.

The operation of the bill which had heretofore several times passed the senate, and once the house, commenced on the last of December, 1832, and was to continue five years. It provided for a distribution of the net proceeds of the public lands during that period, upon well known principles. But the deposit act of the last session had disposed of so large a part of the divisible fund under the land bill, that he did not think it right, in the present state of the treasury, to give the bill—which he was about to apply for leave to introduce—that retrospective character. He had accordingly, in the draught which he was going to submit, made the last day of the present month its commencement, and the last day of the year 1841 its termination.—If it should pass, therefore, in this shape, the period of its duration will be the same as that prescribed in the former bills. The senate will readily comprehend the motive for fixing the end of the year 1844, as it is at that time that the biennial reductions of ten per cent. upon the existing duties cease, according to the act of the 2d March, 1833, commonly called the compromise act, and a reduction of one-half of the excess beyond twenty per cent. of any duty then remaining is to take effect. By that time, a fair experiment of the land bill will have been made, and congress can then determine whether the proceeds of the national domain shall continue to be equitably divided, or shall be applied to the current expenses of the government.

The bill in his hand assigns to the new state of Arkansas her just proportion of the fund, and grants to her 500,000 acres of land as proposed to other states. A similar assignment and grant are not made to Michigan, because her admission into the union is not yet complete. But, when that event occurs, provision is made by which that state will receive its fair dividend.

He had restored, in this draught, the provision contained in the original plan for the distribution of the public lands, which he had presented to the senate, by which the states, in the application of the fund, are restricted to the great objects of education, internal improvement and colonization. Such a restriction would, he believed, relieve the legislatures of the several states from embarrassing controversies about the disposition of the fund, and would secure the application of what was common, in its origin, to common benefits, in its ultimate destination. But it was scarcely necessary for him to say that this provision, as well as the fate of the whole bill, depended upon the superior wisdom of the senate and of the house.

In all respects, other than those now particularly mentioned, the bill is exactly as it passed this body at the last session.

The bill was read a first time, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. Linn, on leave, introduced a bill to authorise the construction of a rail road through the public lands in Washington country, Missouri. Read twice and referred.

Mr. Wright, on leave, introduced a bill supplementary to the act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States. Read twice, ordered to be printed and referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Nichols, on leave, introduced a bill giving effect to the 18th article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain. Read twice, and referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. Moore, on leave, introduced a bill authorising the relinquishment of the 16th sections of lands, for the use of schools, and the selection of other lands in lieu thereof. Read twice and referred.

A number of other bills were introduced and several gentlemen gave notice of their intention also to introduce bills.

The chair presented a communication from the treasury department on the subject of steamboats and steam boilers.

The remaining portions of the president's annual message were appropriately referred to the various standing committees.

Mr. Nichols offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire whether there is any law in force in this district which confers on a medical society or any other association, whether self-constituted or incorporated, the power to grant licenses to persons to practise medicine, or to decide on licenses granted elsewhere, and making it illegal and a criminal offence for persons not licensed or approved to practise physic or surgery in the District; also, to inquire into the justice and expediency of the repeal of such laws, if any such are found to exist.

Mr. Benton offered the following, which was, on his motion, read twice and adopted:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause a statement to be laid before the senate showing, as nearly as may be, the different appropriations which will leave unexpended balances on the 1st day of January next, the amounts so left, the objects to which they are applicable, and the dates of the acts by which they were authorised.

Mr. Ruggles moved the following:

Ordered, That a committee of five be appointed to examine and report the extent of the loss sustained by the burning of the patent office; and to consider whether any and what measures ought to be adopted to repair the loss, and to establish such evidences of property in patented inventions as the destruction of the records and drawings may have rendered necessary for its security, to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was agreed to, and Messrs. Ruggles, Prentiss, Strange, Parker and Bayard were appointed the committee.

Mr. Linn introduced a series of resolutions directing inquiries to be made as to the expediency of establishing a surveyor general's office, of making appropriations to construct roads and bridges, improving harbors, of laying off certain towns, for holding treaties with Indians, and establishing a territorial government, in the territory of Wisconsin.

The senate then proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution, introduced by Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, rescinding the treasury order of July 11, 1836, and prohibiting the secretary of the treasury from delegating the power to designate the kind of funds to be received in payment for public lands.

Mr. Benton addressed the senate at large, on the subject of the resolution, and in reply to Mr. Ewing. Mr. B. continued to speak until near five o'clock, when, having concluded his remarks, he intimated his intention of hereafter moving for a committee of inquiry on the subject; and then

The senate adjourned, without coming to any decision upon the resolution of Mr. Ewing.

December 20. A number of petitions were received and bills introduced. Among the latter was one introduced by Mr. Southard, for the enlistment of boys in the naval service and to extend the term of the enlistment of seamen.

Mr. Webster offered the following resolutions, and asked the unanimous consent of the senate to their immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury communicate to the senate the latest statement made at or for the treasury of the condition of the deposit banks; exhibiting, among other particulars, the names and places of all deposit banks appointed since the 23d June last; their capitals, and the amounts of public moneys actually transferred, or ordered to be transferred, to those banks respectively.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury communicate to the senate a detailed statement of all transfers of public moneys ordered since the 23d June last, for the purpose of executing the act of that date for regulating the deposits of the public money; showing the dates and amounts of such transfers; from what place to what place; from what bank to what bank, and the time allowed for such transfers, other than such as were made in execution of the aforesaid act.

Mr. Webster said that the honorable member from Missouri (Mr. Benton) had, in his speech yesterday, read statements which had been obtained at the treasury, for the purpose of showing that sundry banks had enlarged their issues since the publication of the treasury order of the 11th of July.—This information (said Mr. Webster) is neither new nor surprising. That fact has been well understood. But what banks are these which have thus increased their loans? Are they the banks of the country generally, or the banks in the principal commercial cities, or a majority of them? No, sir. The gentleman's statement was confined to the deposit banks, or some of them. All those deposit banks were seventy or eighty perhaps in number, while it has been stated that the whole number of banks in the country is near a thousand. Now, as I understand the subject, one of the strongest grounds of complaint against the order of the 11th of July, and against the manner of executing the deposit law, is, that by those measures many of these deposit banks, in places where the wants of business did not call for more money, have had large and entirely unnecessary sums of money nevertheless thrown into them, drawn from places in which it was wanted, to the great prejudice of other banks, and of the commercial community generally. I understand this to be one of the prominent objections to the course which the treasury has pursued. By the provisions of the deposit law the deposit banks pay interest on sums deposited beyond a certain amount. If they receive money, therefore, beyond such amount, they are naturally tempted to put it out on loans, however, little real occasion there may be for such loans; for otherwise the deposit would be a heavy charge to them.

An answer to these resolutions will give us light on this part of the case. It will probably be in the power of the secretary to answer the first resolution without any delay. I hope we can have the answer to that so soon as to be before us before the conclusion of this debate. Nor do I suppose that any great time will be necessary to prepare an answer to the second resolution.

Mr. Wright inquired of the mover whether the resolution was intended to ask for any more than the last statement rendered at the treasury. Mr. Webster replied that he had no wish that the inquiry should go back and call for a voluminous amount of documents; all he wished was the last statement received. Mr. Wright made no objection; and the resolution was thereupon agreed to.

The following, offered by Mr. Morris lies one day.

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary inquire into the expediency of giving the consent of the United States that each and every tract of land that has heretofore been, or hereafter may be sold by congress, be liable to taxation by state authority, and that the several state legislatures in whose states any such lands are situated, be at liberty to repeal any law or ordinance passed by such state, in pursuance of any act of congress by which such state is prohibited from laying any tax upon lands sold by the United States for the term of five years from and after the date of such sale.

The several senate resolutions lying on the table (heretofore published) were taken up and adopted.

Mr. Niles observed that, on a former sitting, the senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) had taken the ground that the whole subject of revenue belonged to the committee on finance; but if that doctrine was a sound one, the committee on manufactures would be left almost without any appropriate duty. He apprehended, however, that the hon. senator was mistaken in the principle he had laid down. The compromise act recognised the principle that a reduction was to be made on the tariff of duties: the principle existed in the statutes of the country. Whatever committee it might be who should undertake the very difficult and delicate duty of devising the mode and measure of a reduction of the revenue, would find that the chief difficulty in the way was not of a financial character, but had to do with the matter of protection, not of revenue. If the subject of reduction affected very exclusively the great interests of the country, ought it not to be sent to the committee on manufactures? In order to test the sense of the senate, he would make the motion that so much of the president's message as related to the reduction and repeal of duties be referred to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Calhoun observed that the question was not open to a motion; the reference had been made.—If the gentleman wished to move a reconsideration, he could not do so unless he had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. Niles had supposed it in order to refer the same subject to two different committees, who might view it under different aspects. However, to avoid difficulty, he would confine his motion to so much of the message as related to the repeal of duties only.

Mr. Calhoun said that this was included in his motion as much as the other. Whatever went to reduce the revenue he meant to refer to the committee on finance, as appropriately belonging to that committee. And he must be permitted to say that no committee in that body could represent more fully all the great interests concerned in such a subject. The chairman was connected extensively with one branch of manufactures; the senator from New York with another; and the senator from Louisiana represented the great sugar interest of the south; while he from Missouri represented that of lead.—As to the difficulty of the task, none could be more sensible of it than himself; none had felt it more deeply. The reduction, thus far, had been effected only by exertions such as he should be sorry to repeat.

On motion of Mr. Ewing, the subject was then laid on the table.

The senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution introduced by Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, rescinding the treasury order of July 11, 1836, and prohibiting the secretary of the treasury from delegating the power to designate the kind of funds to be received in payment for the public lands.

Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, addressed the senate on the subject of the resolution, and in reply to Mr. Benton.

After a few words of explanation from Mr. Benton, the question being announced from the chair as being on ordering the resolution to a second reading, Mr. Ewing called for the yeas and nays on this question, which were accordingly ordered. On motion of Mr. Webster, the senate then adjourned.

December 21. A message was received from the president of the United States, through Andrew Jackson, jr. his secretary, with a report of the postmaster general (of which a copy is inserted in this day's proceedings of the house of representatives.) Referred to the committee on the post office and post roads, and ordered to be printed.

The chair presented a communication from the treasury department, in obedience to a resolution of the senate of the 20th instant, with a statement of the condition of the deposit banks, and the names and places of such as have been appointed since the 20th of June last. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The chair also presented a communication from the war department, with a report from the engineer department, in obedience to a resolution of the senate of the 14th of April last.

After a number of petitions had been disposed of, Mr. Benton offered the following and asked its immediate consideration.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform the senate what amount in gold and silver has been received at each of the land offices since the treasury order of July 11th took effect; also, to inform the senate of the amount of receipts on certificates given by the treasurer of the United States for payments to him on account of public lands, and the amount and date of each certificate on receipt, and the name of the payer. The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Calhoun, on leave, introduced a bill to extend the provisions of certain sections (therein named) of the deposit act of the last session to the money remaining in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1836. The bill was read twice, by unanimous consent.

Mr. C. accompanied the introduction of this bill with various explanatory and commendatory remarks, and moved to postpone farther action on the bill, and make it the order of the day for Monday week.

Mr. Walker moved to refer the bill to the committee on finance.

An animated discussion (to be published hereafter) arose on the second reading of the bill, in which Messrs. Clay, Walker, Calhoun, Buchanan and Rives, participated.

The question of referring the bill to the committee on finance was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Niles, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Kent, Knight, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, White, Wright—22.

The yeas and nays being equal, the chair voted in the affirmative.

So the bill was referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Ruggles, during the discussion, presented the credentials of the hon. Judah Dana, senator elect from Maine, (in the place of Mr. Shepley, resigned,) who appeared, was qualified, and took his seat, but was excused from voting, at his own request.

After transacting other business of minor importance, the senate proceeded to the further consideration of Mr. Ewing's joint resolution, rescinding the treasury order of July 11th, 1836, and prohibiting the secretary of the treasury to delegate the power to specify the kind of funds to be received in payment for the public lands. The question being on ordering the resolution to a second reading—

Mr. Webster addressed the senate generally on the subject of the resolution. Before he had concluded, he gave way to a motion to adjourn. By unanimous consent, the motion was suspended while

Mr. Wright offered the following, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be requested to transmit to the senate, at the earliest convenient day, an abstract from the returns of the state banks, on file in his office, showing—

- 1st. The amount of discounts.
- 2d. The amount of public deposits.
- 3d. The amount of specie.

4th. The amount of bills or notes in circulation of each of those banks, making returns to the department, as shown by each return received, from the 1st day of July last to the present time.

Mr. Benton laid the following on the table, in the way of notice: Motion (to be made hereafter) to invest the committee to which the resolution (of Mr. Ewing) shall be sent, with authority, to inquire into the effect and operation of the treasury order of July 11th, upon the business of the country, and the banking institutions of the states, and into the conduct of banks in relation to that order, and into their attempts (if any) to withdraw specie from circulation, and to embarrass the exchanges and business of the country. The committee to summon witnesses before them, if any such are near at hand, and to conduct their inquiries at a distance by interrogatories.

The senate then adjourned, Mr. Webster still having the floor on Mr. Ewing's resolution.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Dec. 18. Among the resolutions offered to-day was the following, by Mr. Forrester:

Resolved, That the committee on claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making suitable compensation for the expenses incurred by the volunteers or militia in equipping for a campaign against the Creek Indians; and who were received into the service of the United States, but (immediately discharged), as may seem just.

The house then, on motion of Mr. Whittlesey, proceeded to the consideration of private bills, a number of which were reported, when the house adjourned to Monday next.

Monday, Dec. 19. The following gentlemen were appointed a committee under a resolution of Saturday last to inquire into the causes of the frequent steamboat disasters, &c. viz: Messrs. Hannegan, Hardin, Halsey, Thompson, of South Carolina, Gillett, Borden, Johnson, of Tennessee, Garland, of Louisiana, and Spangler.

On motion of Mr. Connor,

Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads, which was on the 15th instant directed to inquire into the causes of the conflagration of the general post office building, and into the losses thereby sustained, and what legislative provision is necessary in consequence thereof, have leave to sit during the sessions of the house, to prosecute said inquiries.

The speaker announced that the unfinished business of the morning hour was the petition presented on Monday last by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), praying for a reduction of the duty on foreign coal.

[There were two motions pending; first, the motion of Mr. Adams to commit the petition to the committee on manufactures; and secondly, the motion of Mr. Patton to commit the same to the committee of ways and means.]

Mr. Adams said, he hoped the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Patton) would withdraw his motion for commitment, since that part of the president's message which referred to the protective duties had already been committed to the committee on manufactures. He (Mr. A.) presumed, of course, that all these petitions for the repeal of duty on coal, which was one of the protective articles, would go to that committee. When this petition was last before the house, he had asked for the yeas and nays on the question of reference, and the house had decided they should be taken. He did not, however, wish to consume the time of the house in that way, and he would be glad if his friend from Virginia would withdraw his motion, and permit the petition to go to the committee on manufactures. Mr.

Patton having declined to withdraw his motion, a desultory debate arose in which Messrs. Cambreleng, Adams, McKean, Harper, Gidon Lee, Reed, Chambers and Davis participated. The last named gentleman concluded by moving that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Monday next: which motion was decided in the negative, yeas 72, nays 89. The question then recurring on the motion to refer, the subject was further debated by Messrs. Cambreleng, Denny, Ingersoll and Boon. The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Adams, to refer the memorial to the committee on manufactures; on which motion the yeas and nays having been heretofore ordered, were taken, and were, yeas 88, nays 124. So the motion of Mr. Adams was rejected.

The question was next taken on the motion of Mr. Patton, to refer the memorial to the committee of ways and means, and was decided in the affirmative. So the motion prevailed, and the memorial was referred accordingly.

The house having refused to adopt a resolution offered by Mr. Dunlap on the 12th inst. to authorise the state of Tennessee to issue grants, &c. the following resolutions were offered.

Mr. Bell, of Tennessee, moved the following, which was read, and laid on the table one day under the rule, viz:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be requested to communicate to this house copies of all orders issued to governors of states or territories, or to officers in the army who authorised a call for volunteers or militiamen, either for the protection of the south western frontier, or for the prevention or suppression of Indian hostilities within the last eighteen months; also, copies of all orders explanatory of or countermanding any original order; also, the number of such troops which at any time or times within said period presented themselves, equipped for the service, under said calls, and the states or territories to which they belonged; also, the number received into the public service, the dates of such acceptance, and the several places of rendezvous; also, the terms of service of such troops so received in the public service, and the terms during which they actually served; and also, the whole number of troops, whether volunteers, militiamen, mounted dragoons, or troops belonging to the regular army, which have been employed in suppressing the hostilities of the Creek Indians within the same period of time, and also the greatest number so employed at any one time.

On motion of Mr. Storer,

Resolved, That the select committee raised by order of this house on the subject of steamboat navigation be instructed to inquire what legal enactments are necessary by congress to prevent accidents on board of vessels navigating the waters of the United States by steam, and for the punishment of the commanders, pilots and engineers of such vessels who may be guilty of wilful misconduct or neglect in the navigation thereof.

On motion of Mr. Lane,

Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of confirming the future sales of the public lands to actual and bona fide settlers in limited parcels.

Mr. Hannegan moved the following resolution, which was laid upon the table: yeas 87, nays 54.

Resolved, That the committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the West Point academy be authorised, by themselves, or a select committee, to visit the academy for the purposes mentioned in the resolution under which they were appointed.

Mr. Davis moved the following resolution; which was read, and laid upon the table.

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, remonstrances, or other papers, (which may be offered during the present session), in any manner relating to the abolition of slavery, or the slave trade, in the District of Columbia, or any of the territories of the United States, shall, on presentation, be laid upon the table, without reading, without being ordered to be printed, and without debate.

On motion of Mr. McCarty,

Resolved, That the committee on roads and canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts for the construction and continuation of the Cumberland road so as to authorise the further construction thereof through the state of Indiana, to be let out by contracts in sections, upon notice, to the lowest bidder, and of authorising the immediate grading and bridging of the unfinished parts thereof through said state; and that said committee further inquire into the expediency of an additional appropriation for the further construction and completion of said road.

Mr. Martin moved the following resolution, which was rejected:

Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of permitting entries to be made of forty acre tracts of the public lands, without any other restriction than that of requiring that the tract to be entered shall adjoin the improvement or plantation of the applicant.

Mr. Ashley moved the following resolution, which was also rejected:

Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to the state of Missouri 500,000 acres of the public lands for the purpose of internal improvement.

Mr. Harrison, of Mo. moved the following resolution, which was rejected:

Resolved, That the committee on public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing upon a footing with the other public lands liable to be sold at public sale such public lands as have been reserved as salt springs and saline and mineral lands.

On motion of Mr. White, of Florida,

Resolved, That the committee on roads and canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving the right of way through the public lands for the rail roads proposed to be made in Florida by the East Florida rail road company, the Pensacola and Perdido rail road company, and the Brunswick and Florida rail road company, and the right of way to the St. Andrew's and Chipola canal company, to make a canal or rail road through the public lands.

Mr. White, of Florida, also moved the following resolutions, which lie on the table one day under the rule:

Resolved, That the secretary of the navy be directed to communicate to this house the report of the naval commission who have recently been engaged in the administration of the navy yard at Pensacola, and the report of commodore Stewart on the same subject.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to this house the causes which have prevented the execution of the 9th article of the treaty between Spain and the United States, of the 22d February, 1819, and the two acts of congress passed in relation thereto, and whether, in his opinion, any further legislation be necessary to carry the same into effect.

Mr. Jones, delegate of Wisconsin territory, threw himself on the indulgence of the house to be allowed to move several resolutions, embodying the prayers of sundry memorials from the legislature of the territory which he represents, which, he having received no mail from that territory for the ten days preceding the catastrophe, he had reason to believe were destroyed in the post office during the late fire in this city. He then moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the territories be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act establishing the territorial government of Wisconsin, as to authorise the appointment of two additional attorneys, and that the committee also inquire into the expediency of authorising, by further amendment of said act, the extension of the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, in cases where the sum in controversy shall not exceed one hundred dollars.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Jones also offered a series of resolutions similar to those offered by Mr. Linn in the senate.

A number of other resolutions and petitions were received and disposed of and then the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Dec. 20. The speaker laid before the house a communication from the first comptroller of the treasury, transmitting a statement of such officers as have not rendered their accounts within the year, or have balances unaccounted for, advanced prior to the 30th of September, 1836, as appears by the books of the third auditor.

Also, a statement of accounts in the office of the third auditor which have remained unsettled, or on which balances appear to have been due more than three years prior to the 30th September, 1836.

Also, an abstract of moneys advanced prior to the 8d March, 1809, on the books of the land accountant of the war department, and which remained to be accounted for on the books of the third auditor of the treasury on the 30th September, 1836.

A large number of resolutions of a private or local character, were offered and referred.

On motion of Mr. Graham,

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing single gold dollars to be made at the mints of the United States.

On motion of Mr. Harper,

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to inquire what loss has been sustained by the destruction of the patent office by the late fire, what measures are necessary to restore the records and drawings and models, and for their safe keeping in future, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey, the house suspended the rule for the purpose of taking up the bill which had passed through committee of the whole on Friday last, entitled a bill to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States. The question being on its final passage, Mr. E. Whittlesey having explained the operation of the bill, (in reply to an inquiry by Mr. A. Mann), the question was taken and the bill passed.

Mr. D. J. Pearce moved a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday, by which a resolution offered by Mr. Hannegan authorises the select committee on the West Point academy, by themselves or a sub-committee, to visit that institution for the purpose of investigation.

The motion lies over.

Mr. Bell made a similar motion in relation to a resolution offered on yesterday by Mr. Jones, delegate from Wisconsin, and which was then rejected, instructing the committee on Indian affairs to inquire into the expediency of making appropriations for holding treaties with certain Indian tribes; which motion also lies over.

Petitions and memorials were then called for, when a large number were presented.

In pursuance of the order of yesterday, the house went into the election of chaplain. On the third ballot the rev. Mr. Comstock received 103 votes, (102 being necessary for a choice); and the rev. Mr. Slicer received 89 votes. So Mr. Comstock was declared duly elected chaplain. And, on motion of Mr. Grennell, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Dec. 21. The following petition, presented yesterday, came up this day for consideration:

To the honorable senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the first congressional district in the state of North Carolina, have for years past been accustomed to regard the action of the federal government with great anxiety.—Your petitioners have accordingly their just claims for such appropriations for public works in their immediate neighborhood, as fall within the peculiar province of the general government, trusting to the tardy justice of congress.

They have regretted to see appropriations of the public money not equally distributed with a view to the general benefit.

Your petitioners have viewed with great satisfaction the bill of the last session regulating the deposits of the public money among the several states. They regard this measure as the safest disposition of the national treasure, as best calculated to avoid all unjust, unconstitutional and partial appropriations of the common fund. They therefore pray that provisions similar to that contained in the deposit bill of the last session may become the law of the union for several succeeding years.

Mr. W. B. Shepard (who presented it) made a speech of some length in support of its general object; and, on his motion, the petition was then referred to the committee of ways and means.

The following message was received from the president of the United States.

To the senate and house of representatives:

GENTLEMEN: Herewith I transmit you a report of the postmaster general, and recommend the passage of such laws, and the making of such appropriations as may be necessary to carry into effect the measures adopted by him for resuming the business of the department under his charge, and securing the public property in the old post office building.

It is understood that the building procured for the temporary use of the department is far from being fire proof, and that the valuable books and papers secured from the recent conflagration will there be exposed to similar dangers. I therefore feel it my duty to recommend an immediate appropriation for the construction of a fire proof general post office, that the materials may be obtained within the present winter, and the building erected as rapidly as practicable.

ANDREW JACKSON.

December 20, 1836.

Document accompanying the president's message.

Post office department, Dec. 20, 1836.

To the president of the United States:

SIR: On the morning of the 15th instant, I performed the painful duty of reporting to you orally the destruction of the general post office building by fire, and received your instruction to inquire into the cause and extent of the calamity, for the purpose of enabling you to make a communication to congress.

A few hours afterwards I received through the chairman of the committee on the post office and post roads of the house of representatives an official copy of a resolution adopted by that house, instructing the committee to institute a similar inquiry, and the chairman asked for such information as it was in my power to give. The investigation directed by you was thus rendered unnecessary.

The corporation of the city of Washington, with honorable promptitude, offered the department the use of the west wing of the City Hall, now occupied by the mayor and councils and their officers, and the officers of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company. The proprietors of the medical college also tendered the use of their building, on E street, and offers were made of several other buildings in the central parts of the city. An examination was made of such as promised by their magnitude to afford sufficient room for the force employed in the department, but none were found equal, in the commodiousness of their interior structure and abundant room, to Fuller's hotel, opposite the buildings occupied by the treasury department, on Pennsylvania avenue. That building has been obtained on terms which the accompanying papers, (marked 1 and 2) will fully exhibit. The business of the department will be immediately resumed in that building.

The agreement with Mr. Fuller will make necessary an immediate appropriation by congress, and upon that body will devolve also the duty of providing for the payment of the rent, if they shall approve of the arrangement.

In the mean time steps have been taken to secure all that is valuable in the ruins of the post office building, and to protect from the weather the walls of so much of it as was occupied by the general post office, which stands firm.

The department has no fund at command of out which the services necessary in the accomplishment of the objects can be paid for, nor has it the means to replace the furniture which has been lost, and must be immediately obtained to enable the clerks to proceed with their current business.

These facts I deem it my duty to report to you, that you may recommend to congress such measures thereupon as you may deem expedient.

With the highest respect your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

On motion of Mr. Shields, the message and accompanying documents were referred to the committee on the post office and post roads, and ordered to be printed.

Petitions and memorials having been called for, presented and referred, Mr. Bell, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported a bill to regulate, in certain cases, the disposition of the proceeds of lands ceded by Indian tribes to the United States; which said bill was passed in committee of the whole house, (Mr. Garland, of Virginia, in the chair), and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time tomorrow.

Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, reported bills of the following titles, viz:

A bill making an appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities;

A bill making appropriations for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for 1837;

A bill making appropriations for the naval service for 1837;

A bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1837;

A bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1837;

A bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year 1837; which said bills were severally read, and referred to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

Several reports on the claims of individuals were also received and disposed of.

The business next in order was the motion, submitted yesterday by Mr. D. J. Pearce, to reconsider the vote by which a resolution heretofore offered, authorising the select committee appointed on the affairs of the academy at West Point to visit the same, for the purposes of their investigation, had been laid upon the table. Mr. Ward addressed the house in favor of the motion for reconsideration. At the conclusion of his remarks, Mr. Jarvis moved to lay the resolution on the table. Mr. Vanderpoel moved a call of the house, but the house did not sustain the motion. Mr. V. then moved that the motion be laid on the table—which was agreed to, yeas 86, nays 77.

Mr. D. J. Pearce made an ineffectual motion to suspend the rule, to enable him to offer a resolution calling on the president of the United States for certain information in relation to the condition of the claim of certain citizens for indemnity for Denmark spoiliations.

The house resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Wise, proposing the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the administration of the executive departments, together with the amendment offered thereto by Mr. D. J. Pearce, proposing to confine the inquiry to specific acts of mal-administration.

Mr. Lane was entitled to the floor, and addressed the house for upwards of an hour in opposition to Mr. Wise's resolution. And then, on motion of Mr. Howell, the house adjourned.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

[Not having received the "Intelligencer" of yesterday, we avail ourselves of the report of the correspondent of the "Baltimore American."]

In the senate. A message was received from the president of the United States on the subject of the state of Texas, and giving the information obtained by the agent sent to that country during the last summer, and the views of the executive in reference to the propriety and prudence of a recognition of Texas. The president, after reciting the proceedings of the two houses on which he founded his own course of conduct in despatching an agent to Texas, states that he has transmitted extracts from the reports of that agent in order to give to congress all possible light on the subject.

He states that he had taken the steps towards recognition, and that the proceedings which he has instituted are entirely in consequence of the resolutions of the two houses at the last session. The disproportion between the physical force of Mexico and that of Texas is quoted as one of the reasons for apprehending that the establishment of Texian independence will not be effected without a still further and doubtful struggle. Under a new president, Mexico is preparing a new armament to pour down upon Texas, and our usual prudence and the policy on which it is founded, prescribe to us that we shall make no precipitate movement, but await the issue of this new attack. He reminded the two houses that the people of Texas had adopted a resolution to apply to the United States for admission into the union, as soon as the United States shall have recognised her independence of Mexico.—This circumstance is treated as one which involves the delicacy of our situation, and renders it more especially incumbent on us to act with the greatest coolness, prudence and deliberation. After a full view of all the circumstances the president arrives at the conclusion that prudence requires of us to stand aloof for the present, and wait to see how the coming struggle will eventuate. The president, in conclusion, expresses his entire willingness to coincide with the senate in any course which that body may think most conformable to the true interests of the country.

The message having been read, it was ordered on motion of Mr. Buchanan, that the message and documents with 1,500 copies of each, be printed.

Various petitions of a private character were presented and referred, among which was one from the hon. John Forsyth, praying for compensation for losses sustained during the Seminole disturbances.

On motion of Mr. Clay, it was ordered that when the senate adjourns, it adjourn to Monday next.

A number of bills were introduced and referred, which will be noticed in their progress.—Among them was one, introduced by Mr. Wright, for anticipating the payment of the indemnities awarded to citizens of the United States against France under the convention of 1831 and against the king of the Two Sicilies in 1832.

Several resolutions of inquiry were also offered and disposed of, when the senate proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the resolution offered by Mr. Ewing, to rescind the treasury order.

Mr. Webster resumed and concluded the argument he commenced yesterday against the legality as well as the policy of the treasury order. Mr. Benton then expressed a willingness to refer the resolution with instructions. Mr. Niles then spoke at some length, in reply to Mr. Webster, and in defence of the order. Mr. Rives objected to the resolution because he questioned the power of congress to rescind an executive act. He read a series of resolutions embodying his views, which were to prevent the notes of any bank which shall issue notes under the denominations specified from being received in payment of revenue. He would at a proper time offer these resolutions. Mr. Ewing withdrew the call for the yeas and nays. The resolution of Mr. Ewing was then read a second time. The resolution offered by Mr. Rives was then moved as an amendment, and it was ordered to be printed. The senate then adjourned till Monday.

In the house of representatives. The joint resolutions of the legislature of Illinois assenting to the continuing of the national road through that state, provided it be made to cross the Mississippi river at Alton, in Illinois, and not at any other point, were taken up.

Mr. Reynolds stated it to be the determination of the state of Illinois to withhold its assent from the continuation of the road unless it should take the route indicated in the resolutions; and he contended that the government had not the power to construct a road at all, without the assent of the state through which it should pass.

The resolutions were referred to the committee on post offices and post roads.

A message relative to the affairs of Texas (similar to that noticed, above, in the proceedings of the senate) was received from the president of the U. States. On motion of Mr. Howard it was referred to the committee on foreign relations and ordered to be printed. Mr. D. J. Pearce, then moved the printing of 20,000 extra copies, which, after a brief debate, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, Mr. Muhlenburg in the chair, on the bill to establish the United States mint and to regulate the coinage of the United States.

After some time spent in the consideration of the subject, the committee rose and reported progress. The house then adjourned.

DOMESTIC CHRONICLE.

The patent office. The corporation of Washington has offered, and the superintendent of the patent office has accepted, the City Hall for the temporary use of the patent office. The purpose is one to which the apartments of the City Hall are well adapted; much better, as far as regards some of them, indeed, than to the purposes for which they have been hitherto used. The patent office will be at once established in the part of the building heretofore occupied by the mayor and the board of common council, in the west wing of the City Hall.

[Nat. Intel.]

Post office department. All of the principal departments in Washington have published notices similar to that inserted in our last, from the treasury department, requesting duplicates of such letters as were probably destroyed.

Illinois Legislature. A letter from a member of the Illinois legislature, dated on the 7th says:—"The house of representatives have organized by the election of James Semple, V. B. as speaker and D. Prickett as clerk. All the candidates for speaker were Van Buren men. In the senate they have balloted three days without making a choice, that body being equally divided. The vote stands: Davidson, W. 19, Whiteside, V. B. 19, scattering 2. The election is adjourned to Monday. The governor's message is not yet delivered."

Wisconsin. The legislature of Wisconsin has passed a bill locating the permanent seat of government for that territory at Madison, on the Four Lakes; providing, however, that Burlington, on the west side of the Mississippi, shall be the place of meeting for the legislature until 1839.

Trial of an abolitionist. The Darien, (Georgia), Telegraph, gives us the particulars of the trial of Edwin E. Roberts, an Englishman, who had been capitally indicted for "attempting to excite an insurrection and revolt of slaves." After a long trial, Roberts was acquitted and discharged. The Telegraph says: "We never saw a greater object of pity than the prisoner. He lay in jail since last August, and had a severe attack of illness; indeed we doubt if he will ever recover from his present state of feebleness. A subscription was set on foot in court, to enable him to leave the city, which he did on the following morning."

Resources of Maine. About 9,226 oxen and horned cattle, 7,180 sheep and 128 horses, have passed through Kennebunk this season, chiefly for the Boston market. The aggregate value is estimated at $159,150.

One of the representatives in the Massachusetts legislature, is Thomas Andros, of Berkly, Bristol county, who was a soldier of the revolution. He was imprisoned in the old Jersey prison ship. He is 80 years of age.

John W. Crockett, son of the honest hearted Davy, is proposed as a candidate for congress in the district once represented by his father.

The army. The 2d regiment of dragoons, consisting of four or five companies, and two companies of artillery, recently organized at New York and Fort Monroe, and which were ordered by the secretary of war to be held in readiness for service in Florida are now ordered, we hear, to join the army in that quarter, under major general Jessup. [Globe.]

The public prints, in all sections of the country, are teeming with accounts of the most revolting murders and attempts at murder. In Philadelphia, between Saturday and Monday last, no less than four attempts at murder, with deadly weapons were made, in all of which severe wounds were inflicted, and in one case resulted fatally. In Natchez, a meeting has been held to suppress street duelling; and in most of the cities, the Bowie knife and pistol are daily used as a means of vengeance or to arrest the hand of justice.

Boothbay. The harbor of Boothbay, at the mouth of the Darmariscotta, is said, in the Eastern Argus, to be one of the safest retreats for shipping in the state of Maine. Two or three hundred sail of vessels, and sometimes a still larger number are often seen hovering into the bay to which they have been driven like a flock of birds for shelter. Traces of settlement as old as 1630 have been discovered in this place—foundations of houses, iron and copper implements and human bones. It is conjectured to have been settled at that early period by Germans.

First rail road of Michigan. The rail road from Adrian, (Michigan), to Toledo, (Ohio), is now completed, and the cars have commenced their regular trips between the two places. It is, according to the Adrian Watch Tower, the shortest and cheapest route for travellers going west—preferable to that of Detroit. The opening of the road was celebrated at Adrian by 100 guns, a champagne party, toasts and other rejoicings. Well may salutes of artillery be fired in honor of such enterprises in young Michigan, yet a territory, and does much better in expending her powder in this way, as other portions of our population might, than in lauding the triumphs of some political election.

Switzerland vineyards. At those vineyards, situated just below Vevay, Indiana, there are about twenty acres in vines that bear, which will yield near four thousand gallons of wine per year, that will be worth from one to three dollars per gallon. The quality of wine made at these vineyards is pronounced, by competent judges, superior to most of the Rhenish wines imported into this country.

Oneida (N. Y.) bank. This bank, has gone into operation, notwithstanding it was robbed of its capital. The distribution of the stock has also been declared to have been fraudulently made.

Welland canal. The select committee of the provincial parliament of Upper Canada, to whom the subject was some time since referred, have reported in favor of assuming the Welland canal as a public work. They recommend that if the stockholders will, by a certain day to be named, agree to transfer their stock to the government, the receiver general shall be authorised to issue to them debentures for the amount of their stock, redeemable in twenty years, with interest half yearly, to commence in 1840, after the following rates, viz:—three per cent. for the first year; four for the second; five for the next; and thereafter six per cent. until the debentures shall be redeemed. And that as soon as the receipts upon the canal shall amount to £25,000 in any one year, three per cent. per annum upon the amount invested shall be paid to the present proprietors of stock, or their representatives; and when the annual receipts shall amount to £50,000, six per cent. per annum upon their former stock shall be paid, until the legal rate of interest upon the capital invested by them, from the time that it shall have been actually paid in, shall be fully paid.

Nantucket silk. Handkerchiefs made by the Atlantic silk company of Nantucket are now exhibiting in the Boston market. Those who have seen them say they bear a strong resemblance to the Pongee handkerchiefs, but are of a superior fabric and certainly of equal firmness. They are afforded at a cheaper rate than foreign goods of the same kind.

The fire at Washington. The correspondent of the Journal of Commerce ascribes the fire that consumed the general post office, and, we suspect, correctly, to the practice of depositing the ashes, made by the various fires in the building, in the cellar.—These ashes, it seems, are the perquisites of some of the minor officials, and were collected in the cellar, until they were called for by the purchasers.

When it is remembered that the dry pine wood used for lighting the fires, was also stored in the cellar, there seems to be no necessity for resorting to supposed incendiarism, in accounting for the mischief.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 18.—VOL. I.]

BALTIMORE, DECEMBER 31, 1836.

[VOL. LI.—WHOLE No 1,318.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

THE HEALTH OF THE PRESIDENT, according to the last accounts from Washington, was rapidly improving, and it was expected that he would soon be able to attend to business as usual.

MARYLAND. The legislature of this state commenced its session on Monday last. Richard Thomas, esq. of St. Mary's county, was chosen president of the senate, and Benj. L. Ganitt, esq. of Prince George's county, speaker of the house of delegates.

The governor's message was transmitted to both houses on Wednesday last. It is said to be a well written document, containing many useful and important suggestions. It advocates the reception of the surplus revenue, and recommends early legislation upon the subject; and in pursuance of this recommendation, as we learn from the correspondent of the Baltimore Gazette, the committee of ways and means promptly reported a bill authorizing the state treasurer to receive it from the proper disbursing officer of the United States. "If it should be paid by checks and drafts on the Union and Franklin (the deposit) banks, the bill provides that there shall not be a sudden, but a gradual withdrawal of the funds—that withdrawal must be governed by the discretion of the treasurer, by the convenience of these institutions, and the interests of the state. The moneys as drawn from time to time are to be deposited in the bank of Baltimore and the Farmers' bank of Maryland—subject to the future disposition of the legislature, and in the meantime are to be applied to discounting real paper at short dates.—This report, in consequence of the time the state has for accepting the portion being limited, is not a general and final one. The permanent investment and appropriation of the fund is reserved for further consideration and for a future report."

This proposed transfer has caused no little excitement in certain quarters, and some think it would be eminently mischievous to the mercantile community; for the reason that it would compel the deposit banks to call in their loans in order to meet the demands of the state treasurer upon them. This may be true. But it is a little remarkable that the deposit banks have refused facilities to the commercial community, and thus added to the grinding oppression under which all classes have suffered for some months past, on the ground that they were compelled to do so to meet the demands of the general government for the surplus in their keeping. If this was the true reason for their conduct, the objection to the transfer is not valid, for the money must now be in their vaults subject to the draft of the secretary of the treasury, and its transfer can have no possible effect upon persons who are now borrowers. If not the true reason, the deposit banks have not been governed in their recent policy by the alleged obligations imposed upon them as keepers of the public treasure, and they must assume a fearful amount of responsibility. For the question will naturally arise, how is it that the commercial community have been deprived of facilities, when the deposit banks have not only discounted upon their own capital, but upon the revenues of the government?

The inference from such a question would go far to confirm charges against the deposit banks here, that have been preferred against those in other cities, and increase that distrust of banking institutions which was unhappily engendered by the villainous doings connected with the bank of Maryland and other similar swindling institutions. As friends of the character of our city we would regret to see the deposit banks here placed in an attitude that would render them liable to such imputations, and hope the question will be simply, whether the deposit banks of the United States, or banks selected by the state, can most advantageously use our portion of the surplus for the benefit of the people?—and for ourselves, do not hesitate to say that the state will consult its true interests by committing it to such custodians as will freely distribute it to those great interests, which have been so severely injured.

P. S. since the above was in type we have learned that the bill passed the house of delegates on Thursday, with an amendment providing that the treasurer shall deposit at least one-fourth, and not exceeding two-fifths, of the amount awarded to this state, in his discretion, in the Farmers' bank of Maryland, and the residue in the Union bank of Maryland and the Franklin bank of Baltimore, subject to the control of the general assembly. The Farmers' bank of Maryland is located in Annapolis, the Union bank and Franklin bank are deposit banks.

Judge John Buchanan, of Washington county, gen. Thomas Emory, of Queen Anne's county, any Samuel Jones, jr. esq. of Baltimore city, have been appointed by the governor and council commissioners to negotiate the loan of $3,000,000 provided for by the internal improvement bill of last session.

TRIAL OF RICHARD H. WHITE. We learn from the Intelligencer of Wednesday last, that in the case of Richard H. White, indicted and tried in the circuit court now in session in Washington, on a charge of burning the treasury building in 1833, the jury came into court on Tuesday, (after having been absent in the jury room for upwards of seventy hours), and stated that they were unable to agree upon a verdict. By consent of counsel a juror was then withdrawn,—thus leaving the case to be tried over again. We had laid aside a very interesting statement of the testimony delivered on the trial, for this weeks "REGISTER," but will now postpone its publication until the case is finally disposed of.

KENTUCKY SENATOR. Henry Clay has been re-elected a senator from Kentucky for six years from the 4th of March next. For Henry Clay 76, for James Guthrie (V. B.) 54. Eight members were absent, four of whom, it is said, would have voted for Mr. Clay.

UNITED STATES BANK. The following resolution was offered by Mr. Hill, in the legislature of Pennsylvania on Friday the 23d ult. which the Harrisburgh Reporter says "will doubtless prevail when the mover calls it up for consideration." It was accompanied by a preamble condemning the "unprecedented haste" by which the bill chartering the bank was passed, against the known and repeated wishes of a majority of the people of the state, &c. &c. We will publish the preamble in the next "REGISTER."

Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed to inquire into the mode, manner and means by which the said act of 18th of February, 1836, was passed, and also into the conduct of the stockholders of the said institution and their agents, under the said law, since the 3d of March, 1836, and into such other matters as may be connected with the said inquiry, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and report to this house.

SOUTH CAROLINA AND TEXAS. In the "REGISTER" of the 17th inst. we published Mr. McCord's report upon that portion of gov. McDuffie's message relating to our position towards Texas.—That report was agreed to by the house of representatives, but in the senate a counter report, made by Mr. Hamilton, formerly governor of the state, was adopted. See page 277.

SPAIN AND MEXICO. The editors of the New York "Express" have seen a letter received by the packet ship Havre, dated Paris, which states that the writer had received a letter from M. Santa Maria, the minister plenipotentiary from Mexico, then at the court at Madrid, which states that the treaty for the recognition of Mexico had been agreed upon between himself and the Spanish government, and that the difficulties which had previously existed between the two governments had been removed, and the treaty had only to be submitted to the cortes for their sanction.

The government of Venezuela is the only one except Mexico, from South America, that has a minister plenipotentiary at Madrid for the purpose of adjusting the terms of recognition. This minister is gen. Soublette, who recently has been elected vice president of Venezuela. There is very little doubt that he has negotiated a similar treaty for his government. There is a treaty between several of the South American republics, that they never will accede to any terms, which may encumber their commerce, or which may require the payment of money. If, therefore, Mexico is recognized, all the rest will follow.

MEXICO AND TEXAS. A letter published in the New Orleans Bulletin, dated San Louis, Mexico, Nov. 23, stated that gen. Bravo had departed for Texas with three thousand men, composed chiefly of "new recruits who came down, tied in pairs, to prevent their running away, and yet, notwithstanding this precaution, several hundred had deserted." But according to authentic accounts, received in New Orleans, from San Louis, under date of the 29th ultimo, General Bravo was still in that city, occupied in engaging provisions, &c. for the army from the commercial house of Rubio, who did not appear willing to furnish the supplies on the faith of the government. In consequence of this, Bravo had written to the minister of war, that he would renounce the command if he was not furnished with the means to carry into effect the projected campaign against Texas in the spring.

The sudden march of a division of troops toward the coast to reach which they had to traverse the Sierra d'Anahuac, where several of the soldiers perished by the cold and fatigue, was occasioned by an order from the city of Mexico, the government having been informed, by letters from New Orleans, that the Texians, instigated by Santa Ana and Mejia, were preparing to make an attack on Matamoras or Tampico, which induced the minister of war to send troops to those two points. No intention whatever existed of now invading Texas, and in truth, it cannot be supposed, if it be but taken into consideration that all the country from the border of the Rio Bravo to the Sabine river is impassable, a fact of which the Mexicans are well aware.

FOREIGN NEWS. Paris dates to the 9th and London and Liverpool to the 10th and 11th ult. inclusive, have been received at New York. The chief item of interest is an account of an attempt by Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, a son of Louis, to excite a revolution in Strasburg, a large fortified town on the frontier. It appears that this young man called upon the colonel of artillery, Vaudrey, in garrison, at Strasburg, with whom he had for some time corresponded. After a conversation, the colonel conducted him to the barracks of his regiment, assembled the men, and presenting Louis to them, said "Louis Philippe is no more. His government has been overturned in Paris. There is an end to the dynasty of Orleans. Behold the descendant of 'the great man;' he is worthy of being our king.—Vive Napoleon Louis Bonaparte!"

The soldiers joined the cry, and flew to arms; the different posts were relieved, and picquets immediately marched to the hotels of the prefect and other authorities, who were thus placed under arrest. Colonel Parquin, brother of the barrister who defended Fieschi, accompanied Louis Napoleon to the house of general Voirol, and found him just getting out of bed. The general successfully resisted the intruders, and having explained to the soldiers that they had been deceived, they then arrested the rebellious colonel and committed him to prison—and thus the rebellion was put down!—Louis has also been committed to prison.

The French journals also contain an account of an attempted insurrection at Vendome, simultaneously with that at Strasburg, which was checked without interrupting the tranquility of the town.

In England there was a probability that the crop of grain would be short.

MR. FORREST, the American actor, has successfully performed "Spartacus" in Dr. Bird's play of the "Gladiator," and several of Shakespeare's heroes before a London audience, and, in consequence, has caused much rejoicing among his friends on this side of the water, one of whom says "his fame is now permanently established!" We are certainly pleased at Mr. Forrest's success, for the London critics form a body whose decision is not to be lightly regarded. But his friends betray a spirit of dependence when they make these foreign arbiters the tribunal of last resort, that is neither creditable to their intelligence or patriotism. For they admit the inference that his failure would have caused them to revoke their own opinion of his capacity, and that in that event his reputation would have been run down as rapidly as it has been run up, and instead of laurels, he might have brought disgrace from England. A similar result has been already witnessed in the fate of Dr. Bird's tragedy of the "Gladiator," in which Mr. Forrest made his first appearance in London. Here, it was thought to be a production of a high order, only equalled in its literary merits by Forrest's talents as an actor.—But having been "damn'd" in London, it has now no admirers in America—at least none who avow themselves; for we have not seen one word urged in its favor since the decision of the critics of old Drury.

THE MINT AND THE COINAGE. The important bill consolidating into one, with slight alterations, all the existing laws and regulations respecting the mint and coinage, was yesterday ordered to be engrossed for a third reading in the house of representatives, Mr. Adams having waived his objections to parts of the bill, after having maturely examined it, and other objections being obviated by amendments. As the bill now stands, the gold coin remains as now; the silver dollar is to be hereafter of the weight of 412½ grains instead of 416, its present weight, (the quantity of pure silver in it, however, remaining the same), and the parts of a dollar of proportionate weight; and the copper coin remains, instead of being reduced as proposed, at its present weight of 168 grains to the cent, and 84 grains to the half cent.

[Nat. Int. of Wednesday.]

MICHIGAN. The election for assemblymen and senators closed a short time ago, and the following is the result, except in two counties, sending one delegate each, which had not been heard from.

Assembly—Democratic 28; states rights 24.

The senate is said to stand 7 democratic and 5 state rights.

We have not seen the official result of the presidential election, but it has been forwarded to Washington by a special messenger—and is said to be in favor of Messrs. Van Buren and Johnson.

LOUIS McLANE, esq. late secretary of state, and recently president of the New York and Morris canal and banking company, has been elected president of the "Baltimore and Ohio rail road company." The energy, talents and weight of character which this gentleman will bring to his new duties, assure us that the great work will now be successfully prosecuted and realize the warmest wishes of its friends.

RESIGNATION OF MR. PORTER. The editors of the "National Intelligencer" have learned from a correspondent at New Orleans, that Alexander Porter, esq. has resigned his seat in the senate of the United States for the remainder of his term, which would have expired on the 4th of March next.—Personal indisposition and family affliction are, we regret to state, the reasons which induced Mr. Porter to state this course. It is presumed that, the legislature not being in session, a temporary appointment to fill the vacancy will be made by the governor.

RESIGNATION OF B. W. LEIGH. The committee of the house of delegates of Virginia, to whom Mr. Leigh's letter resigning his seat in the senate of the United States was referred, have reported the following resolutions.

"Mr. Watkins, from the select committee appointed to consider Mr. Leigh's letter of resignation, made a report, concluding with the following resolutions:

"1. Therefore resolved, That the two several letters aforesaid, of Benjamin Watkins Leigh, are deemed highly disrespectful in their tone, and unsatisfactory in their reasoning, and that this assembly doth decidedly disapprove of the conduct of the said Benjamin Watkins Leigh, touching the expunging resolutions, and the instructions concerning the same, given him by the general assembly at the late session thereof.

"2. Resolved, (the letters of the said senator to the contrary notwithstanding). That this assembly doth solemnly repeat their unshaken regard for the right of instruction, as resting on the broad basis of the nature of representation, and as one of the vital principles of our free institutions; and that it is the duty of the representative to obey the instructions of his constituents, or resign the trust with which they have clothed him, in order that it may be transferred into the hands of those who will carry into execution the wishes and instructions of the constituent body.

"3. Resolved, That after the solemn, and now repeated expression of the opinion of the general assembly on the right of instruction, and the duty of obedience thereto, no man ought henceforth to accept or retain the appointment of senator of the United States from Virginia, who doth not hold himself bound to obey such instructions, or to resign the trust with which he is clothed.

"On motion of Mr. Pendleton, the report was laid on the table and ordered to be printed."

THE SURPLUS REVENUE. The following are the title and preamble of an act which has passed the legislature of Virginia relative to the reception by that state of her share of the surplus revenue.

"A bill declaring the willingness of the state of Virginia to accept the deposit of its proportion of the moneys that by the 13th section of the act of congress, entitled, 'an act to regulate the deposits of the public money,' approved the 23d of June, 1836, are to be deposited with the several states, and authorising the treasurer of the commonwealth to receive the same.

"Whereas, by the 13th section of the act of congress of the United States, entitled 'an act to regulate the deposits of the public money,' approved the 23d of June, 1836, it is enacted, 'that the money which shall be in the treasury of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1837, representing the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several states,' under the provisions and on the terms therein contained; and while the general assembly regards any system of taxation by the federal government producing more revenue than is necessary for the wants of the government economically administered, as impolitic and unjust; and denies the right of the congress of the United States to raise revenue for the purpose of deposit or distribution amongst the states: Nevertheless believing the surplus money in the treasury to have arisen under extraordinary circumstances, not likely to continue, and considering the provisions of the said act to be a temporary expedient to relieve a redundant treasury, and being willing in good faith, under such circumstances, to receive the proportion of said surplus proposed to be deposited with the state of Virginia: Be it enacted, &c.

ERIE AND CHAMPLAIN CANALS, 1836. Canal collector's office, Albany, December 15th, 1836. The whole quantity of down freight conveyed on the Erie and Champlain canals to the city of Albany, during the season of canal navigation in the year 1836, is as follows:

The amount of toll paid at this office, is $389,362 16.

The total number of boats that arrived at, and departed from Albany, was ten thousand two hundred and twenty-six. [Albany Argus.]

GOLD AND SILVER COIN. A writer in the "Newburyport (Mass.) Herald" estimates the present supply of gold and silver coin, in this country and in Europe, as being $30,000,000 less in value than it was seven years ago. This decrease, he contends, is owing to two causes; the diminished supply from the mines, and the growing demand for gold and silver ornaments and utensils. The influence of the latter cause is much greater than would be supposed at first thought. It is upon sound authority estimated, that £5,000,000 are annually withdrawn from circulation for these purposes. The amount is of itself equal to the whole annual supply from the mines of Europe and America. £2,000,000 are annually exported to Asia, over and above what returns either from that quarter or from Africa, making a total of £7,000,000. The abrasion or wear of coin is estimated at one part in 420, or £2,881 in the million. The annual supply is about £5,000,000. The effect of all this is, that the amount of coin in Europe and America, which, in 1809, was estimated at $350,000,000, was, in 1836, twenty years later, less than £308,000,000, showing a reduction of £72,000,000 in that short period. By extending the calculation to the present time—offsetting the increased supply from the mines of the United States and Russia by the increasing quantity required for the arts, by the growing taste for ornaments and luxury, also allowing for the drain to Asia and the loss by abrasion and other causes—we find that the stock of coin has, in the interval, suffered a still further reduction of £8,000,000 or nearly £80,000,000, and cannot now be put higher than £289,000,000, being a falling off from the entire stock, in 27 years, of £91,000,000, or nearly one-fourth.

COMMERCE OF CHICAGO, (ILLINOIS). The rapid growth of Chicago is a subject of remark and wonder throughout the union. The growth of the town, however, bears no comparison with that of its commerce, as will be seen in the following statements: In 1833, there were, as we are informed, but four arrivals from the lower lakes, viz: two brigs and two schooners, say 700 tons. In 1835, there were about 250 arrivals, nearly all of which were schooners, averaging about 90 tons burden each, or 22,500 tons in all. In 1836, the first arrival was on the 18th day of April. From that time to the first day of December, 226 days, 456 vessels (49 steamboats, 10 ships and bargues, 26 brigs, 363 schooners and 8 sloops) arrived, averaging 57,550 tons, as follows: 85 ships, steamboats, bargues and brigs, at 250 tons each, 21,250 tons; 363 schooners at 100 tons each, (many of them carry 150 to 200 tons), 36,300 tons; or 57,550 tons in all, without including the sloops. To give a more concise view of the increase of our commerce, for the years above named, we place it in the following order:

Year.	Number of arrivals.	Average tonnage.
1833	4	700
1835	250	22,500
1836	456	57,550

As there are several vessels now on the way, which will arrive here this season, we may safely state the tonnage at 60,000! being an increase of 59,300 tons in three years!

Is there any other town within the borders of our union which can boast of as large an increase in its commerce as this? We challenge! [Chicago Am.]

In speaking of the resources of Illinois the Chicago American further says—

"Grape vines are found indigenous and abundant in most parts of the state, yielding grapes which might be profitably made into excellent wine. Foreign vines are easily cultivated. But the indigenous vines are found in every variety of soil; twined with every little grove in the prairies and barrens; and curling themselves to the tops of the loftiest trees that rise in the beauty and luxuriance of their growth from the rich soil of the bottoms. In the infancy of settlement the French made wine in such abundant quantities, as to make it an article of export to their native country, itself celebrated for its "blushing vinehills." But the proper authorities of the old kingdom prohibited the introduction of wine from Illinois, as it might injure the sale of their own staple article. It is stated in one of the magazines of the country, that so prolific are the vines, one gentleman made twenty-seven barrels of wine with very little labor, in his own immediate neighborhood. And as it will appear, in a continued consideration of this state, that corn is one of its important productions, we have here the old scriptural standard of prosperity and luxury—a country abounding with "corn and wine."

REBELLION IN NAPLES. According to the New York "Commercial Advertiser," letters have been received in that city from Marseilles, dated Nov. 4th, mentioning a report that the people of Naples had risen in rebellion against the king, and declared in favor of the prince of Capua. Commodore Porter was at Marseilles on the 4th. Sloop of war John Adams was expected daily.

CUBA. A short time since the governor of Santiago de Cuba issued a proclamation declaring the constitution of 1812. Gov. Tacon promptly sent from Havana an expedition of about 3,000 men to quell the insurrectionists—but at the last accounts the rebellious governor had annulled his proclamation and tranquility was restored.

TEXAS. The London Times of November 8, founding his reasoning on the opinions of his American correspondent, under the signature of a "Genesee Traveller," says:

"We see in the late proceedings of the government and people of the United States a confirmation of the suspicion, long entertained in the best informed diplomatic circles, that the annexation of Texas to their already unwieldy territory is a favorite project. Texas would be the stepping-stone to the acquisition of Mexico. Will such a result, probably not a very distant one, be most injurious to Spain or to the American union? Meantime, will Europe be content to be a quiet observer of the progress of events!!!"

FATAL AFFRAY. Baltimore, December 27. Yesterday evening, between eight and nine o'clock, Dr. Edward J. Alcock departed this life. His death was caused by a wound in his thigh of a pistol ball, on the night of Tuesday, the 20th instant. Mr. George Steuart was charged with having fired the pistol which caused the wound—he was arrested on the charge, and it being represented to judge Brice that the surgeon who examined the wound considered it probably but not certainly such as might cause death, Mr. Steuart was held to bail in a recognizance of $10,000. Yesterday afternoon, when it was declared by the surgeons that Dr. Alcock could not live more than a few hours, Mr. Steuart surrendered himself to the civil authority and was committed to prison, where he remains to await the decision of the law.

The circumstances which led to the above melancholy result, originated some weeks ago in a dispute of a political character between the deceased and a near relative of Mr. Steuart, which was soon changed into a most acrimonious personal one, in which Mr. S. was himself involved.

HORRIBLE! Too soon has the ill-fated example of St. Louis, without any of its mitigating circumstances, been followed, in the burning of a murderer—a slave—in Arkansas. The only account we have of the horrible transaction is contained in the annexed extract from the Arkansas Gazette, of the 29th ult.

"We have been informed that the slave William, who murdered his master (Husky) some weeks since, and several negroes, was taken by a party, a few days since, from the sheriff of Hot Spring, and burned alive! yes, tied up to the limb of a tree, a fire built under him, and consumed in slow and lingering torture! We have mentioned this disgraceful and barbarous outrage, that the ministers of the law may take steps to bring those implicated in the guilt of so black a crime, to punishment."

The circumstances of this criminal outrage are aggravated by the fact, that the evidence against the negro was of such a character, that there was no chance of his escape from a just expiation of his crime by law—his condemnation was next to certain.

ANOTHER STEAMBOAT DISASTER. The number of steamboat disasters almost equals the fatal affrays which occur in all sections of the country, and like them are regarded as too trivial to attract the notice of the law. The last disaster was on board of the boat Dolphin, which when off the bar of St. John's river, Florida, having stopped to take on board a pilot, in attempting to start her engine burst the boiler, and killed fifteen persons! Among the killed were col. Brooks, lieut. Alexander Mackey, United States army; Miss Brown, daughter of col. Brown; Barney Duce, mate; Beaury and El-dree, engineers; Kemory, pilot; two deck hands, three stewards, and three blacks.

Col. Brown, lady, and two children; Mrs. Gibson and son; Dr. Martin, United States army; Mr. Waldron and col. Dill, slightly wounded, and one person whose name it not given. The survivors were rescued by the steamboat Santee. It is worthy of remark that Dr. Martin, of the army, after the explosion took place, gave up his place in the bow to a lady, and clung to a log until the steamboat Santee came up.

DREADFUL SHIPWRECK. The brig Gambia, which sailed from N. York, for Lisbon, on the 16th ultimo, was capsized, on the night of the 19th, while lying to in a gale of wind in the gulf. The captain, first mate and a passenger were in the cabin at the time and were drowned. The survivors, seven in number, clustered around the fore-castle, the only part out of water, and lashed themselves to the bitts. Here for three days and nights they were exposed to the peltings of the storm, with nothing to eat but a few raw potatoes, and no water. At this period two of the crew died, and the cabin boy died, raving mad, and to satisfy the cravings of hunger the boy was cut up for food! On the night of the 22d the remainder of the crew, who had succeeded in reaching the main top, saw a vessel to leeward, which proved to be the ship New England, on board of which they were taken and landed in Boston. The names of the survivors are Joseph Couillard, second mate, Samuel Presson, Andrew Smith and A. Smith. Those drowned were captain French, M. Jordan, mate, and John Dean, passenger, Jacobs, the cook, Andrew Pater-son, seaman, and a Portuguese boy, named Alexander, died from fatigue and hunger. The Gambia was laden with rice and tobacco.

UPPER CANADA. The very liberal sum of £500,000 has been voted by the house of assembly of Upper Canada, for repairing the roads of that province. After an animated debate of three days, in committee of the whole, on the report of a committee appointed to examine and report the present condition of the Welland Canal, it was voted, 31 to 27, to purchase the stock held in the work by individuals, and apply the public funds towards its completion and repair. It was stated, in the course of the debate, that, including the money the province had already paid and was liable for, the sum required to purchase out the stockholders, and to make it a substantial work, would amount to about £1,000,000;—and that to pay even the simple interest on that sum, the tolls must yield not less than £60,000 per annum. The tolls for the past year are stated at £7,000.

LABORERS IN ENGLISH FACTORIES. It appears from certain statistical returns that there were employed in the cotton factories of Great Britain, last year—100,495 males, and 119,639 females—total 220,134 persons, of whom 28,771 were children from 8 to 13 years of age. In the wool factories there were 37,477 males, and 33,797 females—total 71,274 of whom 13,322 were from 8 to 13 years of age. In silk factories there were employed 10,188 males, and 20,494 females—total 30,682, of whom 9,074 were from 8 to 13 years old. In the flax factories, there were employed 10,395 males, and 22,888 females—total 33,283 persons, of whom 5,283 were from 8 to 13 years old. The whole number of persons employed in these four kinds of factories, were 355,373 persons, of whom 55,455 were children from 8 to 13 years old.

STEAM POWER vs. HORSES. It is evident that in a few years, steam power will be applied to such a variety of purposes, that the services of the horse, or the ox, will no longer be required. Dr. Lardner, in his excellent treatise on the steam engine, computes that there are above one million of horses engaged in Great Britain, in various ways in transporting passengers and goods, and that to support each horse requires as much land as would upon an average support eight men. If this quantity of animal power were displaced by steam engines, and the means of transport drawn from the bowels of the earth, instead of being raised upon its surface, then, supposing the above calculation correct, as much land would become available for the support of human beings, as would suffice for an additional population of 8,000,000—or what amounts to the same, would increase the means of support of the present population by about one-third of the present available means. The land which now supports horses, would then support men, or produce corn for food.

JUDGE WHITE. Some weeks since a number of the citizens of Carter county, Tennessee, invited Hugh L. White to partake of a public dinner. In consequence of its being necessary for him to repair early to Washington he declined the invitation, and addressed a letter to the gentlemen from which the following is extracted. It belongs to the history of the times:

"It is well known to many of my fellow citizens that it was my sincere wish that my name should not be used as a candidate for the distinguished office of the chief magistrate of this great and growing nation. Some of you, as well as others, were anxious it should be, and I consented. Attempts have been made first to coax, then to coerce me to withdraw it. These have failed, and the effort now making is to verify the prediction of my valued old friend, the president, "that I should be rendered as infamous as ever Aaron Burr was." Thanks to you, my countrymen; thanks to hundreds of others, who have long known me, I am not so yet. Whether I ever will be, the wisest cannot foretell. It shall be my constant aim to endeavor to merit a good character; but what my reputation will ultimately be, depends not upon myself, but on my fellow citizens. I am proud of your continued confidence, and return you my sincere thanks for your unwavering and steady support. I thank every early friend who solicited the use of my name, and has remained firm, notwithstanding the denunciations of those in power. The few who have yielded me up, I can readily forgive. Some of them, no doubt, have received weightier arguments than my friends can ever use. Others, as a distinguished friend has said, were "misborn." Their lot has been cast in a land of liberty, where every citizen is a sovereign; when, according to their principles, they were intended for the slaves of some despot.

"I shall preserve your invitation while I live and in death hand it over to my children, as an evidence that my constituents of Carter county did not credit the calumnies which have been showered down upon me; and that, let others do as they may, they have determined that "they and their children will continue to be free."

FLORIDA WAR—OFFICIAL.

In justice to general Call and general Jesup, as well as for the purpose of furnishing the latest intelligence of the army in Florida, we publish the following extracts of official communications recently received at the war department. [Globe.

Extract of a letter from gen. Jesup, dated
HEAD QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE SOUTH,
Volusia, Florida, December 9, 1836.

"The command of the forces in Florida was transferred to me yesterday. I would greatly have preferred that governor Call had been permitted to close the campaign. He has had difficulties to encounter of which no man can form an adequate idea who has not been here. I have examined carefully the state of the service, and have looked into every matter connected with the recent operations; and I am sure that no man could have done more under the circumstances. He established this post, and took every preliminary step to supply it. Supplies and means of transportation are rapidly arriving; and had he retained the command, he would soon have struck an important blow.

The term of service of the Tennessee volunteers will expire in a few days. To avail myself of their services in the attack I propose to make, I shall move sooner than in my own judgment I ought to move, and may have to fall back; but I am so arranging my depots, that if compelled to relinquish one object, I shall readily strike another. If I should not succeed in dislodging Powell, I can, on returning to this place, strike Micanopy, Philip and Cooper, who are about a day's march from each other, each with from one hundred and twenty to two hundred Indian and negro warriors; the latter, perhaps, the more numerous. My object will be to strike them in succession, and prevent them from concentrating."

Extract from a letter from maj. gen. Jesup, dated
HEAD QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE SOUTH,
Volusia, Florida, Dec. 12, 1836.

"A sufficient supply of subsistence having been received yesterday to enable me to move with twenty days' rations, the army will march to-day. The advance is now moving. At the Ocklawaha I shall have the choice of two objects—Micanopy, which is about thirty miles south of the point where I shall cross that river, and Powell, who is fifty miles southwest of it.

I propose, after placing the train safely across the Ocklawaha, to leave a sufficient force to protect it, and with the remainder, make a forced march and strike either Micanopy or Powell, and if successful with the first, immediately attack the other.

My movements are not in accordance with my own judgment; they are controlled by the necessity of availing myself of the few days that yet remain of the term of service of the Tennessee brigade, and I am, therefore, compelled to march on their route to the mouth of the Wythlacoochee, where they expect to embark for New Orleans, on their way home. This movement will enable me to strike at the two chiefs mentioned above, and to cover the frontier; but had I the control of my measures, I could employ the force to much more advantage, in a succession of attacks along the Ocklawaha, and thence down the Wythlacoochee."

By the express mail, says the National Intelligencer, of yesterday, we have intelligence that more citizens are to be called into military service in Florida. In South Carolina, the governor has ordered a draught of 800 men from the 7th and 8th brigades South Carolina militia, to march immediately to Florida; and an order has also been issued to a detachment of militia from Alabama for the same purpose.

The following companies of United States dragoons, left New York on the 27th inst. for Florida, in the ship Washington.

- Company E. 1st lieutenant Howe.
- " 2d lieutenant McNeil.
- Company F. captain Anderson.
- Company G. 1st lieutenant Blake.
- " 2d lieutenant Kingsbury.
- Company H. 1st lieutenant Graham.
- " 2d lieutenant Hunter.

A letter from Florida, under date of December 12, announces the death of captain Ross, of the marine corps, of wounds received in the battle of November 21. Captain Maitland, who was wounded at the same time, was rapidly recovering.

The editor of the Connecticut Courant, on noticing the statement of the secretary of war, that there have been mustered into the service of the United States, during the past year, no less than twenty-four thousand five hundred militia and volunteers, remarks—"We believe the troops under the command of gen. Washington in the revolutionary war, frequently fell short of this number!"

GEN. SCOTT AND JOSEPH M. WHITE. To the editors of the National Intelligencer:

To avoid all misunderstanding and misrepresentation on the subject of the position I occupy, and the paper I recently transmitted to the military court now engaged in the investigation of the conduct of gen. Scott, I have to request that you will publish the letter itself.

It will be perceived that this letter is nothing more than was published over my own name, in the National Intelligencer, more than six months ago, in reference to, and in explanation of, a letter I addressed to the president in May last.

As that letter was transmitted to be used as evidence against gen. Scott, I considered it nothing but an act of justice that the substance of the other should also be made a part of the record.

It will be seen by the recent letter, of which I send herewith a copy, that I have retracted nothing. I have only repeated what I had previously published in relation to an officer with whom I have maintained the most friendly relations for fifteen years. It is due to myself to say, that this letter was conceived, written and sent, before I had any intimation that my letter to the president had been read or commented upon, as it is reported to have been in the military court now sitting. I had in a conversation with a mutual friend some time since, announced my intention, if my letter of May last was made the subject of a charge against gen. Scott, to communicate the substance of the publication referred to.

At the period of making that communication to the president, there was a deep feeling of distress and excitement prevailing in Florida. It was increased by the publication of "order No. 48," which I deemed it my duty, as their representative, to notice. I have never retracted, and never shall, what I said in condemnation of that order, and in vindication of the people of Florida against the denunciation contained in it.

But, believing, as I did, that the failure of the campaign was owing to the want of previous preparations, the lateness of the season, the nature of the country which was the theatre of operations, and the character of the enemy to be subdued, I felt myself bound, by all the obligations of honor and duty, voluntarily to say so, which, however, I should have been restrained from saying if I had then heard of the language of menace (imputed, I hope, without truth, to general Scott) before the court at Frederick.

The recent events have proved that after a year of preparation we have not had much more success, owing to the same causes, though the enemy was much more readily found, and the troops as efficient and gallant as were ever employed in any service. I have greatly misconceived the character of gen. Scott, if he does not, upon a dispassionate review of the subject, acquit the people of Florida of the ignominious charges made against them in that order.

I understand the facts to be, that a small band of Indians (their number at the time totally unknown) made a sudden incursion into the heart of the country more than one hundred and fifty miles from their boundary, in a neighborhood thinly settled and without arms. This produced some alarm and consternation among the defenceless inhabitants; but before midnight of the evening of their attack on colonel Gamble's plantation, twenty planters were armed with fowling pieces, and in pursuit of the enemy, without knowing their numbers or calculating consequences.

JOS. M. WHITE.

Washington, Dec. 13, 1836.

SIR: I was informed for the first time to-day, that my letter to the president of the United States, of May last, had been communicated to the court of inquiry, of which you are president, to be used as evidence against major general Scott, whose conduct is now under examination.

This places me in an attitude that I do not choose to occupy—that of an accuser of the distinguished officer, into whose military operations you are now inquiring.

Since the date of that letter I have, in the National Intelligencer, over my own name, as an act of justice to gen. Scott, corrected, upon better information, the complaints which I deemed it my duty, as the representative of the people of Florida, to make against him. I am unwilling that the first letter shall be laid before the court without the second, and as I have no copy of it with me at present, I take this occasion to say that I am satisfied, upon a full and impartial review of the facts and circumstances connected with the Florida campaign, and upon evidence not then before me, that the failure is not to be attributed to major general Scott, nor to causes which it was in his power to control or to remove.

It was my intention to have availed myself of the first appropriate occasion, in the house of representatives, to have declared this in my place, as an act of justice to a distinguished officer.

In saying this, I confine the corrigendum to his military operations. I neither intend to explain nor retract any thing I said of "order No. 48" reflecting on the people of Florida; and whilst I admit that there is much palliation for the order of a major general, founded on the reports of two of the highest officers and most conspicuous citizens of Florida, I can never think that there was any justification for the charge, however it may have originated, or by whomsoever avouched or endorsed.

If my letter has been laid before the court, I have to request that you will present this for their consideration, in explanation of the other.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,

JOS. M. WHITE.

Maj. gen. Alexander Macomb, &c.

MR. MUHLENBERGH'S LETTER.

From the Washington Globe.

The subjoined letter speaks the language of a true patriot. The cause of the people is impregnable, so long as public men honored with their confidence and favor act in the spirit it manifests.—The lodgments of power which the few acquire over the many, in usurped, exclusive, and, as some are pleased to call them "vested rights," could never be attained but through dissension in the republican ranks; nor could they be maintained, when thus acquired, but for such discord. Tyranny all over the world has made its conquests through divisions created among the people, by trusted but treacherous favorites. The principle laid down in the letter of Mr. Muhlenbergh would save our country forever from the curse which has fallen on every other.

Reading, Dec. 1, 1836.

Col. John Miller.

MY DEAR SIR: I find from the public papers that my name has been placed before the people as a candidate for a seat in the United States senate.—This was done without my approbation or consent. I have not, however, deemed it necessary to interfere in the matter before now, as the people have an undoubted right to bring into view the name of any one they may deem proper for any situation at their disposal, leaving to the person thus brought into view the privilege of asking to be excused at such time as he may think most expedient. As the period is near at hand when the legislature must select some one to fill the vacancy which will occur on the 4th of March next, it may not be improper, at the present time, to give you my views on the subject.

We have been taught the fatal effects of disunion by experience, and should learn wisdom from the past. Union and harmony are, at this peculiar crisis, all important, and great care should be taken to avoid every thing which might distract the party or foment dissensions among its members. This is, with me, the first consideration. Anxious not to interfere with friends, to remove every cause of dissension, to cement, if possible, a firm and permanent union among all the members of the party, I desire that my name may not be placed in nomination by any of my friends, even if they should believe a successful issue certain. I would only approve of a nomination in case a majority of the democratic members of the legislature should deem it necessary to insure the choice of a democratic senator. Under other circumstances, I do not wish to be considered as a candidate; and, if placed in nomination contrary to my wishes, I request that some one of my friends may withdraw my name.

To those who have thought me worthy to fill so distinguished and important a situation, be pleased to make my sincere acknowledgments. Their unmerited partiality and kindness are deeply felt, and will ever be remembered with profound gratitude. The best proof of this that I can give, will be my unremitting exertion to promote the general good and the real interests of the democratic party, (upon whose ascendancy the public interest is believed to depend), and a cheerful sacrifice of every thing that may be selfish and personal. To this I pledge myself. Very truly, your friend,

HENRY A. MUHLENBERGH.

ADDRESS OF GOVERNOR McDUFFIE, Delivered before the legislature of South Carolina, December 12, 1836.

FELLOW CITIZENS: As but a few moments will elapse before I shall retire, in all human probability, forever, from the stage upon which I have so long acted in the service of South Carolina, I cannot permit the occasion to pass without attempting to give some feeble utterance to the emotions it has irrepressibly excited in my bosom. In what manner I have acted the part which has been assigned to me in the great drama of public affairs, and in some of the most eventful scenes of that drama, it is not my province to determine.

It is all that I can desire, and more than I can hope, that the favorable opinion for which I am now indebted to the partiality and kindness of my fellow citizens, may be ratified by the more stern and impartial judgment which posterity will pronounce upon my character and conduct. One thing I may be permitted to say, I trust without arrogance, that in all the stations to which I have been summoned—in all the exciting and engrossing scenes in which I have been called upon to act—and amidst all those allurements which habitually beset the path of a public man—in no solitary instance has any selfish purpose of interest or ambition operated for one single moment to break the intensity and singleness of my devotion to the interests, the honor, and the glory of South Carolina. In the self-devoting idolatry of my heart, South Carolina has had no rival.

But whilst I claim to have brought these undefiled, but humble offerings to her altar, I am at the same time deeply sensible that all these, and ten times more, would be but a poor and inadequate return for the manifold proofs of her generous and unflinching confidence, by which I have been uniformly sustained in all the trials and in all the vicissitudes through which it has been my fortune to pass.

Whatever may have been the exclusiveness of my devotion; and whatever estimate partiality may have placed upon my services, I still owe her a debt of eternal gratitude, the record of which is deeply inscribed on my heart, and which neither time nor change, nor chance, shall ever obliterate. Wherever I may go; into whatever distant region of the earth my destiny may carry me—my heart will be with you, and my prayers will be directed, with an unerring polarity, to the home of my affections, and the land of my allegiance. And if—which may heaven forbid—it should so happen, that in the rapid progress of those inauspicious events which are even now casting their ill-boding shadows before them, South Carolina should be constrained to summon all her chivalry to the defence of her household gods and domestic altars; yielding a prompt obedience to the sacred call, I will fly to her glorious standard—"swift as the tempest travels o'er the waste of mighty waters," prepared and resolved, in common with every true and patriotic son of hers, to defend and preserve her institutions and liberties, or perish in their ruins.

And now sir, (to the governor elect), it remains that I surrender into your charge the ensigns of the high trust, to which you have been summoned. I trust, sir, you receive them untarnished from my hands,—I am sure you will transmit them untarnished to the hands of your successor.

Fellow citizens, with my most ardent and devout prayers for your prosperity, individually and collectively, I bid you farewell.

SOUTH CAROLINA—TEXAS.

Mr. Hamilton submitted to the senate of South Carolina the following report:

The committee of federal relations to whom was referred so much of the governor's message as relates to the relations of this country with Mexico and Texas, and to whom likewise was referred the report of the house of representatives on the same subject, sent to the senate for concurrence, beg leave to report:

That they have approached the discussion of the subject comprehended in these two papers, with a profound sense of its momentous importance, and of the highly delicate and interesting considerations necessarily involved in the issue of the pending struggle between Mexico and Texas.

Your committee are quite willing, and they believe the senate would desire, to record their entire concurrence in the wishes so emphatically expressed by the governor for the preservation of the neutrality of our government in the subsisting contest between these two powers. His excellency's views embrace principles as clearly in conformity with the maxims of international law, as they are with the lessons of sound policy and justice. Our government should certainly maintain all those relations towards Mexico which are at once sanctified by the faith of existing treaties, and the usages of civilized nations in amity with each other. Nor does your committee believe that there is the slightest reason to apprehend that the independence of Texas will be recognized by our government until she has vindicated her claim to such recognition, by a victorious possession of the country, and by establishing a government de facto, clothed with all the attributes of sovereignty and independence. When this event shall occur, this question, as well as that of voluntary admission into this union, may be safely confided to the only constitutional tribunal to which it properly belongs, the congress of the United States; and in the deliberations necessarily involved in this subject before that body, your committee have no reason to believe that the delegation from South Carolina will not discharge, in a manner eminently satisfactory to their constituents, their duty to their country, and to that portion of this confederacy having the deepest and most abiding interests in the question.

Here your committee would willingly leave this subject, under a painful reluctance they cherish to take any course which might seem to indicate a difference of opinion between our late executive and this body, who has just retired from the discharge of the duties of an office which have served only to confirm his high and irrevocable claims to the gratitude and confidence of his country. But the discussion has been forced on your committee by the report of the house of representatives transmitted for our concurrence, which seems to afford an unequivocal sanction to the sentiments which our late governor seems to entertain of the respective claims of the contending parties to our sympathy and regard.

In expressing this dissent from the opinions of our late executive, we are prepared to do justice to the exalted motives of patriotism which have influenced views which we may deem to be erroneous.

Your committee are constrained to say that on this topic, to differ with him on the declaration that both Mexico and Texas are equally entitled to our sympathy, which is precisely tantamount to the proposition that neither can invoke any such feeling, for it will be scarcely pretended that Mexico, in her career of violated faith and stupendous atrocity can put in any such a claim. Upon a simple statement of facts, it remains to be seen whether Texas has a just pretension to challenge any interest on our part in her present struggle.

The cause of Texas is identical with the cause which severed the colonies of North America from the parent country.

It is a radical mistake to suppose that the revolution in Texas was commenced by a band of mere adventurers, unsupported by a resident population in possession, by a legal title, of chartered rights and a portion of the property of the county. The truth is, that at an early period after the acquisition of Louisiana, when Spain exercised scarcely any jurisdiction, civil or military, over this vast territory, the hardy emigrants of our western frontier pushed their enterprise into these solitudes, and commenced settlements which have since become the most flourishing portions of the country. These infant settlements gradually increased and became prosperous; and in the struggle between Spain and her provinces, Texas rendered the most essential services to the common cause of liberty and right.

Immediately after the termination of the struggle by which Spain lost her colonies on our continent, the actual settlers in Texas obtained guaranties and charters for the encouragement of emigration and settlement, which allured an enterprising portion of the people of the United States within her limits, under the faith of the most solemn compacts. These were violated without a color of justice, under a despotic jealousy of the growing importance of Texas, and in the most flagrant manner; and it was not until the confederacy of the provinces was flagitiously overthrown by the substitution of a consolidated central despotism, that Texas resisted, and even her resistance was not commenced until she had exhausted every resource of supplication and remonstrance. Her resistance rested like that of the former colonies which now form these independent states, on a violation of chartered rights and constitutional guaranties; and if in a cause so just and holy, many of the gallant spirits of our own country have hastened to her standard, it neither weakens the justice of her cause, or the force of those public principles which justify her resistance.

Since the invasion of Texas events have supervened which are well calculated to augment the sympathy which our people may have felt, even in the abstract right involved in the contest. We need not refer to the infamous and flagitious barbarity of her invaders when, flushed with a temporary success, they were able to perpetrate the most atrocious violation of the rights and usages of civilized warfare. If these for a time were calculated to challenge the deep concern and commiseration of our countrymen for a people suffering under every extremity of human misery and desolation, when the tide of war turned, and its current was rolled back with tremendous force; when a victory the most splendid, of which the annals of modern times afford scarcely a parallel, was followed by a humanity and moderation unequally exemplified, it is quite natural to suppose that this sympathy on the part of our people would be largely increased by the admiration they would feel towards a handful of brave men who had vindicated their claim to an empire by the rights of war, and by the glorious attributes of mercy and Christian civilization. To check this current of confraternity and feeling would be treason against our common nature and that moral sentiment upon which the preservation of our own liberties must rest.

The sequel of this deeply interesting drama must be left to the dispensations of a wise Providence whom we are taught to believe orders every thing for the best. There may be those who suppose that it will be neither the policy of the United States to recognize the independence of Texas, or admit her into the union. We do not desire to anticipate the vast considerations which enter into this subject. To such persons it might be said that, although both of these privileges might be denied, yet we cannot strike Texas from the map of the physical globe, or from her territorial location. There she stands as our neighbor, for good or for evil, touching our frontier at a point of intimate community with our most sensitive interests, and alluring, by her immense and boundless fertility of soil, a stream of emigration which is destined to make her a great state in our confederacy, or a powerful separate empire.

Nor is it to be concealed that the interest which our people feel in her future destiny is in no small degree augmented by her having not only domestic institutions analogous to our own, but from the fact that she has already been threatened with the hostility of Great Britain and the opposition of some of the free states of our own union, by reason of these very institutions which have been engrafted in her new constitution as a part of the fundamental law of the land.

If these events admonish us of the necessity of maintaining a strict neutrality between the contending parties, they likewise teach us the no less important duty of looking well to our own interests: of husbanding the good will and nourishing the sympathy of those who may be in alliance with us on the vast and momentous relations of property, and social and political organization, which may be destined to be touched by the hand of ruthless ambition, not the less desolating and destructive, because guided by the madness of a blind and pernicious fanaticism.

Your committee in conclusion recommend that the report of the house of representatives be not concurred in, and that this report be sent to that body respectfully asking for their concurrence.

[The above report was adopted in the senate by nearly a unanimous vote.]

UNITED STATES AND TEXAS.

The following message from the president of the United States was transmitted to both houses of congress on the 22d instant.

To the house of representatives of the United States:

During the last session information was given to congress, by the executive, that measures had been taken to ascertain "the political, military and civil condition of Texas." I now submit for your consideration, extracts from the report of the agent, who had been appointed to collect it, relative to the condition of that country.

No steps have been taken by the executive towards the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas; and the whole subject would have been left without further remark, on the information now given to congress, were it not that the two houses, at their last session, acting separately, passed resolutions "that the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States, whenever satisfactory information should be received that it had in successful operation a civil government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power."—This mark of interest in the question of the independence of Texas, and indication of the views of congress, make it proper that I should somewhat in detail, present the considerations that have governed the executive in continuing to occupy the ground previously taken in the contest between Mexico and Texas.

The acknowledgment of a new state as independent, and entitled to a place in the family of nations, is at all times an act of great delicacy and responsibility; but more especially so, when such a state has forcibly separated itself from another, of which it had formed an integral part, and which still claims dominion over it. A premature recognition, under these circumstances, if not looked upon as justifiable cause of war, is always liable to be regarded as a proof of an unfriendly spirit to one of the contending parties. All questions relative to the government of foreign nations, whether of the old or new world, have been treated by the U. States as questions of fact only, and our predecessors have cautiously abstained from deciding upon them, until the clearest evidence was in their possession, to enable them not only to decide correctly, but to shield their decisions from every unworthy imputation. In all the contests that have arisen out of the revolutions of France, out of the disputes relating to the crowns of Portugal and Spain, out of the separation of the American possessions of both from the European governments, and out of the numerous and constantly occurring struggles for dominion in Spanish America, so wisely consistent with our just principles has been the action of our government, that we have, under the most critical circumstances, avoided all censure, and encountered no other evil than that produced by a transient estrangement of good will in those against whom we have been, by force of evidence, compelled to decide.

It has thus made known to the world that the uniform policy and practice of the United States is, to avoid all interference in disputes, which merely relate to the internal government of other nations, and eventually to recognize the authority of the prevailing party, without reference to our particular interests and views, or to the merits of the original controversy. Public opinion here is so firmly established and well understood in favor of this policy, that no serious disagreement has ever arisen among ourselves in relation to it, although brought under view in a variety of forms, and at periods when the minds of the people were greatly excited by the agitation of topics purely domestic in their character. Nor has any deliberate inquiry ever been instituted in congress, or in any of our legislative bodies, as to whom belonged the power of originally recognizing a new state; a power, the exercise of which is equivalent, under some circumstances, to a declaration of war; a power no where expressly delegated, and only granted in the constitution as it is necessarily involved in some of the great powers given to congress; in that given to the president and senate to form treaties with foreign powers, and to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers; and in that conferred upon the president to receive ministers from foreign nations.

In the preamble to the resolution of the house of representatives, it is distinctly intimated, that the expediency of recognizing the independence of Texas should be left to the decision of congress.—In this view, on the ground of expediency, I am disposed to concur; and do not, therefore consider it necessary to express any opinion as to the strict constitutional right of the executive, either apart from, or in conjunction with the senate, over the subject. It is to be presumed that on no future occasion will a dispute arise, as none has heretofore occurred, between the executive and legislature in the exercise of the power of recognition. It will always be considered consistent with the spirit of the constitution, and most safe, that it should be exercised when probably leading to war, with a previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared, and by whom all the provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished. Its submission to congress, which represents in one of its branches the states of this union, and in the other the people of the United States, where there may be reasonable grounds to apprehend so grave a consequence, would certainly afford the fullest satisfaction to our own country, and a perfect guaranty to all other nations, of the justice and prudence of the measures which might be adopted.

In making these suggestions, it is not my purpose to relieve myself from the responsibility of expressing my own opinions of the course the interests of our country prescribe, and its honor permits us to follow.

It is scarcely to be imagined that a question of this character could be presented in relation to which it would be more difficult for the United States to avoid exciting the suspicion and jealousy of other powers and maintain their established character for fair and impartial dealing; but on this, as on every other trying occasion, safety is to be found in a rigid adherence to principle.

In the contest between Spain and her revolted colonies, we stood aloof, and waited not only until the ability of the new states to protect themselves was fully established, but until the danger of their being again subjugated had entirely passed away. Then, and not until then, were they recognized.—Such was our course in regard to Mexico herself. The same policy was observed in all the disputes growing out of the separation into distinct governments of those Spanish American states, who began or carried on the contest with the parent country, united under one form of government. We acknowledged the separate independence of New Granada, of Venezuela, and of Ecuador, only after their independent existence was no longer a subject of dispute, or was actually acquiesced in by those with whom they had been previously united. It is true that, with regard to Texas, the civil authority of Mexico has been expelled, its invading army defeated, the chief of the republic himself captured, and all present power to control the newly organized government of Texas annihilated within its confines. But, on the other hand, there is, in appearance at least, an immense disparity of physical force on the side of Mexico. The Mexican republic, under another executive, is rallying its forces under a new leader, and menacing a fresh invasion to recover its lost dominion.

Upon the issue of this threatened invasion, the independence of Texas may be considered as suspended; and were there nothing peculiar in the relative situation of the United States and Texas, our acknowledgment of its independence at such a crisis could scarcely be regarded as consistent with that prudent reserve with which we have heretofore held ourselves bound to treat all similar questions. But there are circumstances in the relations of the countries which require us to act, on this occasion, with even more than our wonted caution. Texas was once claimed as a part of our property; and there are those among our citizens who, always reluctant to abandon that claim, cannot but regard with solicitude the prospect of the reunion of the territory to this country. A large proportion of its civilized inhabitants are emigrants from the United States, speak the same language with ourselves, cherish the same principles, political and religious, and are bound to many of our citizens by ties of friendship and kindred blood; and more than all, it is known that the people of that country have instituted the same form of government with our own, and have, since the close of your last session, openly resolved, on the acknowledgment by us of their independence, to seek for admission into the union as one of the federal states. This last circumstance is a matter of peculiar delicacy, and forces upon us considerations of the gravest character. The title of Texas to the territory she claims is identified with her independence. She asks us to acknowledge that title to the territory, with an avowed design to treat immediately of its transfer to the United States. It becomes us to beware of a too early movement, as it might subject us, however unjustly, to the imputation of seeking to establish the claims of our neighbors to a territory, with a view to its subsequent acquisition by ourselves. Prudence, therefore, seems to dictate that we should still stand aloof, and maintain our present attitude, if not until Mexico itself, or one of the great foreign powers, shall recognize the independence of the new government, at least until the lapse of time or the course of events shall have proved, beyond cavil or dispute, the ability of the people of that country to maintain their separate sovereignty, and to uphold the government constituted by them. Neither of the contending parties can justly complain of this course. By pursuing it, we are but carrying out the long established policy of our government—a policy which has secured to us respect and influence abroad, and inspired confidence at home.

Having thus discharged my duty, by presenting, with simplicity and directness, the views which, after much reflection, I have been led to take of this important subject, I have only to add the expression of my confidence, that if congress shall differ with me upon it, their judgment will be the result of dispassionate, prudent and wise deliberation; with the assurance that, during the short time I shall continue connected with the government, I shall promptly and cordially unite with you in such measures as may be deemed best fitted to increase the prosperity and perpetuate the peace of our favored country.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, Dec. 21, 1836.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS,

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

December 26. The chair presented a communication from the treasury department, with a statement of the discounts, deposits, specie and circulation of the several deposit banks;

Also, from the war department, with the report of the commissioner of pensions, in compliance with the act of 1830.

Both these documents were referred, and ordered to be printed.

The chair also presented the annual report of the commissioner of public buildings, showing the manner in which the appropriations for the public buildings had been applied.

A number of petitions were presented and referred; after which, Mr. Grundy, from the committee on the judiciary, reported a bill referred to them, entitled, an act, in addition to an act to amend the judiciary system of the United States, with an amendment, which was read—also, several other bills, without amendment.

Mr. Wright, from the same committee, reported the bill referred to them, to extend certain provisions of the deposit act, and gave notice that, when it should come up, he should move for its indefinite postponement.

A number of bills were reported by Mr. Hubbard, from the committee on revolutionary pensions, which were read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Hendricks, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing the purchase by the United States of the private stock in the Louisville and Portland canal.—Read twice, and referred.

Mr. Buchanan, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing the secretary of the treasury to compromise the claim of the United States on the Alleghany bank of Pennsylvania. Read twice, and referred.

Several gentlemen gave notice of their intention to introduce bills, which will be noticed in their progress.

The following resolutions were offered:

By Mr. Calhoun:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to the senate, as early as practicable after the first of January next, the amount of the exports for the year ending the 31st instant, ascertained and estimated, and distinguishing between the domestic and foreign, and the portion of the latter that is free and dutiable; the amount of the imports for the same period, estimated and ascertained, distinguishing in like manner the free and dutiable; the amount of duties accrued in the same period, ascertained and estimated, stating the portion paid into the treasury during the year, and the amount outstanding at the end of the year; also, the amount of money that will be received in the year from the sales of lands, ascertained and estimated, distinguishing the receipts of each quarter; and, also, the amount of public money in the treasury at the end of the year, ascertained and estimated, and distinguishing what stands to the credit of the treasurer from what stands to that of the disbursing officers.

By Mr. Hendricks:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry or delivery at Michigan city.

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an additional appropriation for the construction of a breakwater at Michigan city.

December 27. The following message, in writing, accompanied by documents, was received from the president of the United States:

To the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America:

By the second section of the act "to establish the northern boundary line of the state of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the state of Michigan into the union, upon the conditions therein expressed," approved June 15, 1836, the constitution and state government which the people of Michigan had formed for themselves was ratified and confirmed, and the state of Michigan declared to be one of the United States of America, and admitted into the union, upon an equal footing with the original states; but on the express condition that said state should consist of, and have jurisdiction over, all the territory included within certain boundaries described in the act, and over none other. It was further enacted, by the third section of the same law, that, as a compliance with the fundamental condition of admission, the boundaries of the state of Michigan, as thus described, declared and established, should receive the assent of a convention of delegates, elected by the people of said state, for the sole purpose of giving the assent therein required; that, as soon as such assent should be given, the president of the United States should announce the same by proclamation; and that, thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of congress, the admission of the state into the union, as one of the United States of America, should be considered as complete, and the senators and representatives in the congress of the United States entitled to take their seats without further delay.

In the month of November last, I received a communication, enclosing the official proceedings of a convention, assembled at Ann Arbor, in Michigan, on the 28th of September, 1836; all which (marked A) are herewith laid before you. It will be seen by these papers that the convention there referred to was elected by the people of Michigan, pursuant to an act of the state legislature, passed on the 25th of July last, in consequence of the above mentioned act of congress, and that it declined giving its assent to the fundamental condition prescribed by congress, and rejected the same.

On the 24th instant, the accompanying paper marked B, with its enclosure, containing the proceedings of a convention of delegates subsequently elected, and held in the state of Michigan, was presented to me. By these papers, which are also herewith submitted for your consideration, it appears that elections were held in all the counties of the state except two, on the 5th and 6th days of December, instant, for the purpose of electing a convention of delegates to give the assent required by congress; that the delegates then elected assembled in convention on the 14th day of December, instant; and that, on the following day, the assent of the body to the fundamental condition above stated was formally given.

This latter convention was not held or elected by virtue of any act of the territorial or state legislature; it originated from the people themselves, and was chosen by them, in pursuance of resolutions adopted in primary assemblies, held in the respective counties. The act of congress, however, does not prescribe by what authority the convention shall be ordered, or the time when, or the manner in which, it shall be chosen. Had these latter proceedings come to me during the recess of congress, I should therefore have felt it my duty, on being satisfied that they emanated from a convention of delegates elected, in point of fact, by the people of the state, for the purpose required, to have issued my proclamation thereon, as provided by law.—But as the authority conferred on the president was evidently given him under the expectation that the assent of the convention might be laid before him during the recess of congress, and to avoid the delay of a postponement until the meeting of that body, and as the circumstances which now attend the case are in other respects peculiar, and such as could not have been foreseen when the act of June 15, 1836, was passed, I deem it most agreeable to the intent of that law, and proper for other reasons, that the whole subject should be submitted to the decision of congress. The importance of your early action upon it is too obvious to need remark.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, December 26, 1836.

Mr. Grundy moved that the message and documents be printed, and referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Benton remarked that, as the president had given his opinion that Michigan had complied with the requisite terms of admission, and as he had said that he should have issued his proclamation accordingly, had the information arrived during the recess of congress, he (Mr. B.) regarded the proposed reference as a mere matter of form, and would prefer that a joint resolution of admission should forthwith be passed by both houses.

Mr. Grundy said he would still prefer the course which he had suggested, and, on this account—that the first convention had not assented to the terms of admission; but another convention had decided to accede to the proposition made by the congress of the United States. The great inquiry now was, are the proceedings in accordance with the act of admission? The decision of which question depends on information which ought to be ascertained before the actual admission, though the president had said that, in his opinion, all was right, and, if the information had come during the recess, he would have acted accordingly. Mr. G. had no design to produce any delay by a reference to a committee. He should not withdraw his motion, and he hoped the senator would withdraw his opposition.

Mr. Benton said that, as the committee might draw up a joint resolution for admission to-day, he should not oppose the reference.

The message was also accompanied with a report from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance with the senate resolution of the 19th instant, in relation to the unexpended balances remaining in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1836.

The chair presented a communication from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance with a senate resolution, offered by Mr. Webster, relating to the transfers, &c. of the public money, since the 21st of June last. Referred, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Tomlinson presented the petition of a large number of the inhabitants of Norwich, in Connecticut, praying for a total repeal of the duty on foreign coal; which was referred to the committee on manufactures, and ordered to be printed.

Several other gentlemen presented petitions and memorials which were referred.

Among the bills introduced were the following:

By Mr. Southard. A bill for the relief of the heirs of the late Henry Eckford. A bill to establish a naval asylum. A bill for the relief of commodore Isaac Hull. A bill to establish and regulate navy rations, and for other purposes. A bill to regulate the pay of the officers of the marine corps. A bill for the erection of a dry dock at Pensacola. A bill to reorganize the navy of the United States. A bill to defray the expenses of a rendezvous and naval depot at the southern extremity of Florida.

By Mr. Buchanan: A bill to extend to a longer period the several acts for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States.

By Mr. Moore: A bill authorising the secretary of the treasury to invest the two per cent. fund set apart for the construction of a road or roads, to the state of Alabama.

The senate now proceeded to the special order, the farther consideration of the joint resolution introduced by Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, on this subject, the question being on the following amendment, or substitute, offered by Mr. Rives.

Resolved, That, hereafter, all sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, whether for customs, public lands, taxes, debts or otherwise, shall be collected and paid only in the legal currency of the United States, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in the said legal currency, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes; that is, from and after the passage of this resolution, the notes of no banks which shall issue bills of a less denomination than $5 (five dollars) shall be received in payment of the public dues; from and after the 1st day of July, 1839, the notes of no banks which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than $10, (ten dollars) shall be receivable; and from and after the 1st of July, 1841, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than $20, (twenty dollars) but the public debtor shall have the option of paying either in the said legal currency, or in the notes of banks of the descriptions above mentioned, in good credit; provided, however, that no notes shall be taken in payment by the collectors or receivers, which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not be willing to pass to the credit of the United States as cash."

Mr. Hubbard addressed the senate at large on the subject of the resolution and the amendment. Mr. Hubbard having concluded his remarks, Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, inquired whether he was to understand Mr. H. as including in his argument of justification the discrimination made in the order between citizens of different states of the union, requiring of one class to pay gold and silver, and permitting the other to pay in the ordinary currency? Mr. Hubbard replied that he had not turned his attention to that point, considering it as having been sufficiently met in the able speech of the senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton). Mr. Morris obtained the floor for to-morrow; and then the senate, at a little past three, went into executive business; after which, the senate adjourned.

December 28. Mr. Linn presented several memorials from the legislature of the state of Missouri, chiefly relating to the public lands in that state. Referred.

Mr. Hendricks, from the committee on roads and canals, reported two several bills referred to them, authorising certain internal improvements in the territory of Florida, one of them with an amendment, which was read.

Mr. Davis, on leave, introduced a bill in addition to the acts for the relief of sick and disabled seamen. Read twice, and referred.

Mr. Davis, in connexion with the above bill, also offered the following resolution, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the laws which impose twenty cents a month on seamen as hospital money.

Mr. Sevier, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Indians. Read twice and referred.

Mr. Grundy, from the committee on the judiciary, reported the bill referred to them in addition to the act authorising a settlement of accounts between the United States and the receivers of the public money, without amendment.

Mr. Rives offered the following:

Resolved, That the 47th rule of the senate be amended as follows:

After "country" insert "or who have received medals by a vote of congress."

Mr. Benton moved that, of a document from the treasury department, showing the unexpended appropriations remaining in the treasury (and liable to go to the states) on the 1st of January, 1837, 1,000 extra copies should be printed for the use of the senate; and that five copies be printed, and sent to each of the governors, and twenty copies to each branch of the legislatures of the several states.

On this motion an animated discussion arose, in which Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, Davis, King, of Alabama, Hubbard and Strange participated.

Mr. Benton supported the motion by a speech, in which he explained the nature of the treasury document he wished to have printed and distributed, and in the course of which reference was frequently had to the deposit bill of the last session, and its effect in robbing the country of what (Mr. B. said) ought to have gone to objects dear to many of the states, and rendering it necessary to lay equivalent taxes, or at least to retain taxes which might otherwise have been dispensed with.

Mr. Calhoun opposed the motion, contending that it presented a false view, and was calculated only to mislead. He adverted to the course of the finance committee in treating the bill he had introduced providing for the prospective distribution of any balance that should remain in the treasury on the 1st of January next year in a manner somewhat cavalier, and called on Mr. Wright, the chairman of that committee, to state the reasons why that committee had announced the determination to move for the indefinite postponement of the bill, without any report showing the grounds on which they proceeded.

Mr. Wright considered the call on him as out of its place and unwarranted. When the bill came up for consideration he should fully state the grounds on which the committee were opposed to it.

Mr. Calhoun rejoined, and complained in strong terms of this refusal, and of the course of the committee as extraordinary and unprecedented.

Mr. Hubbard opposed the resolution of Mr. Benton on the ground that the statements he wished to circulate could have no good effect on the state legislatures, and so far as they could operate at all, were calculated to mislead all who relied upon them.

The discussion was further continued by Messrs. Calhoun, Davis, King, of Ala. Niles and Strange, all of whom concurred, and some of them very warmly, in opposing the resolution, and by Mr. Benton, who spoke several times, and with great earnestness, in reply.

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, the question was divided, and being about to be put first on the printing of an extra number of 1,000 copies for the use of the senate, and then on ordering copies to be sent to the governors and legislatures of the several states, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, Mr. Benton, on request of Mr. Strange, consented to withdraw so much of the resolution as related to the circulation of copies; whereupon, the residue, viz: the printing of 1,000 copies for the use of the senate, was agreed to without opposition.

The order of the day on the resolution of Mr. Ewing, to rescind the specie treasury order, was postponed.

The senate then proceeded to the election of a chaplain, when the ballots being counted, it appeared the rev. Mr. Goodman, having received 22 votes, was duly elected.

Several bills received from the house received their first and second reading, and were appropriately referred; when the senate adjourned.

December 29. A message was received from the president of the United States, through Andrew Jackson, jr. his private secretary, together with a report from the secretary of the navy, in compliance with a senate resolution of the 24th of May last. Referred.

Mr. Grundy, from the committee on the judiciary, to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill for the admission of Michigan into the union on an equal footing with the other states. The bill was read twice by unanimous consent.

Mr. Grundy said, so far as the committee had any information on the subject, they were ready now to communicate it to the senate. He hoped, therefore, the senate would at once proceed with the bill.

Objections were made to the immediate progress of the bill, and a discussion took place, in which Messrs. Grundy, Ewing, of Ohio, Calhoun, Buchanan, Morris and Benton participated.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the bill was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the various documents on the subject of the above bill were ordered to be printed.

The chair presented a communication from the treasury department, in compliance with a resolution of the senate, with a statement of the amount of gold and silver received in payment for the public lands in 1836. Ordered to be printed.

The resolution offered by Mr. Calhoun, calling on the secretary of the treasury for information on the subject of exports, imports, and the avails of the public lands for the past year, was taken up, and Mr. Calhoun having stated that the design of the information called for was to aid in making an estimate for the coming year in reference to the public deposits, which he regarded as the great subject of the session, and liable to produce much debate, the resolution was adopted.

Several bills were reported by Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, among them were the following:

The bill from the house making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners, without amendment.

The bill from the house supplementary to the act establishing the mint and regulating the coins of the United States, with an amendment; which was read.

The bill from the house making an appropriation of $2,000,000 for the suppression of Indian hostilities; considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate proceeded to the further consideration of the joint resolution rescinding the treasury order of July 11, 1836, &c. The question being on the substitute offered by Mr. Rives, aiming, indirectly, at the suppression of the small bills of the state banks.

Mr. Morris having waived his right to the floor, Mr. Southard addressed the senate on the subject generally.

About the usual hour of adjournment, Mr. Southard gave way for a motion for adjournment by Mr. Ewing.

Before the senate adjourned, however, Mr. Rives gave notice of his intention to modify his amendment to Mr. Ewing's resolution on the subject of the treasury order, so as to cause it to read as follows, viz:

Resolved, That hereafter all sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, whether for customs, public lands, taxes, debts or otherwise, shall be collected and paid only in the legal currency of the United States, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes; that is, from and after the passage of this resolution, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars shall be received in payment of the public dues; from and after the first day of July, 1839, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars, shall be receivable; and from and after the 1st of July, 1841, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars; provided, however, that no notes shall be taken in payment by the collectors or receivers, which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not under the supervision and control of the secretary of the treasury agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash."

The amendment, thus amended, was ordered to be printed, and then the senate, on motion of Mr. Clay, adjourned over to Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

A committee of accounts, consisting of Messrs. Lee, of New Jersey; Hall, of Maine; Johnson, of Virginia; Turner, of Maryland; McKennan, of Pennsylvania.]

Friday, Dec. 23. After the reading of the journal of the preceding day—

Mr. Ashley, of Missouri, rose and asked leave to make a few remarks on the subject of certain resolutions from the legislature of Illinois, in relation to the location of the national road, which had (the day before, when, from indisposition, he was unable to attend the house) been referred to the committee on roads and canals. Hearing some dissenting voices, Mr. A. said he would defer his remarks until a more fit occasion, when the subject should again receive the action of the house. He would then be prepared to show the absurdity of the statements contained in the resolutions, and the remarks which had been made in their support.

After memorials and petitions had been called for, in the order of states and territories, and presented, and some private bills disposed of, the house proceeded to consider the motion, heretofore submitted by Mr. Bell, to reconsider the vote by which the following resolution, offered on a former day by Mr. Jones, delegate from Wisconsin, had been laid on the table.

Resolved, That the committee on Indian affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating money for holding treaties with, and the purchase of the lands belonging to, the Sac, Fox, Sioux and Winnebago Indians, in Wisconsin territory, and to provide for their removal west of the Mississippi river.

Mr. Bell briefly explained that, since the vote on this resolution had been taken, he had become satisfied that it might be expedient, if possible, to effect a treaty with one or more, and possibly with all, the tribes referred to in the resolution; and, as the resolution was merely one of inquiry by that committee into the expediency of the measure, he hoped the house would reconsider the vote, and adopt the resolution.

And the question on the motion to reconsider was then taken and decided in the affirmative. So the vote was reconsidered.

A brief debate now ensued, in which Messrs. Bell, Garland, of La. Ashley, Garland, of Va. Harrison, of Missouri, and Davis participated. The question was taken and the resolution adopted.—Ayes 99; noes not counted.

The resolution offered by Mr. Jarvis on the 12th inst. (see page 255), directing the secretary of the navy to report the names of officers of the navy who have received orders for service, &c. was next considered and agreed to.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Fry, instructing the committee on agriculture to inquire into the expediency of immediately abolishing the duties on foreign grain and bread-stuffs of all kinds.

There were two amendments pending: 1st. That of Mr. Adams to include "the duties on foreign coal, salt and iron." And, 2dly, that of Mr. Williams, of North Carolina to include the duty on "sugar." Mr. Fry addressed the house at considerable length in remarks which may be published hereafter.—After which, on motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey, the house proceeded to the orders of the day, being the consideration of private bills. On motion of Mr. A. Mann, the rules of the house were suspended by a vote of 117 ayes against 45 noes, to enable him to submit a motion that when the house adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Mr. Anthony moved to amend the motion by inserting Tuesday; which motion was lost. Yeas 70, noes 104. And the motion of Mr. Mann was then adopted. Yeas 96, noes 95.

The speaker laid before the house the annual report of the commissioner of public buildings, in obedience to the act requiring him to make an annual report of the manner in which all appropriations for the public buildings and grounds have been applied.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the comptroller of the treasury, transmitting a statement of the accounts which have remained unsettled, or on which balances appear to have been due more than three years prior to the 30th of September, 1835, on the books of the fourth auditor of the treasury.

After some further proceedings on a private bill the house adjourned.

Monday, Dec. 26. William C. Dawson, elected from Georgia to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of gen. Coffee, appeared, was qualified and took his seat.

Among the petitions presented was one by Mr. Adams, from J. Page and twenty-six other citizens of Silver Lake, Susquehanna county, state of Pennsylvania, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Adams moved that the said petition be referred to the committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. Pickens asked for the decision of the chair upon the construction of the resolution reported from the select committee appointed on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, at the last session of congress. By that resolution all memorials and other papers relating to this subject had been ordered to lie on the table without being referred or printed. Mr. P. wished to know what would be the destiny of these petitions under that resolution.

The speaker said it would be a matter for the consideration of the house. After referring to such authorities as he could find, he had come to the decision that the operation of the resolution referred to, ceased with the last session of congress. The question, however, was one for the house to determine.

Mr. Pickens said he could not consent that these petitions should be referred to any standing committee of the house. He objected, therefore, to the proposed reference of the memorial presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and he called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. Parks moved to lay the petition on the table. Mr. Cushman called for the yeas and nays on the last motion; which were ordered.

[The name of Mr. W. Thompson, of South Carolina, having been called, Mr. T. rose and inquired whether the act of recording his vote on this motion would imply that he assented to the reception of these petitions at all? The speaker said that the question of reception could not now be entertained, the petition actually being at the present time in the possession of the house. Mr. T. thereupon asked to be excused from voting, and the house accordingly excused him.]

And the vote, having been taken, stood: yeas 116, noes 36.

So the petition was laid on the table.

Mr. Davis asked the consent of the house, at this time, to take up and consider a resolution heretofore offered by him, providing that all resolutions, petitions, memorials, and other papers, which might be offered during the present session of congress, in any manner relating to the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, or in any of the territories of the United States, should, on presentation, be laid upon the table without being read, or ordered to be printed, and without debate.

Objection having been made, Mr. Davis moved a call of the house, and the yeas and nays were ordered. On motion of Mr. Owens, it appeared that a quorum was not present. Mr. Adams asked the speaker if the question was debateable. He replied it was not. Mr. Adams then suggested to Mr. Davis the propriety of postponing the consideration of his resolution.

Mr. Anthony said that, as gentlemen had been so anxious to come here to-day, [Christmas day], and as there was no quorum present, he wished to know who was away; for this reason he moved a call of the house: which motion prevailed, ayes 77 noes 65. So the house ordered the call. The roll having been thereupon called, 170 members answered to their names: when, on motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey, further proceedings in the call were suspended. And the question on the motion to suspend the rule was then taken, and decided in the negative. So the house refused to suspend the rule.

The presentation of petitions and memorials was then completed.

A number of reports on private claims were received and disposed of; after which the house took up the unfinished business of the morning hour, being the resolution of Mr. Fry instructing the committee on agriculture, to enquire into the expediency of immediately abolishing the duties on foreign grain, or on bread-stuffs of all kinds, to which resolution two amendments had been heretofore offered: first, by Mr. Adams, to amend by inserting the words "and also on foreign coal, salt and iron;" and, secondly, by Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, by inserting the words "and sugar."

Mr. Anthony addressed the house at some length in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, said that, as the question immediately before the house was on the adoption of the amendment proposing to include the article of "sugar," it was his wish to offer a few observations. But by way of testing the sense of the house, he would move to lay the whole subject on the table; which motion prevailed.

So the resolution and amendments were laid on the table.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Underwood, on the 12th instant, directing the secretary of the treasury to lay before the house a statement of the various sums paid to the new states out of the 5 per cent. upon the net proceeds of the sales of public land, &c. was considered, and agreed to by the house.

The resolution moved by Mr. Chambers, of Kentucky, on the 19th instant, instructing the secretary of the treasury to report to this house the amount of revenue due to the United States, the payment of which has been suspended under the act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York, passed at the last session of congress, was taken up, considered, and agreed to.

The house took up for consideration the motion, heretofore made by Mr. Parker, to print 5,000 extra copies of the accounts of receipts and expenditures of the United States for the year 1835.

After some remarks of Mr. Adams, in opposition to the motion, which he believed to be unusual and the documents useless to the public, and a reply from Mr. Parker, who thought the document contained information that would be useful to the people, the question was taken and decided in the negative: ayes 52, noes 81. So the motion was rejected.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Huntsman on the 19th instant. Various modifications were proposed, and the resolution was finally adopted as follows:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury cause to be prepared, as soon as convenient, and report to this house, a tabular statement showing the gross revenue receivable on each article of foreign import for the last four years, distinguishing the amount received in each year, together with the amounts of drawback in each year.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Bell on the 19th inst., requesting the secretary of war to communicate to this house copies of all orders issued to governors of states or territories, or to officers in the army, authorising a call for volunteers or militiamen, &c. and the same resolution was agreed to by the house.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, on the 19th instant, instructing the secretary of the treasury to report to this house the number of claims to lands in the state of Louisiana, confirmed under different acts of congress, and the number of those acquired from the United States by purchase, the number of patents issued for said claims, &c.; which resolution was agreed to by the house.

The resolution submitted by Mr. White, of Florida, on the 19th instant, directing the secretary of the navy to communicate the report of the naval commission, who have recently been engaged in the examination of the navy yard at Pensacola, &c. was considered and adopted by the house.

The resolution moved by Mr. White, of Florida, on the 19th instant, relative to the 9th article of the Spanish treaty, was also agreed to by the house.

The resolution moved by Mr. Underwood on the 12th instant, relative to printing 5,000 copies of the senate document No. 333, entitled "Report of geological reconnaissance, made in 1835, by G. W. Featherstonhaugh," was taken up for consideration; and, on motion of Mr. Bell, was modified, by inserting after the word "Resolved," the words "That the committee on the library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of printing;" and at the end thereof, "the same to be printed under the direction of Mr. Featherstonhaugh;" and the resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war ad interim, transmitting the annual report in relation to applications for pensions made in the year 1836, which have been rejected at the pension office, prepared in obedience to the resolution of congress of the 29th of May, 1836; which letter and report were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

By the report of the commissioner of pensions, it appears that the number of claims for pensions which have been made and rejected in 1836, are as follows:

For invalid pensions	6
Revolutionary pension, under act March 18, 1818	1
Do. do. under act May 15, 1828	2
Do. do. under act June 7, 1832	166
Do. do. under act July 4, 1836	36

Total rejected applications - - - 211

And, on motion of Mr. Briggs, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Dec. 27. After the presentation of petitions and memorials, several reports were received, among them a bill from the committee of ways and means, reported by Mr. Cambreleng, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government for the year 1837; which bill was read twice, and committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

A message was received from the president of the United States, transmitting proceedings of a late convention held in Michigan, for accepting the conditions of the act of congress for admitting the state of Michigan into the union; of which message a copy will be found in this day's proceedings of the senate.

The message was read; and.

On motion of Mr. Craig, the message and accompanying documents were referred to the committee on the judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Briggs,

Resolved, That the committee on invalid pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing to the widows and children of the officers and soldiers of the late war with Great Britain, the pensions to which their husbands and fathers were entitled.

On motion of Mr. Cushman,

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reviving the act granting pensions to the widows and orphan children of persons who were employed on board of private armed vessels of the United States, who died in such employment during the late war.

On motion of Mr. Smith,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act entitled "an act for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States," passed March 2, 1831, to such persons who were indebted to the United States in the manner provided for by said act on the 1st day of January last past.

On motion of Mr. Everett,

Resolved, That the committee on the library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of publishing a stereotype edition of the laws of the United States.

Mr. Cambreleng offered the following resolution.

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing all laws authorising protections to be issued to American seamen.

Mr. C. briefly explained the object of this resolution. He said it was matter of surprise that these laws had not been repealed before this time. In the early stages of our government, in the infancy of our dangers, such laws were necessary. But now, the time had arrived when the flag of our country was in itself a sufficient protection. The American seamen were taxed heavily for the payment of these protections; and no necessity, he thought, existed for their continuance.

Mr. Parker was understood to oppose the object of the resolution on the ground that there were many cases in which such protections were indispensable; such, for instance, as shipwreck.

Mr. McKeon hoped that the gentleman from New Jersey would yield his objections. It was merely for inquiry, and he trusted that the house would not oppose a proposition which made an inquiry into the propriety of relieving a highly deserving class of our citizens from an onerous tax. Mr. Parker said he would not oppose the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. D. J. Pearce said that he should, at a proper time, object to any alteration in the law referred to. It had been adopted with a view to increase the number of American seamen. The resolution, like many others submitted to this house, looked to an existing evil, and took the present year as a standard for years to come. The law, as it now stood, served to increase the number of our seamen; the resolution, to his mind, looked to a decrease.

Mr. Cambreleng could not understand how the removal of an actual existing tax upon seamen was to decrease their number. In his opinion, the tax ought to be abolished. If the committee on commerce should see any reason why it should be continued, he would yield his own opinion to that committee. He wished to refer it to them simply as a matter of inquiry. So far as he had himself examined the subject, and from the information he had collected from sources where the subject ought to be best understood, he was decidedly of opinion that the law ought to be abolished.

Mr. Gillett hoped the resolution would pass; but suggested to Mr. Cambreleng so to enlarge the resolution as to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the fees.

Mr. Cambreleng accepted the modification.

Mr. Adams said he was very glad the proposition had been made; that he hoped the subject would be referred to the committee on commerce, and that they would consider it in all its aspects, and present a report on which the house might act with deliberation. It was a great and important change which was proposed to be made in the condition of the seamen of the United States. He had said it was a great and important change; great and important in the present state of things, and which might become much more important from day to day by a change, not in our own condition, but in that of other nations. He had his doubts, therefore, whether this resolution was not too extensive. If, however, a report was made by the committee on commerce, they would present their views fully on the subject. He had his doubts whether it was expedient to repeal all the laws for the protection of American seamen. He doubted very much whether, even in a state of peace, American seamen ought not to be furnished with some document or paper, constituting their national character, which should protect them over the surface of the globe. He did not know but that, in the present condition of the world, American seamen might cross over the ocean without any serious damage from wanting such a document; but inasmuch as they had been possessed of such a document for more than forty years, he had some hesitation in abolishing it altogether, lest thereby that very useful and important class of men should lose the protection which was afforded them by that document, when distant from their country.

The world, or, at least, the United States, had been at peace for upwards of twenty years; and there might be gentlemen in that house who did not know what was the origin of the protection which it was now proposed to take away. It originated in the practice of impressment by the British government in time of war; the practice of taking out of all vessels every seaman whom the officers of the British armed ships might think proper to consider as a British subject. The United States had endured this national indignity, and our seamen had endured this heavy affliction, for a period of five and twenty years, during all the wars of the French revolution: and all these laws had been founded upon the practice of the British government, by which, from the moment it entered upon or projected a war, the king, by an order of council, authorised his officers on the sea to take British seamen wherever they were to be found, without regard to their condition, without regard to their rights, and without regard to the engagements by which they might be bound. This order of the British council was not legal, even in England, in time of peace; but the king, by his prerogative, had the power of making war; and whenever he projected any thing like hostilities against another nation, from that moment an order of council was issued to take British seamen wherever they were to be found, from all American vessels. By this order, for twenty-five years, every seaman whom the officer sent to search or examine our vessels chose to consider as a British subject was taken, and the only check or counter-acting influence ever enjoyed by the U. States was this very same protection which it was now proposed to take away. It was introduced as an expedient for saving native American citizens, or naturalized American citizens from being taken away in this manner, and impressed on board the British ships of war, to serve the king of England for an indefinite length of time; to expose their lives in his wars, and to be entirely deprived of that protection which their country owed them. Now, he hoped that, if the resolution passed, and was considered by the committee, they would consider it with very serious reference to this state of things; and that, if all the laws of protection were to be repealed, they would provide some substitute by which the American seaman should still be protected. He hoped it was not the intention of the gentleman from New York (Mr. Cambreleng) to take from the seaman the actual protection of his country.

Mr. Cambreleng explained that the role d'equipage, which every master of a vessel took from the custom house, was a sufficient protection to the sailor when on the ocean. He did not see that any American seaman could require a greater protection. The law of the land expressly provided that no seaman should be discharged abroad; on that score, therefore, there was no difficulty. It was not his design to take away any protection from seamen; he wished only to relieve them from a grievous tax, if it could be done without impairing any important principle.

Mr. Adams, in continuation, said it had not been his intention when he rose to oppose the resolution, nor did he mean now to oppose it; but he did mean to remind the house that a proposition thus made was a proposition involving a question of peace and war; and it was a question of peace and war with no less a power than Great Britain; and he hoped that the committee would view the subject with reference to that role d'equipage which the gentleman from New York declared to be a sufficient protection. Did not that gentleman know that there was not an officer in the British service who would look upon it as any more than a piece of waste paper? If the order of council, authorising this impressment of seamen, were issued to-morrow, and it infallibly would be issued in case Great Britain was arrayed against any maritime power—against France, Russia, Sweden, Denmark, or any other power—I ask the gentleman what good his role d'equipage would do to protect an American citizen, native or otherwise, against that order? It would be no protection at all. But the British officers would ransack every vessel of the ocean, and would take out every able-bodied man whom they chose to say was a British subject. And what would we do? We would remonstrate; we would instruct our minister in England to remonstrate; and we would cavil and quarrel as we did twenty-five years ago; and, finally, we would come to a war. That was the cause of the war; there never would have been a war but for that cause; it was a war as righteous as was ever waged on the face of the earth; and much as he abhorred war upon earth, he hoped it would come in less than twenty-five weeks, if a seaman should ever again be taken out of an American vessel. That was the cause of the war.

Twenty-two years had now elapsed, during which, in time of peace, the United States had been constantly endeavoring to settle this matter with Great Britain, and had never been able to do so. The United States had made war, and had been obliged to make peace, without remedying the evil.—Would they, then, now take away this protection from an American seaman, not perhaps very necessary, yet it might be very proper in time of peace? This was a proper subject for inquiry by a committee. But he wished especially to caution the house against the abolition of that particular protection, without something were substituted which would secure the seaman on the ocean. As to the fees which the seaman paid for the protection, he (Mr. A.) would vote for their abolition at this time; but, under the color of relieving the sailor from that trifle, he was not willing to take from him that which was a talisman to carry him safe through the world, against the practice of the British government, (and he did not wish to bandy words or to qualify the truth), of seizing seamen upon every occasion to serve the British king; and, under the pretence that he spoke the same language, taking it for granted that every stout able-bodied American seaman was a British subject. He wished to say no more, nor did he wish to oppose the resolution.

Mr. Cushing said he did not rise for the particular purpose of opposing the adoption of the resolution before the house. Indeed, he thought some inquiry, upon a point closely connected with the present, not undesirable. He referred to the provision of the law requiring the employment in the merchant service of a certain proportion of American, as distinguished from foreign, mariners.—Owing to causes not immediate only, as implied in the remarks of the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. Pearce), not temporary only, but permanent in their operation, there is a deficiency of seamen for the supply of our mercantile as well as our military marine. Not only does the difficulty exist, but it operates unequally in the different parts of the United States. At some custom houses, as he (Mr. C.) had had occasion to know in his own business, there is more of rigor in the administration of the law in this respect, in others less; which gives a sensible advantage to the commerce of those ports where the most liberality is manifested. It might deserve consideration whether some relaxation of the existing laws in that particular may not be proper and expedient. There certainly could be no serious objection to having the subject examined by a committee.

But (Mr. C. said) he wished to object most distinctly and emphatically to the reasons with which the gentleman from New York (Mr. Cambreleng) advocated the passage of the resolution. He entertained views the very opposite of those which that gentleman had expressed.

The gentleman from New York says a protection is not necessary to the seaman, because the role d'equipage will indicate his citizenship. But is not the role a secondary piece of evidence only, made up from the protections themselves? And what foreign officer, then, would receive the role as conclusive proof of the citizenship of any individual whose name happened to be borne upon it? Beside which, the individual needs a document which may accompany his person. But the role d'équipage belongs to the ship. The individual seaman may be discharged. His contract of service may expire in a foreign port. The ship may be wrecked. And what, then, becomes of his protection? Is it not self-evident that he should have a separate document to prove his citizenship to accompany himself wherever he navigates the sea?

But Mr. C. had a still graver difference with the gentleman from New York. He (Mr. Cambreleg) seems to think there is something discreditable, either to the country or the individual, in the fact of the latter bearing a protection. Is not this a most mistaken view of the subject? I heartily rejoice, (said Mr. Cushing), in common with the gentleman from New York, that a series of brilliant naval victories, during the last war, has vindicated the honor of our flag in this matter; and I trust we shall never cease to maintain the same controversy with equal decision and triumph. But is it dishonorable to carry a protection? By no means.—How stands the fact? If an American citizen desires to travel in foreign countries, he sends to the department of state, and, upon proof of his citizenship, obtains a passport; if a seaman desires to pass on the ocean, he repairs to an officer of the customs, and on similar proof obtains a protection. The things differ in name: in substance they are one. Each of them is a certificate, signed by some officer of the government authorized by law, attesting the citizenship of the individual named and described in the document. Is it any disgrace to the U. States to give, or the citizen to receive, such a document? Surely not. The protection is to the mariner at sea what the passport is to the landsman on shore. Am I (said Mr. C.) dishonored by bearing such a document in foreign lands or distant seas? On the contrary, is it not matter of pride, as well as convenience, that, armed only with a paper bearing the seal of the United States, I may travel the earth over, secure, in every place, of the protection of the ministers of my country, of the goodwill of the functionaries of other countries allied with us, and, if need be, of the guns and whole public force of the republic to vindicate any injury done to my person? That I may go unharmed throughout the world, under the magic influence of the broad seal of the United States?

Besides, it is not material to remember, as suggested by my honorable colleague, (Mr. Adams), the origin of the particular usefulness of protection? We speak the language, inherit the blood, and wear the features of the inhabitants of the British islands, from whom most of us are descended.—Shall we hastily abandon the use of a document which certifies the citizenship of the seaman, and reclaims for him, as its name denotes, the protection of his nation? Which affords him the convenient proof of his nationality, which his person and language do not furnish? And to maintain which the United States should stand ready now, as they had heretofore done, to recur, if necessary, to the ultimate remedy of war?

One thing, in this connection, (Mr. C. said) deserved the interposition of this house. The landsman, though probably better able than the mariner to pay for his passport, obtained it from the department of state free of cost. The seaman ought to have his free of cost. The fee paid by him to the customs for his protection ought to be immediately abolished, and then the situation of all citizens, in this particular, would be equal. And he should insist, if the resolution was to be adopted, on amending it to this effect.

Mr. Cambreleg expressed his astonishment at what had fallen from the honorable gentleman (Mr. Cushing); this was the first time he (Mr. C.) had even heard that protections were given to our seamen with a view to their convenience when on their travels in foreign countries.

He must express his astonishment at the pertinacity with which some members still persisted in holding allegiance to the British flag. The protection referred to had nothing to do with travelling in foreign countries. Every captain of a vessel was bound by the law to pay three months' wages to a seaman if he left him in a foreign port; if in an island where there was no consul of ours residing, yet a captain dare not leave any of his hands, because the owners of the vessel are liable. No protection is necessary to the seaman for these purposes, and therefore, the tax imposed upon that useful class is both odious and unnecessary. That tax, (Mr. C. observed), was not merely 25 cents as the honorable gentleman (Mr. Cushing), had stated; on the contrary, it was more than a dollar. As to the origin which had been assigned to these protections by the honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. J. Q. Adams), Mr. C. desired that our flag alone should be a protection to our seamen, and not a paltry slip of paper for which they were made to pay an onerous and odious tax. This was the chief cause of the last war, namely, that our flag was not itself alone a sufficient protection, that it was not sufficiently respected. But as to whether these protections could operate in warding off the calamity of war, Mr. C. ridiculed the idea. He (Mr. C.) must beg the honorable gentleman's pardon, (Mr. J. Q. Adams), but really he must say that he (Mr. A.) appeared to him ever on the alert to watch each little speck upon the horizon and make it out as if it were a cloud portending war; he (Mr. A.) could see nothing before him on that horizon but war and blood. These laws, (Mr. C. said), he had thought for years past were unnecessary and ought to be repealed; he hoped, therefore, they would be totally abolished.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution as modified, and determined in the affirmative.

Mr. Wise's resolution for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the conduct of the different departments, together with Mr. Pearce's proposed amendment to the same resolution, being the first thing in the orders of the day—

The resolution having been read, Mr. Cambreleg moved that its consideration be postponed till Thursday next, in order to take up several bills which he deemed of great importance.

Mr. Dunlap, of Tennessee, protested against the further postponement of a decision upon Mr. Wise's resolution. For weeks he had wanted to call the attention of the house to the business of his constituents, when its proper order should bring it up; and he was against interrupting the regular order of business in the manner proposed to favor any particular bills before the house. Here was a resolution, he said, to which no member of the house ought to object, and least of all ought the friends of the administration, which had been attacked, and ought to court inquiry into its conduct, to resort to this expedient of postponement to prevent action upon it, &c.

Mr. Cambreleg repelled the charge of postponing this resolution in order to evade the question of inquiry. Not only in this, but in the last session, he had voted affirmatively on every question involving an inquiry into the affairs of government; the only object he now had in view was the public benefit, as several bills relating to appropriations of immediate necessity were waiting to be passed. If, however, the house should seem to desire it, he (Mr. C.) would withdraw his motion to postpone.

The house was proceeding to the debate upon this resolution, when

Mr. Pickens observed that, as he did not see the honorable mover of this resolution (Mr. Wise) in his seat, and as that gentleman, no doubt, would be anxious to watch the progress of the debate, and perhaps might wish to make a reply to what had been opposed to his resolution, perhaps it would be according to parliamentary use, and respectful to the mover, to postpone the subject until his return. He therefore moved that it be made the special order of the day for Thursday next.

At the suggestion of Mr. Harper, Tuesday next was substituted, it being doubtful whether Mr. Wise would be in his seat on Thursday.

Mr. Boon hoped the consideration of this important subject would not be postponed another hour; for if it were much further postponed, it would be too late in the session to obtain the information to be called for.

The question of postponement was then put; and a division being called for, there appeared 98 for the postponement, and 51 against it. So the further consideration of the subject was postponed, and made the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

The engrossed bill to regulate the disposition, in certain cases, of the proceeds of lands belonging to the Indian tribes, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

The house then again resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the bill concerning the mint (to consolidate all existing and some other regulations concerning the mint and coinage).

The question being upon the motion of Mr. Harper to strike out 140 grains, (the proposed weight for the new cent,) and insert in lieu of it 168 grains, the weight of the present cent.

The debate on this proposition was resumed, in which the motion was opposed by Mr. Cambreleg and Mr. McKim, and supported by Mr. Harper, and at more length and with great earnestness by Mr. Adams.

The motion of Mr. Harper was finally agreed to, without a division; and Mr. Adams then, as the section had been amended, withdrew his motion to strike out the section respecting copper coin.

Mr. Harper then moved further to amend the bill, so as to reduce the minimum amount of gold and silver bullion receivable at the mint for coinage from two hundred to one hundred dollars; in support of which he made some cogent observations.

Mr. Cambreleg made no opposition to this motion.

The motion was agreed to, nem. con.

Mr. Adams then moved to amend the bill so as to raise the proposed weight of "the dime, or tenth part of a dollar," from 40 to 41½ grains, so as to make it correspond in weight with the weight of the new dollar (412½ grains). Unless this amendment was made, Mr. A. said, the bill would include the absurdity of declaring that the tenth part of 412½ was 40! Mr. A. protested, besides, against this debasement of the dime, one of the most useful of our coins, because it was entirely at war with the decimal system, as well as tending in practice to introduce confusion into the currency.

Mr. Cambreleg inclined to agree in the propriety of this amendment, being as much opposed as the gentleman from Massachusetts to depreciating the coin. The reduced weight had been introduced into the bill at the suggestion of the director of the mint, from a desire that these coins should be kept in circulation by being made less liable to be exported or melted up, and also because the coinage of small coins was more expensive to the mint than of the large.

The amendment moved by Mr. Adams was agreed to without a division. The mint bill was then laid aside; and

The bill (before the same committee) for making further appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities, was taken up and read through, no objection being made to it.

Both the bills were then reported to the house; and the amendments to the mint bill were immediately taken up for consideration.

The question being on concurring in the amendment which strikes out the provision making cents and half cents a legal tender for all sums less than a dime, it was opposed by Mr. Gillett, who maintained that if the coin was made, it ought to be a legal tender to some amount, if for no more, at least for half a dime; and he made a motion so to amend the bill.

Mr. Adams suggesting that this amendment had been introduced on the motion of a gentleman now absent, proposed on that ground to postpone the further consideration of the bill, unless gentlemen would consent to let the bill pass as amended.

Mr. Gillett's opposition, however, was overruled by the house; and the amendment made in committee of the whole was concurred in by the house: yeas 86.

Mr. Gillett then moved to strike out the 12th section (being all that part of the bill which establishes the weight and value of the copper coin). The motion was negatived, without a count; and

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Indian hostilities appropriation bill, as well as the bill making appropriations for payment of the revolutionary pensioners, were then also ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and

The house adjourned.

Wednesday, Dec. 28. Mr. Howard reported a bill to provide for carrying into effect the treaty of limits, and the additional article thereto, between the United States of America and the United Mexican States; which bill was read twice, and committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

On motion of Mr. Turrill,

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing a survey and accurate chart to be made of the coasts of lakes Ontario and Erie.

Mr. Love submitted the following resolution which lies on the table one day, under the rule:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to report to this house the survey and examination made of a harbor at the east end of Lake Erie, connecting the present harbors of Buffalo and Black Rock, together with his opinion of the practicability of the construction of said harbor, and of its utility and necessity in regard to the increasing commerce upon that lake.

On motion of Mr. Mann, of N. Y.

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prescribing the effects of judgments of the courts of the United States on liens in the several states, and regulating the fees of clerks of the several districts.

Mr. Gideon Lee offered a resolution, directing the committee on the post office and post roads to inquire into the expediency of erecting, or otherwise procuring, a fire proof building for the use of the post office department in New York, which was agreed to.

Mr. Vanderpoel offered the following resolution:
Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the office of agent of claims at Paris and London.

Mr. V. said we had been going on for a number of years paying the consuls at Paris and at London $2,000 per annum, each, as the agents of claims.—He could not find any law creating that office.—Originally, there had been some necessity for employing such agents, but he did not know that there were now any claims requiring their attention, or authorizing the payment of these annual allowances. At all events, let us call things by their right names. If two thousand dollars were allowed to them as consuls, be it so; but the very idea of allowing it to them as agents of claims was opposed to the law.—During the past year, the agent at London had been receiving for rent, fuel, stationary, &c. $3,500; besides $2,000 as agent of claims, and two or three thousand dollars for fees.

Mr. Taylor offered the following resolution:
Resolved, That the committee on revolutionary pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the third section of the act entitled "an act granting half pay to widows or orphans where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1836, so as to extend the provisions of that section to all widows of officers and soldiers of the war of the revolution whose husbands were entitled to a pension, excepting cases of second marriage after the termination of the war.

Mr. T. addressed the house at some length in favor of the resolution. After which, it was adopted.

Mr. Hard offered the following resolution:
Resolved, That the committee on public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for granting to each of the disbanded officers who served in the late war with Great Britain a quantity of land, according to rank, as a remuneration for sacrifices and services rendered by them in that war.

A brief debate now ensued in which Messrs. Williams, of N. C. and Craig opposed the resolution and Messrs. Hard, Mann and Hardin advocated it. Mr. Craig at the conclusion of his remarks, moved to lay the resolution on the table, when Mr. Chambers called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the motion of Mr. Craig agreed to—yeas 121, nays 70.

On motion of Mr. Gillett,
Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of creating, at the seat of government, a board of claims to receive and examine all claims against the government, and to report thereon to congress, for final adjustment.

On motion of Mr. Howard,
Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a naval academy.

Mr. McKenna offered the following resolution, which lies one day:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to report to this house what sums, if any, have been claimed by the respective disbursing officers of that department, and what sums have been allowed them in the settlement of their accounts for difference of exchange on moneys paid out by them since the 1st of December, 1835, giving the names of the officers, the sums disbursed by each, and the places where the disbursements were made.

On motion of Mr. Chambers, of Pennsylvania,
Resolved, That it be referred to the committee on the library to consider the expediency of reporting a bill providing for the engraving and publication of copies of the various medals struck in relation to important events in the United States, before and since the Declaration of Independence, with an account or statement of the events or occasion which said medals were designed to commemorate.

The hour devoted to reports and resolutions having expired, Mr. E. Whittlesey made an ineffectual motion to suspend the rule for the purpose of continuing the call for resolutions.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the postmaster general, transmitting, in obedience to the act reorganizing the post office department, passed July 2, 1836, an estimate of the sums of money expected to be required for the service of the year commencing July 1, 1837, as follows, viz:

The transportation of the mails	$3,200,000
Ship, steamboat, and way letters	31,000
Compensation of postmasters	985,000
Wrapping paper	20,000

Office furniture	6,000
Advertising	25,000
Mail bags	40,000
Blanks	36,000
Mail locks, keys and stamps	9,000
Mail depredations and special agents	12,000
Clerks for offices	140,000
Miscellaneous	40,000
	$4,494,000

The letter and estimates were, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, referred to the committee of ways and means.

The following engrossed bills, viz:

The bill supplementary to the act regulating the mint and fixing the weight of the respective coins;
The bill making appropriations for Indian hostilities;

The bill making an appropriation for revolutionary and other pensioners for the year 1837; were severally read a third time, passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

Mr. Owens then moved that the rules of the house be suspended for the purpose of calling for resolutions in the order of the states; on which motion a division was called for, when there appeared for the motion 105, against it 82; the rules of the house were accordingly suspended, and resolutions called for in the order of the states, commencing with N. York.

Mr. Harper offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be, and they are hereby instructed forthwith to report a bill to repeal the provisions of the tenth and twelfth clauses of the second section of the tariff law of the 14th July, 1832.

Some observations were made in various parts of the house upon this resolution; and Mr. Cambreleng assured the honorable mover that a bill was already prepared and would come up to-morrow, by which the whole object and aim of the resolution would be attained. In the end Mr. Harper consented for the present to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. Galbraith moved a resolution proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States concerning the mode of electing president and vice president of the United States, which was referred to the existing committee on amendments to the constitution.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury communicate to this house, if within his power, the dividends and surpluses which were declared by, and the surpluses and contingent funds remaining in, the several banks in which the public money is deposited, for the years 1833, 1834, 1835 and 1836, severally.

The house having agreed now to consider this resolution, a discussion took place on the question whether the inquiry should also extend to the expenses of the banks as well as to their profits. An amendment to this effect having been offered by Mr. Gillett.

Mr. Waddy Thompson opposed this amendment. He deemed it of no manner of consequence what the expenses of the banks might have been. The object of the resolution was to ascertain their net profits, and their expenses would of course be first deducted. If an inquiry of this nature should be instituted, Mr. T. flattered himself it would bring to light a system of corruption so vast and so extensive, that no country whatever, be its people ever so virtuous and honest, could possibly stand before such a power of corruption. Mr. T. proceeded to instance the case of a little bank in Michigan, with a very small capital, which bank had received eight hundred thousand dollars of deposit, though not entitled, according to its capital, to more than a very small proportion of that amount. After a few more observations,

Mr. Harlan moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Gillett by adding as follows: "and that he state also whether the salary of an agent at the seat of the general government compose a part of the expenses of said banks, the name of the agent, and the several sums paid him by said institutions respectively."

Mr. Hannegan moved to lay the resolution on the table.

A motion to adjourn was made by Mr. Boon, and decided in the affirmative.

So the house adjourned without passing upon Mr. Garland's resolution.

Thursday, Dec. 29. Among the memorials presented on Wednesday was one by Mr. Galbraith, from James R. Snowden and twenty-four others, "citizens of Pennsylvania," suggesting to congress the expediency of restricting the states, by an amendment to the constitution, from incorporating banking companies and limiting them in their issues of bank notes; representing, also, that the bank incorporated by the legislature of Pennsylvania by the title of the bank of the United States is reissuing the notes of the old bank of the United States, and inquiring of congress whether the fact be as reported, and, if so, whether there be any means in the power of congress to prevent it.

This memorial Mr. Galbraith yesterday moved to refer to a select committee; and, debate arising on this proposition, it lay over till this day; and, as soon as the sitting was opened, the question was stated on the proposed reference of the memorial.

A debate ensued, in which the whole policy of the monetary system of the country was discussed, and which occupied the exclusive attention of the house until past three o'clock. The house was addressed by Messrs. Galbraith, Lincoln, Harper, Mann, D. J. Pearce, Denny, Chambers, of Penn., Vanderpoel, and H. Everett.

Mr. Lincoln moved the commitment of the memorial to the same select committee to which had been referred that portion of the president's message which relates to amendments of the constitution, and all other propositions of a similar character.

Mr. D. J. Pearce moved the commitment to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Everett having concluded his remarks, Mr. Hannegan called for the previous question, which the house seconded—yeas, 86, nays 75.

Mr. Williams, of N. C. called for the yeas and nays on the question of taking the main question; which were ordered, and were—yeas 108, nays 84. So the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. Everett asked that the question might be taken first on that portion of the memorial which related to the proposed amendment to the constitution; and, secondly, on that portion relative to the issue by the bank of Pennsylvania of the old notes of the United States bank; and the division was ordered.

And the main question being on the commitment of the first portion of the memorial to the committee of ways and means, was taken, and decided in the negative.

And the second portion of the main question being on the commitment of the second part of the memorial to the committee of ways and means, was then taken, and decided in the negative.

So the house refused to commit the memorial to the committee of ways and means.

The question then recurred on committing the first portion of the memorial to a select committee, as moved by Mr. Galbraith; which motion prevailed.

And the question was then taken on committing the second portion of the memorial to the said select committee; and was decided in the affirmative.

So the memorial was referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the navy, transmitting the report of the naval commission who have been recently engaged in the examination of the navy yard at Pensacola, and the report of com. Stewart on the same subject.

The speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the treasury, in obedience to the resolution of the 26th instant, transmitting a statement made by the collector of New York, under date of the 19th instant, viz:

Amount of bonds under the provisions of the act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York, approved March 19, 1836.

Amount renewed under the first section of the act	$911,020 50
Do. do. second section	136,142 01

	$1,047,162 51
--	----------------

Amount yet to be renewed under the first section	12,233 70
Do. second section	3,600 36
	15,834 06

	$1,062,996 57
--	----------------

Amount of bonds renewed under the second section, paid	59,468 33
Interest paid on the same	1,664 37
	$61,132 70

District of N. Y. collector's office, Dec. 19, 1836.

SAM. SWARTWOUT, collector.

Mr. Lowe, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which was rejected the resolution presented yesterday by Mr. Hard, proposing an inquiry into the expediency of granting bounty lands to the officers of the United States army who served in the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. L. moved to postpone the consideration of his motion to reconsider until Wednesday next; which motion prevailed; and, on motion of Mr. Seymour, the house adjourned.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

MR. WISE'S SPEECH.

In the house of representatives on Tuesday the 13th ult. Mr. Wise arose and offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the president's message as relates to the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation, be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various executive departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said departments, or agents of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled, or failed to accomplish, the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured or impaired the public service and interest. And that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper.

Mr. Wise then addressed the house as follows:

Mr. Chairman: In submitting the resolution of reference which I have sent to the chair, I deem it my duty to offer some reflections to the house and to the country.

Sir, this paper is the last annual message of Andrew Jackson. The contemplation of it as such is deeply affecting to the sincere lover of him, and solemnly mournful to the honest lover of his country.

What should the last annual message of Andrew Jackson have been? Who is he, what has he been? The answer to this question ought to determine what this last act of its kind of his should have been.

A man of humble but respectable origin, he was born in the times of his country's travail for independence. His precocious spirit of resistance to oppression marked his infant body with the scars of the revolution. After the times which tried men's souls had passed away; after the blessings of freedom had been secured by all the monuments of the institutions of our fathers, the fruits of peace, and virtue, and wisdom, and jealous patriotism; after varied and chequered scenes of private and public life, under a destiny adverse only so far as it was full of dangers, in games not Olympic, in contests not heroic, we find him in the midst of his country's second troubles, a citizen soldier, a major general of the army of the republic.

He "was ambitious of fame; and as long as mankind shall continue to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors, the thirst of military glory will ever be the vice of the most exalted characters." A bold, energetic, and dauntless commander, he carried conquest, in spite of all dangers and difficulties, into the wilderness of the savage tribes of the southern frontier; was the daring but successful and justified invader of a neutral territory, and finally "filled the measure of his country's glory" in defence of Orleans, where he assumed to be the arbiter of martial law, the judge advocate of men's allegiance—where he conquered the conquerors of Napoleon—where he professed and practised submission to the civil authority, and where he acquired the title of hero. And there was created, I will not say "a dear-bought debt of gratitude" from his country.

"Hail, second saviour!" was shouted from the lips of every grateful heart, and echoed from every hill and valley; his name was emblazoned high on the rolls of imperishable military fame, and peace was quick to hallow his victory. With peace his warlike occupations were gone, but civil honors were showered and thickened around him. From the camp he rose to a seat in the senate chamber—for then the senate chamber was higher than the camp. He bore, or seemed to bear, his honors patiently; but all that had been done, or could be done, it seemed, was not enough for him in the estimation of a generous people. He was nominated for the first place on earth—the presidency of these united, sovereign and independent states of America; for then these states were united, sovereign and independent. Civilians and statesmen, of proudest names and stations, were his competitors, but he was the people's candidate against men in office, against the powers that were, against their intrigues, their patronage, and their caucuses; and in consideration thereof, and of his just appellation of hero, he was most popular and strongest in the plurality of votes. He was defeated—defeated here in this hall, in the house of representatives, by men such as we are—and what we, the representatives of the people are, I will not name—by means I will not describe.

It is sufficient to say that the manner of his defeat was not only enough to ensure his subsequent triumph, but to rivet him immovably, right or wrong, in the hearts of his countrymen forever. He became the champion of popular rights and the elective franchise, against officeholders and office-seekers—the favorite pet of the people, who was to scourge bribery and corruption, whose name was to be a terror to all evil-doers, whose policy was to be retrenchment and reform, by whom the independence of congress, of executive patronage, was to be maintained, by whom that patronage was to be curtailed to harmlessness, and in whom "the line of safe precedents" was to be broken and destroyed. He was swept and rushed along on the roaring tide of an overwhelming popularity high up into office, on the second flood, and that popularity has never deserted him—no fickleness in it, it has never retired for a moment; notwithstanding strong winds which have blown from every point of the compass, and opposing currents in every direction, it has continued to swell and swell, until it has become a flood—I will not say, which threatens the dry land. He came into power professing and proclaiming the most severe, ay, stoical democratic principles; the people confided in him, were bound to him the closer, and have never wavered yet in their confidence—I will not say, though he has tried it to the uttermost. Unfortunately for him, when he was crowned with the rewards for his military services, and was inducted into office, he not only found "competitors to be removed, enemies to be punished," but he was beset by friends from whom he should have put up prayers to be saved. I will not say that he was lacking in those magnanimous qualifications of a truly great man, which alone could rid him and guard him from these misfortunes—for man, poor feeble man, is weak under the most ordinary temptations, and his virtue must be strong who presides in a palace—but misfortunes they were.

So it was, he was buoyed up in the affections of the sovereign people. Has he done wrong? He was popular. Has he done worse than wrong? He was popular, and he was the president who could do no wrong, in whom popularity was joined with power and patronage. Has ruthless proscription for opinion's sake turned faithful public servants out of their employments, and snatched from the mouths of their families their bread? We are told the president ordered the removals, and the people had sanctioned proscription! Has favoritism filled the vacancies which proscription has made, with the servile tools of party to do the bidding of power? We are told that the president had need of his own friends, and that the people have sanctioned the maxim, "that to the victors belong the spoils!"—Have the highest and richest offices, worth more than half of a million, been bestowed as rewards upon members of congress, and has "corruption become the order of the day?" We are told that the president was the best judge of the selection of high functionaries, and that the people have sanctioned the "order of the day!" As "till the reign of Severus, the virtue and even the good sense of the emperors had been distinguished by their zeal or affected reverence for the Roman senate, and by a tender regard to the nice frame of civil policy instituted by Augustus," so had the virtue and even the good sense of preceding presidents, till the reign of Andrew Jackson, been distinguished by their zeal and reverence for the American senate, and by a tender regard for the nice frame of civil policy instituted by the fathers of our republic! Had "his youth," like that of Severus, "been trained in the implicit obedience of camps, and his riper years spent in the despotism of military command, could not his haughty and inflexible spirit discover, or would he not acknowledge, the advantage of preserving an intermediate power, however imaginary, between the emperor and the army?"

As in the reign of Severus was "the senate filled with polished and eloquent slaves from the eastern (and I may add southern) provinces, who justified personal flattery by speculative principles of servitude!" Have the lawyers of his reign, whom I will not call Papinians or Pauluses, or Ulpian, "concurred in teaching that the imperial authority was held not by the delegated commission, but by the irrevocable resignation of the senate? and that the emperor might destroy vested rights and the incorporations of law by his sic volo?" We are told that the aristocratic senate had dared to offend the majesty of the president, and that the people have sanctioned the word "expunge!" Has the independence of congress been totally destroyed by corrupt bribes and the power of appointing members to office?

We are told that the representatives of the people are selected to do the will of the president, and that the people have sanctioned the creed that these can be no treason to the country so long as there is fidelity to "the party." Has the president "assumed the responsibility," seized the custody and the control of the public money in defiance of all law and precedent, and placed them in the hands of a traitor, and a perjured knave? We are told that the monster bank was his enemy, and that the people have sanctioned the "union of the purse and the sword." Has he assumed to himself judicial powers and the prerogative to administer the laws and the constitution according to his own interpretation and his own irresponsible will? We are told that the president's conscience alone is concerned in their execution, and that the people have sanctioned in him the power of imperial magistrate. As imperial magistrate has he "assumed the conduct and style of a sovereign and conqueror, and exercised, without disguise, the whole legislative as well as executive power?" We are told that the president is "the government," and that the people have sanctioned the pretension that all offices and their powers are his! Have the expenditures of his administration increased and grown enormously beyond all example, to 88 millions from 15 millions, without a cent of public debt to be paid? We are told that the president is the best judge of the wants of the country, and that the people have sanctioned wasteful and profligate extravagance! Have thousands and hundreds of thousands been expended on east rooms, and gravel walks, and all the regalia of a palace in fact, for a republican officer in form? We are told that the president's court should be as splendid as any king's, and that the people have sanctioned royalty! Has the patronage of the federal government been tremendously increased and exerted in conflict with the freedom of elections? We are told that the reign of the president should be perpetuated, and that the people have sanctioned the interference of officeholders with the elective franchise! Has the currency of the country been totally deranged, and is there danger of a universal crash in trade and finance? We are told that the president's golden experiment must be fully tested to our hearts' content, and that the people have sanctioned the "inverted pyramid" of local bank paper rags, which threatens to totter over our heads! Has "the fine theory of a republic insensibly vanished, and made way for the more natural and substantial feelings of a monarchy? We are told that the president may be a king by the will of the people, and that the people have already consented to the change! Has the president been "freed from the restraint of civil laws, can he command by his arbitrary will the lives and fortunes of his subjects, and," finally, "has he disposed of the empire as of his private patrimony" by nominating and electing his successor? We are told that the president was entitled to his right of election as well as other men, and that the people have sanctioned and submitted to his dictation!

Sir, let me not be misunderstood. Let no one infer that I am indulging in any tirade against the president, or that I am venting any spleen whatever. No, sir; no. Far, far be it from me now, now when it is too late, if ever it was right and proper to indulge in stronger invective against a chief magistrate than truth and patriotism required. He of whom I speak is, I deeply regret, now lying on the couch of human suffering, the last, I fear, from what I am told, of his suffering in this world of sorrow. I too have served him with more than half the zeal I ever served a more omnipotent master.—He will, if he lives, soon retire from the palace of power and resign all the pomp and circumstance of state and station into other hands, which are to reign after him. God grant, sir, that his retirement may be that peaceful and calm and blessed retirement from the harassing cares of office which belongs to wisdom, virtue, and the consciousness of being a public benefactor—such as was illustrated in the examples of a Washington and a Madison. My prayer fervently is, that he may yet live long at his beloved Hermitage, in the holy retreat of his own private sanctuary, and spend the decline of his days in solemn reflections upon the scenes and events of a long life, most actively spent in deeds big with the fate of a country he has defended, and of its institutions "hallowed by the wisdom of sages, and consecrated by the blood of heroes." May he live long to witness the effects of his errors, if errors he has committed, to acknowledge and repent of them; and in like manner to enjoy the blessings of his administration, if of any blessings it has been fruitful. No, sir; my meaning is not now to condemn the president, but to defend the people. This is the sole object of the questions I have put. I do not mean to accuse the president of all these enormities against civil liberty, of which I have asked —Is he guilty? Nor do I admit, if he is guilty of them, that the people have sanctioned all or any which I have enumerated. But, sir, I merely state the fact, that the party who claim to hold him in keeping, and to hold on to his power after him, claim and tell us that the people have yielded every thing worth preserving, and have sanctioned all these enormities, and more and worse. What their object may be in admitting these encroachments, and in claiming that the people have sanctioned and approved them, I know not, unless they mean hereafter to rely upon most "unsafe precedents!" The fact is alarmingly so, that these claims are now set up, going so far as to asperse the people whom they affect so much to reverence with approving and sanctioning proscription, corruption, arbitrary power, the destruction of the checks and balances of the government, profligate extravagance in its administration, executive dictation, royalty itself, and a caucus succession in an elective monarchy! In advance, I warn them that I now deny the fact that the people have sanctioned or approved of any such unpardonable sins against them or their only bulwarks of safety. If this people have yielded already what "the party" claim, they would have yielded all for which their fathers fought; and those fathers would rise, if the mighty dead could rise, from their very graves to reproach their debased degeneracy, and their cruel injustice alike to them and all posterity.

I have done no wrong to Jackson, then, as all candid minds will bear me witness; I have given him credit for "every captive he has brought to Rome." At the same time, I do not mean to say he has not committed many grievous errors. For many of them I can well account, though I cannot pardon. We are taught in history that "suspicious princes often promote the last of mankind from vain persuasion, that those who have no dependence, except on their favor, will have no attachment, except to the person of their benefactor." Thus were the Perennises and Cleanders promoted by a Commodus, and such ministers were well qualified to drive from the esteem of such a prince the "faithful councillors to whom a Marcus had recommended his son." The one "a servile and ambitious minister, who had obtained his post by the murder of his predecessor, but who possessed a considerable share of vigor and ability;" the other "was a Phrygian by birth, of a nation over whose stubborn but servile temper blows only could prevail. He had been sent from his native country to Rome in the capacity of a slave. As a slave he entered the imperial palace, rendered himself useful to his masters' passions, and rapidly ascended to the most exalted station which a subject could enjoy. His influence over the mind of Commodus was much greater than that of his predecessor. Avarice was the reigning passion of his soul, and the great principle of his administration. The rank of consul, of patrician, of senator was exposed to public sale. In the lucrative provincial employments the minister shared with the governor the spoils of the people. The execution of the laws was venal and arbitrary."

Is it astonishing that, with ministers like those of Commodus, tempted as they were by the public money in deposit, and by the vast public domain of this nation, stretching over rivers and lakes, and prairies of unbounded extent and inexhaustible fertility, Jackson was duped, and the public deposits were removed within reach of Perennis and Cleander? Again, sir, an incident in the history of this same emperor, very similar to the one in the history of our own president accounts for his hostility to the Roman senate. "One evening, as the emperor was returning to the palace through a dark and narrow portico, in the amphitheatre, an assassin, who waited his passage, rushed upon him, with a drawn sword, loudly exclaiming, 'The senate sends you this.' The conspiracy was proved to have been formed not in the senate, but within the walls of the palace." But "the words of the assassin sunk deep in the mind of Commodus, and left an indelible impression of fear and hatred against the whole body of the senate. The Delatores, a race of men discouraged, and almost extinguished under the former reigns, again became formidable as soon as they discovered that the emperor was desirous of finding disaffection and treason in the senate." Sir, we all know that in the snapping of a percussion cap the president heard distinctly the words, "The senate sends you this"—that that detestable race of men called Delators were ready to swear that the conspiracy was formed in the senate; and, if there was not a better reason, perhaps to the act of a madman now confined in prison might be ascribed the president's past hostility to the senate. But there is a better reason. "By declaring themselves the protectors of the people, Marius and Cæsar subverted the constitution of their country." And perhaps, in the histories of Marius and Cæsar, our modern Cleanders learned that an "humble and disarmed" senate is always "found a tractable and useful instrument of dominion."

In a certain event, if the election of president had failed in this house, an "humbled and disarmed senate" might have been found—a "tractable and useful instrument," indeed, to elect an Eglabulus, under whom another Hierocles might have enjoyed the honor of being "empress, husband;" and under whom a "dancer might have been made prefect of the city, a charioteer prefect of the watch, a barber prefect of the provisions," and all "recommended as fit officers—enormitate membrorum!" Sir, I might enumerate numberless such excuses for numberless such errors of the president, or rather of the president's ministers. But enough has been said, and I mean not to condemn or accuse him, I repeat, but defend the people whom "the party" accuse and condemn.

If it be true, as we are told, and I do not say it is not true, that the president has made and unmade men in office, has proscribed the faithful, has corrupted the pure, has humbled and disarmed the senate, has made the house of representatives servile and dependent, has seized and squandered the public money, has deranged the currency and endangered every man's estate, has controlled elections, has assumed royal prerogatives, made himself a king and a king his successor; and if it be also true, which I utterly deny, that the people have sanctioned all this exercise of absolute power, I ask gentlemen of all parties, those even who claim to be the exclusive keepers of the king's conscience, if this does not prove one virtue—the virtue of constancy, at least, in the people? Have they not been constant and confiding beyond measure in their attachment to him? Has their fault not been in too much confidence and constancy?

If what they say be true, and it is a main argument with them, that "the voice of the people is the voice of God;" that whatever Jackson has done they have sanctioned; that he spake and they will do it; that he vetoed, and they voted with him; that he dictated, and they obeyed, is this not proof positive that their affections and their voices have ever sustained, have ever animated, have ever indulged, have ever justified and excused him? Such unexampled confidence, such unexampled constancy, such unexampled attachment and affection were never witnessed before in any people towards any ruler; and I put it to the candor and sense of justice of all men to say whether what the people have yielded to their favorite has not been more, trebly more, than reward enough for all his services and sacrifices, however great? Admitting the debt of their gratitude to him to have been ever so great, I ask if the debt has not been more than paid? Whether the president does not now owe more than he can ever pay to a generous people, who have confidingly, to a criminal degree, entrusted him with their all—their honors, their rights, their liberties, their sovereign power? Sir, what can one aged man, fast hurrying to the grave, pay to a people in consideration of what all the treasures of earth, and all the blood of them and their children, may not buy? Nothing! Nothing! Yes, yes, there is one boon, one sacred legacy, of inestimable value, which, in parting from them and the world, he might have left them. He might have left them the legacy of a patriot's advice. He might have left them the truth, and solemnly imprinted it upon their minds and memories forever, that "they had trusted him too much," and his advice to them, "never, never in their history, to trust another man as they had trusted him," and he might have returned to them their trust, and have restored them to their senses. This, and this only, would have repaid them. It would have restored to them what has been taken from them, which alone can compensate for itself.

The last message of such a president to such a people should have been the "farewell" of a father to his children. It should have been deep in wisdom, profound in its philosophy, hallowed in its lessons of virtue, calm in its tone and temper of reason, eloquent in its appeals, sublime in its moral, and passionate only in its fervent affection. It should have been the legacy of Augustus to his successors, the "farewell" address of Washington to his countrymen!

But this is the last annual message of Andrew Jackson! I would, for him and his country, that it was any thing but what it is. And why is it what it is? Gentlemen will pardon me—I mean nothing disrespectful to the president—when I say they know it is due to candor and truth to say—it is what it is, because it is not the message at all of Andrew Jackson! They know that, immediately upon the adjournment of the last session of congress, the president and his prime ministers were dispersed from their duties at the seat of government, and from the cares of public business, on their respective missions to the states of this union. He of state bore despatches to Georgia, and "the old chief himself" was lugged along through Western Virginia, over to Tennessee and Alabama. It is a pity, sir, that more of the people had not witnessed the executive electioneering tour, for then, perhaps, more of the states would have followed the example of Georgia and Tennessee, neither of which could be seduced or intimidated into the support of "the man"—a Tennessee toast said, "the dog"—as well as "the master." I am told that they carried him about like a lion for show, and made him roar like a lion. They had catechisms prepared for him, and the negotiations of the mission were conducted by preconcerted questions and answers. A crowd would collect—on the highway or in the bar-rooms, no matter which—and some "village politician" of "the party" would inquire—"What think you, general, of such a man?" In a loud tone, much too stentorian for those lungs which are now lacerated, the answer rung—"He is a traitor, sir." "There, there!" repeated the demagogues to the crowd, "did you not hear that?" "What think you of another, general?" "He is a liar, sir!" "What of another?" "He is a black cockade federalist!" Of another. "He made a speech for which he paid some stenographer five dollars!" And another was—"Of no account—no account, sir, and ought to be sent home to have his place supplied by a more efficient man;" and another was—"Upon the fence, sir—upon the fence!" "But, general, what think you of Mr. (the first time Reuben was ever called Mister!) Reuben M. Whitney?" "There is no just cause of complaint against Mr. Whitney, sir; he is as true a patriot as ever was; they are all liars who accuse him of aught wrong, and the official documents prove them to be so!" All the while these responses were repeated by the deacons of the service, and the people were called to give heed to them. Those who saw the farce and the frauds did heed them, sir—did heed them.

My friend (Mr. P.) told them that they would kill him: that there was too much travel and fatigue; too much standing and talking; too much bustle and excitement for a weak and infirm old man to bear. But still, they showed him about, in the heat of summer, and still they made him roar, until he frightened the people, who at last began to apprehend he was a lion come to devour their freedom of elections, and all else they valued as dear. Defeated in his mission, he at length became disgusted himself, chagrined and mortified. He returned to Washington through Ohio, and, by the Guyandotte route, through Virginia again, and has been sick and disabled ever since. The loss of Tennessee, particularly the Hermitage, excited him still more, and this renewed excitement may have caused that hemorrhage at the lungs, which has been pouring out the current of his life. At no moment since his return has he been able to write or dictate a message. There he has been lying, as it were, a dead lion, who could not even "shake the dew drop from his mane," and his couch of infirmity has been haunted by the Perennises and Cleanders of his palace as by vampires. In their hands has he fallen, and it is because this "last annual message" comes to us and the country reeking with the fumes of the kitchen cabinet, that it is what it is!

What is it? The worst as well as the last annual message which Andrew Jackson ever wrote—I had like to have said, ever sent to both houses of congress. Its vanity and egotism—its profane hypocrisy and solemn mockery of the good man's supplications to the Supreme Ruler of the universe—its sophistical nonsense, showing its duplicity to a foreign power, and concealing its real policy from ourselves—its low, ad captandum arguments, addressed to all the prejudices of ignorance and passion, to justify the most shameless attacks upon the currency for the vile purposes of licensed depredators on the public lands—its glaring falsehoods as to the most important facts of trade, currency, banks of deposit and finance—its electioneering, continually harping upon an institution dead in fact, and thrice wounded since dead—its oft-repeated homily against one good bank, and its unblushing recommendation, in the same breath, of nearly half one hundred bad and irresponsible banks—its disingenuous attempts to reconcile glaring inconsistencies of the president on the deposit and distribution measures—its pitiful apologies for the disgrace of our arms by Oseola—its bold recommendation of an increase of the standing army—its unjust attempt to cast censure, due to the errors and blunders of the administration itself, upon the shoulders of an innocent state officer, and then calling for an appropriation to repair these same errors, which it says are not those of this government—its false claim of a national policy, founded in humanity toward the Indians—its reiterated jesuitical recommendation of an amendment of the constitution as to the election of president, which was never meant to be carried into effect by "the party," or to be any thing more than a topic with which to prejudice the people's minds against an election by the house—its impudent boast of the intelligence and patriotism of the successor, whom executive patronage and dictation have succeeded in electing—its shallow political economy—its demagoguism—its arts of vile deception and humbuggery—its rankling venom of party spirit—its miserable rhetoric, sinking below criticism—its grovelling moral sentiment—its total want of all sage counsel or advice, and of all pathos and feeling—are all equalled only by its false certificate in chief to "the prosperous condition of all the various executive departments," to "the ability and integrity" with which they have been conducted, and to the fact of the president's belief, "that there is no just cause of complaint from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation!"

Now, sir, complaints have been loudly made from various quarters, by this house and in the press, by responsible persons, as to the condition of most of the executive departments, and as to the want of ability and integrity with which they have been conducted; and investigations by us of the truth or falsehood, justice or injustice, of these complaints, have, heretofore, been doggedly and repeatedly refused. "The party" were content with the mere affirmation by the president to the crowd, of their innocence and purity, when he knew no more about their guilt than he knew of the facts of a certain event in this capitol last winter, of which you and I, Mr. Chairman, knew all, and more than we wanted to know; about which, if the Tennessee papers are to be believed, the president has given another certificate, though he was more than a mile off, and there were at least seven fathoms of bricks and mortar and stone between him and the place of the occurrence.—They have made him a witness in both cases where it was impossible for him to be a witness, and in giving his testimony he has been compelled to resort to his "imagination for his facts." I cared nothing about the certificates of the president so long as they abided in the ephemeral form of heated partisan declarations along the public roads, or so long as they were read from the stump merely a thousand miles off. But, sir, this "certificate in chief" is no longer a mere tavern ipse dixit on the highway, but it is to be filed in the archives of this government as part and parcel of the "last annual message" of the greatest and best!! Perennis and Cleander have certified to their own good behavior, innocence and purity, have incorporated their certificate in the "last annual message," and have affixed to it the official manual of Andrew Jackson!

Is this certificate true? I put it to gentlemen if it be not true, whether injustice has not been done to Andrew Jackson, to those who have uttered just complaints, and to the public service, by this audacious forged self-acquittal!

Is it true or false, that the various executive departments have been conducted with ability and integrity, and that they are in a prosperous condition? That is the issue. How is it to be tried? Will gentlemen tell me that the president has tried the issue already, and that they are content with his certificate in form? Sir, I begin this session as I ended the last session, by asking the opportunity and power, and by claiming the right of an investigation by a committee, an efficient, able and fair committee, with full power to eviscerate the truth. The truth is all I desire. I make no accusations, no complaints, except of the denial of investigation.

If all have been conducted with ability and integrity, the departments have nothing to fear, and investigation may do great good. If it does not find and expose past fraud and corruption, it may prevent much evil hereafter, by the fear of scrutiny. I do sincerely, from the best of motives, earnestly desire to see the doors of the treasury department, of the land offices, of the Indian bureau, and of other departments and offices, thrown open to full and fair investigation. We then can have the facts of which to judge for ourselves, and on which to make up our own verdict. It is the duty of the grand inquest to find or ignore a bill for itself, and of the venire to try the issue and find a verdict for itself. No judge, much more no party, shall find a bill, true or false, or render a verdict for them. Cleanse the Augean stables, say I, and I say more. The Numidian king, when he was carried a captive to Rome, and saw the corruptions of her citizens, returned from the city with contempt, and said—"give me wealth, and I will buy up the whole republic." Fanny Wright, I believe, uttered a truth, that whenever you see two men talking together, there are ten chances to one they are talking on one of three subjects—"trade, politics or religion." The three subjects have, since she wrote the remarks, entirely amalgamated into two. Trade and politics have now become one. Some of the priests, I am told, are offering to join the union, and mammon is the god of this day's worship. Trade, sir, trade swallows up every thing!

Tell me not this is the short session. Investigation was refused, last winter, when the session was long. I know, sir, that this is an inauspicious period, perhaps, to expect gentlemen to look back at the past, or to pause a moment on the present. I know that every eye is turned, and every mind of gentlemen is bent towards the future. "Coming events, which cast their shadows before," are much more dazzling to their hopes and fancies, than painful truths of the past or the present are to their memories or their wills. They know, sir, that some of the swarm of "conservatives" which are now fat and full of the blood of the treasury, must be driven off for some of the lank and hungry "loco foco" flies, who are voraciously eager to light upon this poor body politic of ours. All things may not become new, but there must be some changes; and for every change there will be some impatient expectant. I know that general Jackson has been made to say in this "last annual message"—"He that cometh after me is mightier than I" but he has not been made to add—"Whose fan is in his hand," and "he will thoroughly purge his floor." Sir, lest he may not purge his floor I wish it to be swept clean for him before he comes in, so that Jackson may not be blamed after he is gone.

Certain it is I cannot anticipate; time must develop the course and the policy of the coming administration. And let no one accuse me of commencing an attack upon it in advance. No, sir; so far from it though I hold Mr. Van Buren responsible for most of the mischief that has been done, and most that is now doing; though he has been the caucus candidate for the presidency, and was the nominated successor; though he is elected by executive patronage, corruption and dictation; though he succeeds at the expense of the elective franchise; though he is a minority president, and has promised to follow generally in the footsteps of this kitchen cabinet administration; yet, if he bravely dares to falsify that promise, "more honored in the breach than in the observance;" if he will kick away the base ladders by which he has climbed to the height of his ambition; if he will now leave Falstaff where he found him, and array around him the wisdom, intelligence, and virtue of the country, and base his administration on a sound, elevated and enlightened policy, free from corruption, and purely patriotic, uncontaminated by party, I will pledge my humble support to his measures, though I never can support the man, or pardon the past examples he has set. And why cannot I support the man whilst I approve his measures? For the very reason that he has not "entered in at the straight gate." I shall always eschew the example which has been set in 1836, as I did that of 1825, in the election of president of these United States. The one example has been rebuked with a vengeance—the other will not be forgiven by me.

Sir, in this contest one great battle only has been fought between power and the people. The result is known. The conflict was not decisive, and must, as long as there is an honest heart to hope for freedom—shall go on, until constitutional liberty, law, the independence of the people, and their representatives, honesty, truth and justice, are triumphant, or all are fettered in a despot's chains. Defeated, but not conquered; checked by the Prætorian bands of patronage, but not arrested in their onward march; the patriot army is not discouraged or dismayed; smitten, but not struck down, the flag of the country is still flying! Defeat may drive some, the craven or the cormorant of spoils, from the standard of the true and the brave, but to the firm and proud spirits of the patriot band I would say "Who shall separate us from the love of country?" Shall defeat? Another such defeat will be a glorious victory! In this "we are more than conquerors," for I am persuaded that neither office, nor bribe, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate us from the love of our country its laws, and its liberties! God only knows in whose name this victory shall be achieved; it matters not; but this I know, be he who he may, his cause will be consecrated by the toils, the prayers, the sacrifices, and the hopes of the unsubdued and untimid freeman. No, sir; let no man despair of the republic. The fight is not yet ended. The people are not yet vanquished. Their hosts are withdrawn only for the moment to recruit their forces, and to repair their broken weapons. The weapons of our warfare are the weapons of truth. It shall be my duty to assist in pointing anew its spears and its lances.

The question on the resolution was then taken without further debate, and carried: ayes 96, noes 78.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

General land office, Dec. 1, 1836.

Sir: I have the honor herewith to present statements exhibiting the operations of the several land offices for the year 1836, and the first, second and third quarters of the year 1836, indicating the quantity of land sold; the amount of cash and scrip received in payment therefor; the amount of the incidental expenses, and the amount of moneys paid into the treasury by the receivers of public money, during the said period. See tables marked A and B.

Transmitted herewith, are also copies of the estimates of appropriation required by this branch of the public service during the ensuing year, viz:

For the general land office, see paper marked C.

The act of 4th of July, 1836, entitled "an act to reorganize the general land office," having omitted to make provision for the payment of the salaries of the officers and clerks whom it authorized to be employed, the paper marked C also indicates the amount required to be appropriated to meet payment for those salaries to 31st December, 1836.

For the office of the surveyors general, see paper marked D.

For surveying the public lands, see paper marked E.

Document marked F is composed of a circular letter addressed to the surveyors general, on the first September, 1836, together with their replies thereto, in relation to their estimates for the ensuing year, and the progress and present condition of the public surveys. P No. 2 is a compilation of those estimates.

In the surveying district composed of the states of Ohio, Indiana and Michigan, the amount of land surveyed, and of lands yet to be offered for sale, remain the same as represented in the last annual report of the late commissioner. The new surveys in these districts, to be effected under instructions recently issued, embrace all the former small Indian reservations ceded under treaties made this year with the Pottawatamie, Chippewa and Wyandot Indians, and all that portion of Michigan not heretofore surveyed, which borders upon Lake Michigan, south of Thunder Bay river, and north of Grand river, estimated at about two hundred and seventy-five townships.

In Wisconsin territory, formerly designated Michigan, west of Lake Michigan. In addition to the returns of the sixty-five townships in the Green Bay district, alluded to in the report of last year, and which have since been received, the office has been advised of the completion of the balance of the surveys in this district, amounting to one hundred and nineteen townships and fractional townships making in the aggregate about one hundred and eighty four townships and fractional townships surveyed, and yet to be offered for sale; being all the lands in the Wisconsin territory east of the Mississippi river, to which the Indian title has been extinguished. The necessary instructions have been issued for the survey of the Sac and Fox cession west of the Mississippi river, and binding on the river, which was ceded by treaty on the 21st of September, 1832, and estimated to contain two hundred and fifty townships, and also for laying off the towns named in the act of the last session of congress, approved on the second day of July, which are situated on this tract.

In Missouri and Illinois. Since the report of the late surveyor general, (30th January, 1836), was submitted to congress, (now forming document No. 215, H. R. 1st session, 24th congress), no returns of surveys have been made to this office, with the exception of the two townships on Rock river, Illinois, which were surveyed for the Polish exiles.—The communication from the present surveyor general, dated 3d November, 1836, and the accompanying papers marked A, B and C, afford all the information received respecting the present situation of the field and office work of the surveying district composed of those two states. The present surveyor general having only recently entered upon the duties of his office, cannot be expected yet to have had time and opportunity of entering fully into the state of the arrears. He remarks in his communication above referred to, "that the only work now going on in the field is as follows:

"By Joseph Montgomery, who is completing the surveys under his contract of 1834.

"By D. A. Spaulding, who is finishing his contract of the 9th June, 1835.

"And by Jesse Applegate, under his contract of the 25th day of May of the present year."

It being doubtful from the foregoing report, whether the field work of the three contracts it enumerates constitutes all the field work to be completed of the outstanding contracts, or simply the amount of field work at present prosecuting, the surveyor general has been again written to for more precise information.

On referring to pages 10 and 11 of the surveyor general's report of January 30, 1836, it appears that the returns of 36 townships in Missouri, and of 134 townships in Illinois, from the field notes of which the plats had been constructed, were at that date in his office. This is all the certain information now in possession of this office, in relation to the returns of the field work of the contracts exhibited in the lists.

In Arkansas nearly all the lands that have been surveyed and returned to this office have been offered for sale. The outstanding contracts for surveying at the commencement of the present year embraced the exteriors of 69 townships, and the subdivision of 60 townships, as will appear by the last annual report of the surveyor general then in office which accompanied the report of the commissioner, of December 5, 1835, (see document H. R. 1st session 24th congress), to which, in the absence of the expected report of the present incumbent, I beg leave to refer. The surveys recommended in the surveyor general's report, just referred, constitute the new surveys which have been ordered this year, amounted in all to 110 townships and fractional townships, selected in different parts of the state, with a view to the public accommodation; of these, 60 townships are to be subdivided for market.

In Louisiana. There are in this state, prepared for market, but not yet offered for sale, 250 townships and fractional townships, situated chiefly in the south eastern district, and in the north end of the Opelousas (south western) district, near the great raft of Red river, and 110 townships known to be surveyed, the returns of which have not yet been received. In addition to the survey of private claims, &c. already in progress, the surveyor general has been instructed respecting the survey of the tract recently ceded by the Caddo Indians, on the great raft of Red river, which, it is said, may be estimated at one million of acres.

In Mississippi. With the exception of about 40 townships, situated chiefly in the Choctaw district, and upon the south boundary of the Chickasaw cession, all the lands, in this state, north of the 31st degree of latitude have been surveyed, and, except 8 townships recently returned have been brought into market. The expected report of the newly appointed surveyor general for this state, on the condition of the surveys in his district and the details of his office, has not been received; but, as soon after its arrival as practicable, the instructions alluded to in the commissioner's report of last year, relative to the examination of their errors in locating and surveying the confirmed private claims south of the 31st degree of latitude, will be renewed.

The expectations expressed in the commissioner's report of last year, in regard to the progress of the surveys in the Chickasaw cession of 1832, have been fulfilled. The plats of 307 townships and fractional townships (including the portion of the cession in Alabama) have been returned to this office; and 249 of them having been proclaimed for sale, 58 townships and fractional townships remain to be offered; the survey of the remainder of the cession, estimated to be about equal to 30, is nearly completed, and will be finished it is expected, in a short time after the running of the line separating this cession of 1830, now in progress, is completed.—These townships are situated near that line, and in the south western part of the cession, near the Mississippi.

In Alabama. With the exception of the Cherokee lands recently ceded, and a few islands in the Tennessee river, and fractions of townships, situated chiefly upon the unsettled eastern boundary of the state, and those south of 31 degree of latitude, and all the lands have been surveyed and offered for sale. The eastern boundary line of the state not having been yet determined, so far as this office is informed, the instructions have been withheld for closing the public surveys upon that line, for which a special appropriation of $1,000 was made at the last session of congress; which, therefore, has not been expended. As these surveys must remain unfinished, to the serious injury of a large number of settlers on the lands, and in their immediate vicinity, until the line in question is recognized by the proper authorities, it is hoped that early steps now taken for its final adjustment, either by recognizing the line said to have been already run and marked under the authority of the state of Georgia, or by causing a new line to be run.

In Florida. In consequence of continual Indian hostilities, the surveying operations in this district have been suspended, and will have to remain so until the removal of the Seminole Indians shall be effected. There are at present 211 townships and fractional townships prepared for market, but not offered for sale, all of which are situated east of the Suwannee river, and north of the Wythlacoochee river. The surveys in the western portion of the territory have, for the most part, been completed, and the lands brought into market.

Interspersed throughout the different surveying districts there are a number of tracts, portions of townships, islands and swamps, susceptible of being reclaimed, &c. which, from various causes, were not surveyed at the time of the survey of the contiguous lands. The present enhanced value of most of those tracts appears to render them matters of public interest, which is increasing every year; and it is regretted that the frequent attempts to effect the survey of them have hitherto failed, by reason of the inadequacy of the present maximum of compensation.

The frequent inquiries and great interest manifested in relation to lands of this description, induced this office, in the circular letter of 1st September last, to call the attention of the surveyors general to the subject, and to require them to estimate specifically for the cost of all such work. In pursuance of such instruction, it will be perceived, from the accompanying documents, that the surveyor general of Ohio, Indiana and Michigan and the surveyor general of Florida, have both estimated for surveying unfinished portions of townships, islands, lakes, &c. at an average of five dollars per mile; and the surveyors general of Alabama and Louisiana have both estimated, for a similar description of work, at a price not exceeding eight dollars per mile. And it will be perceived that those specific estimates are taken into view, in the estimate of surveying expenses for the next year, submitted by this office.

The paper G, herewith transmitted, is a statement shewing the amount of forfeited land stock, issued and surrendered at the United States land offices, to the 30th September, 1836; also, the amount of military land scrip surrendered to the same period.

The paper H, is an exhibit of the periods to which the monthly accounts of the registers and receivers of the public land offices have been rendered, and showing the balance of cash in the receivers' hands at the date of the last monthly accounts current, and the periods to which the receivers' quarterly accounts have been rendered.

Land scrip and Virginia military surveys.

Since the last annual report from this office, the second section of the act entitled "an act making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of government for the year 1835," has been complied with, by issuing of scrip, in satisfaction of all the Virginia military warrants surrendered to the first day of September of that year, with the exception of about thirty-eight thousand acres on warrants suspended by reason of defects in the title papers, but which, it is expected, will be speedily completed. Considerable progress has also been made during the same period, in the issuing of patents on surveys founded on Virginia military warrants; and the office indulges the hope that all the remaining cases will be disposed of prior to the date of the next annual report.

The issuing of the patents for lands sold—pre-emption claims.

The pre-emption claims under the act of June 19, 1834, and those under the different acts of 1814, 1816, 1830, 1832 and 1833, have had a tendency to delay the issuing of the patents for lands sold, in nearly all the United States land offices. The late law granted to the settlers the term of two years from the date of its passage, at any time during which they might establish their claim, and make payment therefor. But in case the lands were proclaimed for public sale during the continuance of the pre-emption term, the pre-emption was required to be established before the commencement of such public sale.

The ordinary private entries being permitted to proceed during the whole term of operation of the pre-emption law, it has resulted that numerous instances exist where the land to which pre-emption claims have been satisfactorily established are discovered to have been previously entered at ordinary private sale. The consequence has been, that no patents for lands sold in any land districts during the pre-emption term, (from 19th June, 1834, to 19th June 1836,) could with safety be issued until after the receipt of the June returns for 1836 affording evidence of the entire amount of pre-emption claims admitted under the law. In addition to this cause of delay in the issuing of patents, it has been made the duty of this office to review the whole of the evidences on which pre-emption claims were admitted in order to ascertain that the provisions of the law had been fairly complied with in each case—a labor which has occupied a large share of attention, and which has so far progressed as to admit of the release of the certificates of purchase, for the purpose of patenting, in the Helena and Fayetteville districts, in Arkansas; in all the districts of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Missouri; the districts of Cahaba and Demopolis, in Alabama; the Green Bay district in Wisconsin; and the Mount Salus (now Jackson) district, in Mississippi, so that with some few exceptions, the patents for lands sold in the enumerated districts will be no longer delayed by pre-emption claims.

The number of certificates of purchase issued at the land officers during the year ending on the 30th of September last is found to be 184,949.

The present aggregate number of certificates of purchase remaining in this office, on which patents are to be issued is ascertained to be 263,017. Of these it may be remarked that a large portion includes several tracts, instances being numerous where they require the issuing of from ten to twenty separate patents.

Recorder's office.

Since the commencement of operations in the office of the recorder of the general land office, in August last, with a much smaller force than is intended to be permanently allotted to the duties of that bureau, (of writing, recording and transmitting patents), there have been written therein 21,724 patents, and 21,661 have been recorded. In addition to which there have been otherwise prepared, since the act of reorganization, 4,680 patents all of which bear date subsequent to that act.

Much interruption of the regular course of business in that bureau resulted from the unavoidable necessity connected with general official convenience, of frequently detaching from it, at different periods, many of the persons there employed, for the purpose of assigning them to duty on other branches of the office. From this cause it may be said the bureau has but recently been operating with an unchanged regular force, and that if no necessity for the interruption alluded to had existed, a heavier amount of work would have been accomplished during the same period.

Since the date of the last annual report, the number of patents actually transmitted, together with those now in immediate course of transmission, to the district land offices, is 80,940, bearing date prior to the act of reorganization.

The absence of the solicitor, provided for this office by the act of reorganization, has no doubt, prevented as rapid a progress in deciding cases of conflicting pre-emption claims as might have resulted under the complete organization of the pre-emption bureau. I am happy, however, in being enabled to state that, since the adjournment of congress, a very considerable number of cases of contested pre-emption claims have been settled, or placed in proper train for final decision, many of which are peculiarly complicated.

The registry of the sales of public lands (a labor independently necessary in order to impose a test to the accuracy of the operations of the land offices), has progressed with unexampled rapidity, since the increased means of executing the duties of this office have been placed at its disposal.

The impediments of the issuing of patents for sales of public lands in the Louisiana districts, hitherto existing, are in rapid process of being removed, so far as operations in this office are concerned; and this subject will receive that degree of special attention which its importance imperatively demands.

In conclusion, I have to state that, under the provisions of the Chickasaw treaties, of the 20th of October, 1832, and 24th of May, 1834, the sales of the lands ceded thereby commenced in Ponitoc, Mississippi, on the first Monday in January last; and by the returns made to this office, it appears that, up to the 30th of September last, they amounted to the sum of $1,080,118 61. The operations of that office are not included in any of the statements herewith furnished as the net proceeds of the sales constitute a fund for the benefit of that tribe, and are available to the treasury for the general purposes of the government.

All of which is most respectfully submitted.
JOHN M. MOORE, acting commissioner of the general land office.
Hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury.

FOREIGN CHRONICLE.

How to astonish a custom house officer. A French paper states that an amusing adventure lately occurred at Boulogne. A lady stepped out of a packet boat which had just arrived at the wharf, with a small box under her arm. Some appearance of fur, which appeared through a crevice in the box, attracted the notice of a vigilant custom house officer, who immediately suspected that some smuggling trick was about being played. He stopped the lady, and rudely insisted on examining the box. It was delivered to him with apparent reluctance. But he had no sooner put his hand on the cover, than it sprang off, and a hideous figure about 8 feet high, arrayed in the most uncouth costume, started out of the box! It was one of those children's toys called magicians, manufactured for the amusement of children, when by the means of an elastic wire, an object is made to start from the box, on removing the cover. This unfortunately for the officer, happened to be of an unusual size—and he was so terrified at the unexpected and horrid spectacle, that uttering one shriek, he dropped the object of his fears, and fled in dismay from the quay!

Hay. An English paper of a late date mentions that a vessel was about to sail from Aberdeen for the United States, with 62 tons of hay, and another larger cargo was to follow from the Clyde.

The latest Paris letters mention the occurrence of three heavy failures of houses in that city. There had also been three extensive failures in Antwerp. It is added that neither of them has any connection with the United States.

A late Smyrna paper states that a literary and scientific society has just been formed at Cairo under the title of the Egyptian society, whose principal object is to collect in an immense library all the works ancient and modern, relating to Egypt, and to allow travellers who, being introduced by a member, have the privilege of visiting the establishment gratis, all the information they may desire relative to their travels through the country profitably and economically.

Rio Grande, October 14. Information was received a few days since, of the entire defeat of the revolutionary forces near Port Alegre, and of their commander and most of his officers having been made prisoners. This, it is generally supposed, will put an end to the war in a short time.

We regret to learn, by a letter from Edinburgh, that sir Robert Liston died at his country seat near that city, about the close of October. He lived to a most venerable age, since he must have been upwards of ninety years old when he died. He will be remembered by many of our citizens as an ambassador from the court of St. James to this republic, before its political capital had been removed to Washington. [Phil. Gaz.]

The winter in the British provinces appears to have been unusually mild. The St. Andrews Standard of the 15th instant says: "The unusual mildness and salubrity of the weather, which we have experienced for some time back, are the theme of common congratulation." The St. John, (N. B.) Courier of the 10th, says: "The weather for some time past has been truly delightful; this morning it is more like May than December."

Shipwrecks. A report to the British house of commons on shipwrecks, states that the whole loss of British shipping at sea amounts to nearly £3,000,000 per annum, and the loss of lives to 1,000 each year.

Public roads in England. The English expend one million pounds annually in the repair and maintenance of their public roads; they are about 20,000 miles in length.

Mr. Cass, appointed United States minister to France, arrived at Portsmouth, England, November 2d, in the Quebec, 22 days from New York.
